[Concluded.]

These little things would not be considered worthy of any notice, but from fresh currency which has been given to them by a late popular work, which is extensively circulated throughout the State. We conclude our notice of the gratuitous aspersions, by a few words in reply to the charge of their denying the doctrine of original sin, and the eternity of punishment. They do not hold that Adam's fall condemns indiscriminately all born souls, for many are born and die without sinning; but they admit and teach, that in the fall of Adam all disposition to do good and holiness was lost, and that the whole race inherit a natural innate depravity, which will lead them to sin, and prove their sure condemnation, unless they repent, and are born again of the Holy Spirit. Beissel wrote a book on this subject, which is as curious as it is ingenious. He enters into long disquisitions on the nature of Adam, and his capabilites, before the fall; explaining many things of the fall, and with it elucidating several parts of the Scriptures, which have, and would easily escape the attention of men of less profundity of genius. His views are somewhat mysterious, yet deep and ingenious, but in the present day would be deemed little more than refined speculations, sublimated into visions. But none go to deny the depravity of the human heart, and the sad consequences which the fall of Adam has entailed on every succeeding generation, unless each creature be regenerated and born again through the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit. They do not believe in the universal salvation in the usual acceptation of the term—they teach the sure reward of submission and obedience to the requisitions of the Lord, through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus; and believe fully in the punishment of transgression, for "the wages of sin is death," death to the joys of heaven, and an exclusion from the presence of the Lord; "Cast into utter darkness, where there is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth, where the fire is never quenched, where the worm never dieth." The idea of a universal restoration did exist among some in the early days, and is to be attributed to attempts to explain the fifteenth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, and the twentieth chapter of the Revelations, and reconcile some other parts of the Scriptures. It, however, is never taught as a doctrine, but is always approached with the greatest caution and delicacy, by their pastor in private conversations with the members, who desire to be instructed upon this subject; and who invariably admonishes them to be diligent in making their calling and election sure; to be prepared for the first resurrection, and not to depend on a second.

Though they considered contention with arms and at law unchristian and unbecoming professors, yet they were decided Whigs in the Revolution, and have, unfortunately, had to defend themselves too frequently in courts of justice. To set an example of forbearance and Christian meekness, they suffered for a long time to be wronged and plundered, until forbearance was no longer a virtue. In the French war (the war of 1756,) the doors of the cloister, including the chapels, meeting-room, and every other building, were opened as a refuge for the inhabitants of Tulpehocken and Paxton settlements, then the frontiers, from the incursions of the hostile Indians, all of whom were received and kept by the Society during the period of alarm and danger:—upon hearing of which, a company of infantry was dispatched by the royal government from Philadelphia to protect Ephrata; and on representation of the character of the Society, by the commissioners who were sent to visit the place, the government made them a present of a pair of very large glass communion goblets, which was the only recompense they would receive. At an earlier period they attracted the attention of the Penn family, and one of the young ladies, in England, commenced a correspondence with the Society.* Governor Penn visited them frequently, and, desirous of giving them a solid evidence of his regard, had a tract of five thousand acres of land surrounding Ephrata surveyed and conveyed to them, as the Seventh-day Baptist Manor; but they refused to accept it, believing that large possessions were calculated to engender strife, and as more becoming to Christian pilgrims and sojourners not to be absorbed in the gains of this world and the accumulation of property. After the battle of Brandywine, the whole establishment was opened to receive the wounded Americans, great numbers of whom were brought there in wagons, a distance of more than forty miles; and one hundred and fifty of whom died, and are buried on Mount Zion. Their doors were ever open to the weary traveler, and all visitors were cordially received and entertained, while they tarried, as is done in the hospices of Europe. They gave all the necessary supplies to the needy, even their own beds, and to stripping their own backs to afford some shelter from the "peltings of the pitiless storm," to those who were exposed to the weather in inclement seasons.

Many of the brethren being men of education, they established, at a very early period, a school, which soon gained for itself an honorable reputation, many young men from Philadelphia and Baltimore being sent here to be educated. A Sabbath School was also instituted for religious instruction, which flourished many years, and was attended with some remarkable consequences. It produced an anxious inquiry among the juvenile population who attended the school, which increased and grew into what is now termed a revival of religion. The scholars of the Sabbath School met together every day before and after common school hours, to pray and exhort one another, under the superintendence of one of the brethren. The excitement run into excess, and betrayed a zeal not according to knowledge; which induced Friedsam to discourage an enterprise, which had been commenced, and was partly under way, namely, erect a house for their especial use, to be called Succoth. Ludwig Hœcker, or Brother Obed as he was designated, who was the teacher of the common school, projected the plan of holding a school in the afternoon of the Sabbath, and who, in connection with some of the other brethren, commenced it, to give instruction to the indigent children who were kept from regular school by employments which their necessities obliged them to be engaged at during the week, as well as to give religious instruction to those of better circumstances. It is not known in what year exactly the Sabbath School was commenced. Hœcker came to Ephrata in the year 1739, and it is presumed that he began, soon after he took up his residence amongst the brethren. The materials for the building were furnished, as is recorded in the minutes of the Society, in the year 1749. After the battle of Brandywine, the Sabbath School room, with others, was given up for a hospital, which was occupied as such some time; and the school was never afterwards resumed. Hœcker at that period was sixty years of age.

To Robert Raikes is certainly due the honor of having projected and successfully introduced the present general system of Sunday School instruction, but there is much credit justly due to the Seventh-day Baptists of Ephrata, for having established and maintained in operation, for a period of upwards of thirty years, a Sabbath School, forty years before the first school was opened by the Gloucester philanthropist.

By this time (1777) the Society began to decline, but not from causes alledged by some writers—want of vigor of mind in the successor of Beissel, who died 1768; for his successor, Peter Miller, was a man of much greater powers of mind, and had the management of the establishment during Beissel's time; and to his energy and perseverance is mainly attributable the great prosperity of the institution in its early days. The institution was one of the seventeenth century, and in accordance with European feelings, most of the members being natives of Germany. The state of public opinion at Beissel's death was widely different from what it was during the first fifty years after Ephrata was established, in relation to politics and government; and with this march of intellect, different sentiments were entertained in regard to religious institutions. It was commenced as a social community in the midst of a wilderness—the hand of improvement made the desert bloom as the rose—and at that time (1768) was not surrounded by a dense, promiscuous population. These circumstances, connected with incessant persecution, the turmoil and contention into which they were thrown and constantly kept by some of their envious neighbors, were the principal causes of the decline of the Society.

There is still a small band who retain the principles, and meet together regularly to worship, on the evening and the morning of the Sabbath; but they are a flock without a shepherd—they have the forms, but not the spirit nor the zeal of their predecessors. The ancient community has been called "zealots." Zeal is, certainly, better than indifference, and enthusiasm better than deadness. Zeal is the life of Christianity, and it is an honor to the denomination to be designated by a title, even if it be in ridicule, which imports their activity and faithfulness. The people of Ephrata now lack that desirable quality for which those of old are stigmatized; for that zeal would be an honor to them should they merit it. Ephrata would be a paradise, as it was in former days, were the people now here such zealots, as those they have descended from. They now partake more of the cold Christianity of the world. It must not, however, be supposed that they were ranters, or made a noise and display in their zeal. It was a quiet, all-absorbing zeal, in which the world and all its vanities were sacrificed to pure and constant devotion; they were living and moving in this world, performing diligently all the duties that devolved upon them here; but their spirits, and all their conversation, were centered in heaven. Of them, who were derided with the epithet of "zealots," Mr. Winchester, speaking of the people of Ephrata, in his dialogues, says: "I remember the Rev. Morgan Edwards, formerly minister of the Baptist church in Philadelphia, once said to me: 'God will always have a visible people on earth, and these (the society at Ephrata) are his people at present, above any other in the world.'" Mr. Winchester says further, "They walk in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless, both in public and in private. They bring up their children, (now speaking of the married members,) in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; no noise, rudeness, shameless mirth, loud laughter, is heard within their doors. The law of kindness is in their mouths; no sourness or moroseness disgraces their religion, and whatsoever they believe their Saviour commands, they practice, without inquiring, or regarding what others do. They read much; they sing and pray much; they are constant attendants upon the worship of God; their dwelling houses are all houses of prayer." But alas! alas! it is not so now. Ephrata has fallen—degenerated beyond all conception. It is now spiritually dead. Ichabod is written upon the walls of this branch of our Zion.

As early as 1758, there was a branch of this Society established at the Bermudian Creek, in York county, about fifteen miles from the town of York; some of the members of which still remain, though they have been without preaching many years. Another was established in 1753, in Bedford county, which still flourishes, and many members of the present Society are scattered through the counties of the interior of the State; so that the truth which was left has not become extinct, but is still extending, which is particularly the case at Snowhill; and hope is still entertained, that the little one may become a thousand, and the small one a great nation.

For a further detail of the history of this Society, a description of the Monastic Institution at Ephrata, and an account of their extensive literary labors and numerous publications, as well as their music, which is peculiar to themselves, see the writer's "Historical Sketch," in Hazard's Register of Pennsylvania, vol. xv. page 161.

Out* of the foregoing church, another branch was established in Franklin county, at a place now called Snowhill, and similar to the mother church at Ephrata, under the superintendence and eldership of Peter Lehman and Andrew Snowberger, where the greatest body of the Society now reside. Several small branches have since been established in western Pennsylvania.

In regard to their religious tenets, they believe in one God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. And also believe, "that all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." And consequently they acknowledge the Holy Scriptures as their only rule of faith and practice.

They keep the seventh day of the week for the Sabbath, in honor of God's command, and contend that no other day has ever been instituted as the Sabbath, and that the one instituted in Paradise has never been abolished, by God himself, or by Jesus Christ, who acknowledgeth himself Lord of the Sabbath; and consequently is yet binding upon all mankind, as firmly and absolutely as upon the ancient Israelites. We can no where in the Scripture find an act repealing it; and therefore any other day instituted as the Sabbath, must of course be a human invention, and not of divine appointment; for the proof of which we might quote many passages from the Holy Scriptures, and also from respectable historians; but we wish to be as brief as possible with this article, and accordingly shall dispense with it. Baptism is administered among them by trine immersion; while the person is kneeling in the water, he is plunged three times forward under water, "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;" with the laying on of hands, and with prayer while the person is yet in the water. Baptism is administered upon none but adults, though children of believing parents are dedicated to the Lord and received in care of the church, for the laying on of hands, and calling upon the Lord to bless them, according to the example of Christ, Mark x. 16. They also practice the washing of feet before the Lord's Supper, which they celebrate in the evening. Open communion is an established rule of the church. They disclaim the right of withholding the holy sacrament from any one who expresses a desire to partake of the same, or to judge who is worthy or unworthy; but they rather adhere to the words of St. Paul, 1 Cor. xi. 28: "But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup." Chap. iv. 5: "Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the heart; and then shall every man have praise of God." They also consider it essential to adhere literally to the time, manner, and practice, of all the ordinances and injunctions of Christ, as they are recorded in the gospel, as near as they are capable of comprehending them; as they believe, that to deviate from the letter is to deviate from the spirit of it.

GREAT CLOCK AT STRASBURG.

From the bottom to the top it is not less than 100 feet, and above 30 feet wide and fifteen deep. The clock is struck in this way:—The dial is some twenty feet from the floor, on each side from which there is a cherub, or little boy, with a mallet; and over the dial is a small bell. The cherub on the left strikes the first quarter, that on the right the second quarter. Some fifty feet over the dial, in a large niche, is Time, a bell in his left, a scythe in his right hand. In front stands a figure of a young man with a mallet, who strikes the third quarter on the bell in the hand of Time; and then glides, with a slow step, round behind Time; out comes an old man, with a mallet, and places himself in front of him. As the hour of twelve comes, the old man raises his mallet and deliberately strikes twelve times on the bell, that echoes through the building and is heard round the region of the church. Then the old man glides slowly behind father Time, and the young man comes on, ready to perform his part as Time comes round again. Soon as the old man has struck twelve and disappeared, another set of machinery is put into motion some twenty feet higher still. It is thus: There is a higher cross, with an image of Christ on it. The instant twelve has struck, one of the apostles walks out from behind, comes in front, turns, facing the cross, bows, and walks around to his place. As he does so, another comes out in front, turns, bows, and passes on; so twelve figures, large as life, walk around, each to his place. As the last disappears, an enormous cock, perched on the pinnacle of the clock, slowly flaps its wings, stretches forth its neck, and crows three times, so loud as to be heard outside the church to some distance, and so naturally as to be mistaken for a real cock. Then all is silent as death. It was made in the year 1500, and has performed those mechanical wonders ever since, except about fifty years, when it was out of repair.

THERE IS NO GLORY IN A WAR.

Oh! tell me not, vain boasting man,
Though decked with plumes and broaches large;
Though, chief of all, you lead the van,
On prancing war-steed to the charge;
When face to face you meet the foe,
When arm with arm you strike the blow,
When human blood doth freely flow,
That there is glory in a war.

Oh! tell me not, old soldier brave,
Though you have battled long and well,
Though proud to fill a soldier's grave,
And long to lie with those who fell,
When liberty, that joyful sound,
From hill to hill was echoed round,
When hostile foes decked freemen's ground,
That there is glory in a war.

Oh! tell me not, young volunteer,
When called to fight, from friends and home,
From father, mother, sisters dear,
Though drum and fife dispel the gloom;
When on your soil tread hostile feet,
When you the foe in battle meet,
And when the drum is loudly beat,
That there is glory in a war.

I speak the truth to you, vain chief,
Though all your deeds a future age
May carve on rocks in bold relief,
Or write the same on history's page;
When Gabriel's trumpet soundeth loud,
When comes our Saviour in the cloud,
Then you will say, great chieftain proud,
There is no glory in a war.

I speak the truth, old soldier brave,
Though these sweet lines inscribed may be
On marble stones that mark your grave,
'Here lies a son of liberty;'
When you shall meet the awful King,
And hear his angels round him sing,
Then in your ears these words will ring,
There is no glory in a war.

I speak the truth, young volunteer,
About to leave your native grove,
Your father, mother, sisters dear,
And all that here on earth you love;
If you could know the groans and cries
That long have wafted to the skies,
All caused by war, you would despise
Those wishing glory through a war.

WALWORTH, W. T., May 10, 1847. G. R. C.

A MISSIONARY'S FAREWELL.

Rev. E. L. Abbott, the returned missionary to Arracan, attended the recent meeting of the Baptist Union, in Cincinnati, Ohio, and spoke his parting words to those who were present. The Western Christian Journal says of the occasion, that nothing remained but the farewell address of Br. Abbott. The audience had already experienced the mastery he had over their feelings, and they nerved themselves for the convulsive struggle. Some seemed afraid to gaze—to listen. It was a solemn occasion! deeply solemn!—the brethren felt it, and he felt it. It was the last time that he should meet them on earth. Much was not said, but enough was said for the sublimity and the solemnity of the occasion. The sentences were compressed—broken—choking—the language of a soul struggling under intense emotion. There were no tears shed on his part, while others were weeping around him—his heart had been disciplined by sterner trials than these—yet the effort to repress—to choke the emotion that was struggling for the mastery, revealed, distinctly what was passing within. The speech, evidently, was the offspring of the moment. There was more in the look—the tone—the gesture—occasion, than in the words. Of course those are indescribable.

"I have but a few moments, but as it is the last time, I desire to say a few words. I have been highly gratified with the spirit that has been manifested on this occasion. To you it has been a season of joy and festivity—to me, it has worn the aspect of a funeral! But the expression of feeling has been most gratifying to me. I shall return to my field with far different feelings than I would have done one month since. The spirit that has been manifested in this meeting has reminded me of an anecdote told in New York. In an antiquated book there was an engraving. In its center there was a bullock; on the right an altar; on the left a plow; and over them all, the inscription, Ready for either.

"I expect in six or eight weeks to bid farewell to my native land—the tenor of my feelings is sad—[a pause.] Much has been said of self-denial. The pastor in Boston, in New York, in the West—each has his cup of self-denial. We shall have our trials in whatever situation God may cast us—each has some that others know not. Every heart knows its own bitterness. When the brethren spoke of breasting the keen blast of the north-west prairies, with the wolf and the bear howling around them, I thought of our missionary brethren in the East, toiling under the burning of a tropical sun by day, and exposed to the cold damp chills by night, sleeping in their frail cottages, while the howl of the tiger and the tramp of the elephant could be heard, and the snake and the lizard were crawling over their faces.

"While the man of the West is doomed to lay his wife and little ones in the grave, the man in the East is doomed to the same. I have known a man seated on the floor at midnight, (referring to himself,) a few native women watching the corpse of his wife—not a white face within a hundred miles—the children moaning, Mamma must not die! Mamma must not die! while the father pressed his lips to the cold cheek of the sleeper, and whispered, We shall soon sleep in the grave together!—but those cold lips answered not—the wail of the infant was heeded not by a mother's heart.

"These babes—orphans—will soon be separated from their dearest friend on earth 20,000 miles. When I am gone, who will take care of my orphans, cast out—to run the gauntlet of the world's cold charities!

"These are the beginnings of sorrow. In six or eight weeks I expect to look upon these little ones for the last time. My mother has clasped her arms around my neck, and said, 'You are a broken down man! why will you go?' My children will cling to my last embrace and say, 'Papa! do you not love us?' Go to these orphans months hence, and you will find them dressed in mourning. Ask them, Where is your father, and they will tell you he is buried alive! This is a sacrifice. We can bury our wives and children, and though for a moment we feel a weight that is ready to crush us, still we rise above it; but to leave those that are helpless and dependent without a father's or a mother's hand to guide and protect them; to bury them alive, is bitter indeed!—[a pause]—Oh! there is a feeling that comes over my soul sometimes so crushing!——— * * *

"My brethren, you have never known what sacrifices mean. But why talk of sacrifices? When I think of sacrifices, I make my way to Gethsemane, to Calvary, to the Cross. Oh, how trivial then do all these appear! God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.

"My purpose is fixed. Notwithstanding the entreaties of my mother—the thought of my orphan children—my purpose is fixed—NEVER shaken for a moment. I left converts—I left pastors. Their affectionate attachment to me, their love, their devotion, have won my heart. When I left them, the probability was that I should see them no more. 'Teacher,' said they, 'we shall see you again, you shall not die. We shall be constantly praying for you. We shall be looking for you at the setting sun.' They will be looking, looking, and I expect to see them. I ask no more, only that I may be preserved to see them.

"One word more. The varied scenes through which I have already passed are enough for one man's life. I shall be slow to enter into any engagement that will make the recurrence of such scenes possible.

"Now, dear brethren, I go away—but I rely with unwavering confidence on the Union. We shall be sustained. I behold the pledge in your countenances, we shall be sustained. I have not a single wavering doubt.

"Brethren! we part—but not forever. In the morning of the Resurrection we shall come up from the East and the West together, bringing our sheaves with us."

RULES FOR GOVERNING CHILDREN.

1. Exercise your authority as seldom as possible, and instead of it employ kind persuasion and deliberate reasoning; but when you exercise it, make it irresistible.

2. Be careful how you theaten, but never lie. Threaten seldom, but never fail to execute. The parent who is open-mouthed threaten, and threatens hastily, but is irresolute to punish, and when the child is not subdued by the first threat, repeats it half a dozen times, with many shakes and twitches of the little culprit, will certainly possess no authority.

3. Avoid tones and gestures expressive of agitation for trivial matters, indicative of no depravity, and exhibiting only heedlessness or forgetfulness of children, for perhaps nothing is more common to all young animals, than a love to use their limbs. In all such cases, the tones should be kind and persuasive, rather than authoritative; and even the gravity of authority should be reserved exclusively for cases of disobedience and depravity, or for the prevention of serious evil. A perpetual fretting at children for little things, will inevitably harden their hearts, and totally destroy parental authority and influence. There never was a fretting parent, who often threatened, and seldom performed, that had a particle of efficient government. [E. D. Griffin.

HORRORS OF THE FINAL JUDGMENT.

And the gay glory of time shall depart; and sportful liberty shall be bound forever in the chain of obdurate necessity. The green earth with all her blooming beauty and bowers of peace shall depart. The morning and evening salutations of kinsmen shall depart; and the ever-welcome voice of friendship, and the tender whispering of full-hearted affection shall depart, for the sad discord of weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth. And the tender names of children, father and mother, wife and husband, with the communion of domestic love and mutual affection, and the inward touches of natural instinct—which family compact, when undivided by discord, wraps the livelong day into one swell of tender emotion, making earth's lowly scenes worthy of heaven itself; all, all shall pass away: and instead shall come the level lake that burneth, and the solitary dungeon, and the desolate bosom, and the throes and tossings of horror and hopelessness, and the worm that dieth not, and the fire that is not quenched.—Ed. Irving.

THE PERILS OF FALSEHOOD.—In the beautiful language of an eminent writer, "when once a concealment or deceit has been practiced in matters where all should be fair and open as the day, confidence can never be restored any more than you can restore the white bloom to the grape or plum, which you have once pressed in your hand." How true is this! and what a neglected truth by a great portion of mankind. Falsehood is not only one of the most humiliating vices, but sooner or later it is most certain to lead to many serious crimes. With partners in trade—with partners in life—with friends, with lovers, how important is confidence? How essential that all guile and hypocrisy should be guarded against in the intercourse between such parties? How much misery would be avoided in the history of many lives, had truth and sincerity been guiding and controlling motives, instead of prevarications and deceit? "Any vice," said a parent in our hearing, a few days since, "any vice, at least among the frailties of a milder character, but falsehood. Far better that my child should commit an error or do a wrong and confess it, than escape the penalty, however severe, by falsehood and hypocrisy. Let me know the worst, and a remedy may possibly be applied. But keep me in the dark—let me be misled or deceived, and it is impossible to tell at what unprepared hour a crushing blow—an overwhelming exposure, may come."

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, June 24, 1847.

THE "SABBATH DISCUSSION."

In our last it was remarked, in substance, that the day which God blessed and sanctified, was the very day in which he rested from all his works, and that the weekly return of the day became holy from that circumstance. If God did actually bless his own rest-day, as the Scriptures declare, then there is no getting clear of the inference that the Sabbath originated in Paradise, and all the suggestions of our opponents—offered, as they often are, with a great swaggering air of triumph—that there is no instance on record of the observance of the Sabbath from the Creation to the Exodus, are as foolish as they are irrelevant.

But we need not go beyond the limits of the fourth commandment itself to prove, that the Sabbath is an institution which concerns the whole race of mankind, and not the Jews only. The language of the commandment shows, that the Sabbath is a commemorative ordinance. That which it commemorates is a great fact, in which all men of all nations are as much interested as the Jews ever were. It commemorates the work of creation; and not merely the work itself, but the order and manner of the work as distributed over a period of six days, and succeeded by a rest on the seventh. Why this perfectly obvious character of the Sabbath is so little noticed by a large class of writers, or why it is that they make so little account of it, is to us most marvelous. Stop! Not so marvelous either. It is a "foregone conclusion" that the Sabbath is a Jewish institution; and who does not know how difficult it is for one who has prejudged a case, to see the force of truths which contradict his theory? But we do insist upon the commemorative character of the weekly rest, as its grand and primary feature. "Remember [commemorate] the Rest-day to keep it holy. Commemorate it, because in six days Jehovah made all things, and rested on the seventh. The Rest-day is therefore a holy day." We insist upon it, that we are as much the creatures of God, as the Jews. We insist upon it, that there is as much creative skill and power displayed in the structure of our bodies, and in the quality of our minds, as in the bodies and minds of the Jews. We insist, that the earth was made as much for us, as for them;—that the heavens were intended to be a canopy over our heads, as well as over theirs;—and that it was meant that we, as well as they, should "look through nature up to nature's God," and bless the love, and wisdom, and goodness inscribed upon all. And we challenge any man to find, in the condition of the Jews as the creatures of God, a reason why they should commemorate the great work of creation, which does not apply with equal force to us.

Now we have strangely mistaken the Book of God, and the rules of interpretation, if we are not bound to regard every precept, which that Book enjoins, so far as the reasons of the precept are applicable to us. It matters not whether such precept is in the Old Testament, or in the New;—whether it is in the Pentateuch, the Prophets, or the Evangelists;—whether spoken immediately to the Jews, or addressed to a Gentile church;—if the reasons of it apply to us, that is sufficient to show that it is our duty to obey. The mere fact, that the precept was originally addressed to the Jews, does not by any means limit its application to them. It might as well be argued, that the directions to the Corinthian Church about going to law with brethren, (1st Epist. chap. 6,) or about one having his father's wife, (chap. 5,) because addressed directly to that church, concerned nobody else. Whereas common sense, as well as every just principle of interpretation, suggests, that though addressed to the Corinthians in the first place, they are applicable in all other cases where the reasons are the same. So in reference to precepts spoken to the Jews;—we would not say that the Passover was binding upon any other people; because the reasons of the ordinance apply to no other. So of the Atonement day, the Feast of Tabernacles, circumcision, the ordinance of the red heifer, and generally of the whole Levitical service. But the Sabbath does not, nor can all "Indagator's" ingenuity make it, stand upon the same footing. A mere glance at the law enjoining it, shows that it is founded in a reason which just as much concerns all mankind, as it did those to whom it was immediately spoken; and this reason we are not left to excogitate by dint of our own hard thinking, but it is expressed fully, and without the least ambiguity, in the commandment itself. Who cares, then, whether the Sabbath appears any where else than in that body of laws which was given to the Jews at the mount, or not? Who cares whether any traces can be found of its actual observance from Adam to Moses? Who cares whether the withholding of the manna on the seventh day was the means of reviving the knowledge of it, or not? Who cares whether it is enjoined, in so many words, in the New Testament, or not? All this is nothing to the purpose. It is only necessary for us to ascertain whether the reasons for its observance are applicable to us; and having ascertained that—which we may do from the commandment itself—there is, or ought to be, the end of the controversy.

But will the controversy end there? No. It is a "foregone conclusion," that the Sabbath is an institution purely Jewish. "Indagator" has labored hard to uphold this popular dogma. We mean not any disparagement of his general candor by insinuating that he is more ready than others to prejudge a case; he is but one of ten thousand. But when we consider that the terms "Jewish Sabbath" and "Christian Sabbath" are stereotyped terms, and that every body hears them from his cradle, and grows up under the influence of the ideas they convey, it is next to impossible to find a man who has not prejudged this question, however candid in the main, and however acute his intellect. Even those who advocate the contradictory doctrine of the transfer of the Sabbath to the Sunday, are accustomed to mouth these terms, and think it quite an outrage upon orthodoxy to call them in question; and, notwithstanding the manful and praiseworthy efforts to oppose the doctrine which explodes the Sabbath in toto, they are themselves—by reason of their determination to make the observance of the "seventh day" a Judaizing practice—more than half under the influence of the sentiments they condemn.

"E. W. D." has acquitted himself well in his resistance of the pernicious doctrine of his opponent. Nobody could have done better, trammeled by such an interpretation of the fourth commandment as he avowed at the outset. "Indagator" also acquitted himself well; and, but for his error in ascribing the origin of the Sabbath to the transaction in the wilderness, and in considering it an institution exclusively for the Jews, might have done still better. Both disputants evince much strength of intellect; we hope their strength may yet be enlisted in the cause of truth. We did not mean to devote so much time to the consideration of the notion, which dates the Sabbath at the withholding of the manna; but, as it is the main pillar of the system espoused by "Indagator," our prolixity is, perhaps, not out of place. In a future number, we shall examine the "Discussion" still farther. *

CENTRAL SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.

The Central Seventh-day Baptist Association held its Twelfth Anniversary with the 3d Church in Brookfield, on the 4th, 5th and 6th days of the week, June 9th, 10th and 11th. The introductory discourse was preached by Eld. G. M. Langworthy, from 1 Cor. 15: 58—"Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." After preaching, the Association was called to order by the Recording Secretary, and a Committee appointed to nominate officers. Adjourned for half an hour.

Met pursuant to adjournment, and appointed James Bailey, Moderator, and Gurdon Evans and A. L. Saunders, Secretaries.

After reading the letters from the various churches, and appointing the usual standing committees, proceeded to the hearing of communications. Interesting reports were received from the Home Missionaries of the Association, one from James Bailey as agent to the Legislature of this State, and one from Eli S. Bailey as Corresponding Secretary, in reletion to correspondence between him and Wm. M. Fahnestock and S. Davison, all of which was approved. A Select Committee was appointed to take into consideration the communication from Wm. M. Fahnestock, the report from the agent to Albany, and the whole matter of Sabbath Legislation. A. L. Saunders, James Bailey, O. P. Hull, James H. Cochran, and G. M. Langworthy were that committee. The following is their report, which was adopted:

Whereas, W. M. Fahnestock, in behalf of the German Sabbath-keepers in Penn., asks through our Corresponding Secretary assistance in bearing the burden of carrying the case that is now pending in the highest Court of that State, and in which Sabbath-keepers generally in the Union are alike interested, to the Supreme Court of the United States, should the case (as it probably will) be decided against them where it is now pending; therefore, Resolved, That we approve of the encouragement given by our Corresponding Secretary, and recommend to the churches comprising this body to take the subject into prayerful consideration, and contribute according to the necessities of the case and their several abilities, when they shall be informed that the case is before the Supreme Court of the United States. And with reference to the matter of Sabbath legislation, we recommend—1st. The vigorous prosecution of our claims for religious toleration before the Legislature of this State. 2d. In furtherance of this object, we recommend that the members of the churches composing this Association be requested to use their influence to secure the election of members of the Legislature who shall pledge themselves to use their utmost exertions to obtain our constitutional rights. 3d. We would recommend that the address which Bro. James Bailey presented to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, be published, in a cheap form, and circulated extensively among our first-day friends, so that they may understand the reasonableness of our claims and be induced to sign our petitions and give us their influence in furtherance of our object. 4th. We would also recommend that the churches be earnestly requested to continue their exertions to circulate petitions, and forward them to the Legislature at its next session. 5th. We recommend that a committee of three be appointed to correspond with members of the next Legislature, to urge upon their attention our claims and constitutional rights.

Brethren R. G. Burdick, O. P. Hull, David Maxson, and A. L. Saunders, were appointed delegates to the Western Association; and E. S. Bailey, Wm. B. Maxson, and James R. Irish, were appointed as delegates to the next session of the Missionary Association, with instructions to make an effort to get the constitution so amended as to remove the objection to our becoming auxiliary to that body.

The following are some of the resolutions which were adopted:

Resolved, That the Constitution of the Association be so amended as to constitute its standing officers, together with those other brethren who shall be appointed annually, an Executive Committee for transacting and carrying into execution the business of the Asscciation during the intervals between its meetings.

Resolved, That this Association recommend that each church take up a semi-annual collection for home missionary purposes; and that their pastors and preachers call their attention to this work semi-annually.

Resolved, That Eld. R. G. Burdick be appointed to labor as a missionary during the coming year at Pinckney and vicinity, Diana and vicinity, and Philadelphia and vicinity.

Resolved, That this Association recommend to each church to take up a monthly collection for the support of the foreign mission.

The following resolutions were submitted by the Business Committee, and after animated discussion were unanimously adopted:—

1. Resolved, That we do not regard the late decision of the Legislature upon the license question as evidence that legal means should not be used for the advancement of the temperance cause, but that it is our duty, as Christians, to persevere in our efforts till the traffic in intoxicating liquors, and the practice of dram-drinking, be banished from our land.

This resolution was advocated by Eli S. Bailey, James H. Cochran, and L. Cottrell.

2. Resolved, That to give our influence and support to the sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage, is to give our influence and support to the wretchedness, misery, and crime arising from their use, and that such acts should not be suffered to tarnish the character of church members.

Sustained by V. Hull, J. D. F. Randolph, G. M. Langworthy, and James H. Cochran.

3. Resolved, That this Association deprecate the unchristian principles which have thrust this nation into war with Mexico, and that we deeply deplore the principles and evils of war.

Advocated by E. S. Bailey, A. L. Saunders, O. P. Hull, James H. Cochran, G. Evans, and R. G. Burdick.

4. Resolved, That in view of the antichristian nature and tendencies of Secret Societies, we advise our brethren to have no connection or fellowship with them.

Sustained by S. B. Crandall, Gurdon Evans, James Bailey, L. Cottrell, J. D. F. Randolph, and James H. Cochran.

5. Whereas, American Slavery is incompatible with the principles of the gospel, opposed to the law of God, and consequently subversive of morality and destructive to the true interests of the church; therefore, Resolved, That this Association deem it their duty, as Christians and philanthropists, to enter a solemn protest against the sin of slaveholding as it now exists in these United States; and we believe it to be the duty of Christians to separate themselves from all connection with the system, and to labor in all proper and reasonable ways for its speedy and total overthrow.

This resolution was sustained by V. Hull, O. P. Hull, P. B. Burch, and A. L. Saunders.

The Association adjourned to meet on the fourth day before the second Sabbath in June, 1848, with the church in Lincklaen, Chenango County.

Religious Exercises.

On Sabbath morning, a Missionary Discourse was preached by Eld. James H. Cochran, from 2 Cor. 14: 15—"For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead. And that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him who died for them and rose again;" after which a collection was taken up for the foreign mission of $26 05. Preaching in the afternoon by Eld. Charles M. Lewis, from Rom. 6: 1—"What shall we say then? Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? God forbid. How shall we that are dead to sin live any longer therein?"

J. B. W.

Southern Baptist Foreign Missions.—The Southern Baptist Board of Foreign Missions met at Savannah, Ga., May 14. The Annual Report presented on that occasion stated that since the last meeting, four male and two female missionaries have been appointed to China, and two to Africa (both colored.) The only station at present occupied by the Board in China is Canton, where there are four preachers, two of whom have wives, and five native assistants, making eleven in all. But the Board has determined to have a station at Shanghai, in the northern part of China, and has sent out three missionaries, with their wives, to occupy that station. The population of Shanghai is estimated at 200,000. From the Treasurer's Report we learn that the balance on hand at the close of the last year was $9,504 13, and that the receipts during the year have amounted to $17,965 69—making a total of $27,469 82. More than one quarter of the money contributed during the year was from Virginia.

Interesting Scene.—A scene rivaling in interest those of "old time," was witnessed not long ago in one of the Swiss Cantons. On the 11th and 12th of November, 1845, nearly two hundred and fifty of the pastors and licentiates connected with the Reformed Evangelical Church of Vaud—being almost the whole of the ministry belonging to that Canton—assembled at Lausanne, and, after serious and prayerful deliberation, unanimously agreed to sever the ties that bound them to the State, which virtually required the renunciation of their Divine Head, the Lord Jesus Christ, and the surrender to the civil magistrate of their most cherished spiritual immunities.

Peace Prayer Day.—The New School Presbyterian General Assembly, at the recent meeting in Cincinnati, passed a resolution recommending the churches composing that body to observe the second Sunday in July, as a day of prayer, in view of the war existing between this country and Mexico, and also recommending to the ministers to preach on that day a sermon on the subject of peace.

A Good Deed of the Pope.—Among the many good things which have been said about the liberality and piety of the present Pope of Rome, no one has pleased us so well as the following, from the London News. It seems that on the 5th of May, being the feast of St. Pius, whose best achievement (his bringing about the battle of Lepanto) once rescued the south of Europe, great doings were planned to honor the name in the person of its present possessor, who bids fair to effect a similar European rescue. Hearing of these projects (for strict orders are issued to inform him of every matter) our monarch at once intimated his wish that the waste of blue lights and Roman candles should be superseded by a general distribution of bread. To wish is to be obeyed. Sixty gentlemen met immediately at the Doria palace, organized themselves for a combined effort among the affluent, and each member cheerfully climbed the stairs of the palaces allotted him in quest of donations; 7,000 dollars were quickly forthcoming, and 60,000 bread tickets put in circulation. The remnant is kept to establish an infant school.

CHURCH AND STATE.

The evils growing out of a union between the Church and the State, are beginning to be freely discussed in England. A series of lectures was recently delivered in Norwich, at the conclusion of which a public meeting was held, and it was unanimously resolved, That the establishment or endowment by the State of any religious sect, is unscriptural, unjust, and inexpedient; That the adoption of compulsory means for the maintainance of religion, implies a distrust of its inherent power and energy, a disregard of the principles and practices of the apostolic churches, and an ignorance of the fact that Christianity flourished most where all secular power was opposed to it, and its sole earthly support was the free will of the people; That the alliance between the Church and the State has subverted the independence of the Church; That the most sacred calling is openly made a matter of bargain and sale; That these and many other gross abuses arise entirely out of the connection between the Church and the State; and that the only sufficient remedy for all these evils and inconsistencies, is to be found in the entire abandonment by the State of all interference with the religion of the people. The promulgation of such sentiments, which are every day becoming more popular in England, must sooner or later bring about the happiest results. Even in our own country, although the theory is generally approved, there is yet much occasion to urge its practical application.

THE CHRISTIAN CHRONICLE—AGAIN.

Much against our inclination, and without any previous suspicion of such a thing, we are threatened with a war of words about the "almost discussion" between the Christian Chronicle and the Catholic Herald. The last number of the Chronicle contains an article, more than a column and a half long, upon the subject. If we could learn from it exactly what the editor wants, we would gladly fulfill his largest desire, so far as it could be done consistently with truth. But as we are not sure that we have learned definitely what he wants, we will state in few words just how the matter strikes us, and hope that will end the controversy. Many weeks ago, the editor of the Catholic Herald published an article in which he expressed the opinion that "all consistent Protestants should be Sabbatarians." To this the editor of the Christian Chronicle replied, that "the Herald probably had not examined the question in regard to the Sabbath and the Lord's Day very fully, or he would hardly have affirmed so confidently, that the absence of express authority in Holy Scripture for the change, would compel all consistent Protestants to become Sabbatarians." The editor of the Herald, in his next paper, referred to this subject, and said of the editor of the Chronicle, "His strictures have left us in doubt as to the ground on which he advocates the abolition of the Jewish Sabbath, and the institution of Sunday in its place; and as this is the main point, we must be fully enlightened in regard to it, before we can attempt a reply. We must therefore inquire, whether he professes to find in the Holy Scriptures alone a sufficient warrant for the change?" Now we, the editor of the Sabbath Recorder, alluding to the discussion, ventured to say, "To the above question, the editor of the Christian Chronicle has not deigned to reply." For that remark—together with another in the same paragraph, suggesting the probability that he 'hoped the matter would blow over'—the editor of the Chronicle takes us in hand. He seems to claim that an article in his paper of March 17 was a reply to the Herald's question, and that, therefore, our assertion was false; yet he does not say so, and, although we have read this article carefully for that express object, we can not find in it any attempt to answer the question. So that we remain just as much as ever in the dark respecting "the grounds upon which he advocates the abolition of the Jewish Sabbath, and the institution of Sunday in its place." In such circumstances, we ask, What more can we say than we have already said, namely, that the Editor of the Chronicle has not yet replied to the Herald's question? No doubt it would be very gratifying to the editor in question to have us say that we were mistaken; but he should remember, that we have something else to consult besides his gratification. When we have made a very plain assertion, it is our business to defend it—not half a dozen new issues which he may see fit to set up. This is our reason for dismissing the subject here, instead of expending more words upon the irrelevant matter which his last article contains.

"Once a Priest, always a Priest."—A curious case has recently occurred in France, showing how thoroughly this dogma is believed and acted upon by the civil as well as the ecclesiastical authorities of that country. Mr. Vignaud, formerly Romish priest of the congregation at La Croix, had resigned his office some years ago, and he became a Protestant. He was about to marry and legitimate the offspring of a former connection. The bans were published; but the Attorney General protested, declaring that his priestly consecration was a hindrance to marriage forever. The lower court refused the protest of the attorney general, but the higher court reversed the sentence. The case came next before the court of Cassation at Paris, which declared the canon of the law to be binding, and a Romish priest unable to enter marriage.

Jewish Mercy.—A correspondent of the National Era, gives some account of a visit to Albany to solicit the interposition of the Governor to prevent the vile uses made of certain Maryland laws by New York policemen. He says that, having occasion to solicit the coöperation of certain individuals concerned, the most merciful of them were Jews! "Under the influence of those Christian prejudices instilled into my mind from infancy, I had felt disposed to pass them by; but I finally concluded to approach them as men. I did so, with the result stated—a result which may be profitably pondered by those who may have erroneously inferred, from a single act committed by some of the progenitors of this despied people, that they are not naturally actuated by the same impulses as Christians."

Insane Asylum at Providence, R. I.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune says that the edifice of the Butler Asylum for the Insane is nearly completed. It will be ready for occupation before the close of the year. It is an immense pile, covering, including the courts, we should think about an acre. The style is a sort of mixture of the castellated Gothic and Lombard. All the windows are ornamented and strengthened with facings of freestone. The halls and passages are airy and ample, and the whole arrangement is on an improved plan. Dr. Ray, the Superintendent, is a gentleman of experience in the economy of such benevolent establishments, and his judgment in matters thereto pertaining is, doubtless, worthy of all confidence.

German Protestant Seminary.—The New York Tribune recently stated that a clergyman by the name of Zimmerman, expected to sail soon from Switzerland for New York with his family. He proposes to buy a large tract of land in one of the Western States, Wisconsin or Iowa, as the locality of a German Protestant Seminary, combined with an agricultural school. The intention of the establishment is to provide the Germans who reside in the far west, with clergymen and school teachers. Next spring several others are to follow, who are to be connected with the Institution. It is a purely private enterprise, and will be richly supported by the Gustavus-Adolphus Union and Basle Missionary Society.

Expensive Churches.—The New York correspondent of the Puritan says that the bills toward building the Trinity Church have all been computed, and the cost is found to be $358,630. The Church of the Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, has just been opened for inspection, after the same style as Trinity, New York, but perhaps its finish is more elegant and graceful; perhaps it will cost about one-half as much, and is owned wholly by one man. The steeple is to be 275 feet high, that it may be higher than the Trinity of New York, which is now said to be the highest object in the United States, being 264 feet.

Sandwich Islands.—The general letter from this mission, being a review of the affairs of the mission for the year, states that the whole number of natives received into the churches from the commencement of the mission, is 33,198; of these 5,565 have died, and about the same number are under censure; making the present number of church members in regular standing nearly 23,000; the number admitted during the past year is 1,789. The progress of the islanders in general civilization is steady, and their improvement within the past 25 years is believed to be without parallel in the history of the world. Special religious influences still continue to be enjoyed. The seminary for boys at Lahainaiuna, and a district under the charge of Rev. Mr. Hunt, are particularly mentioned as having recently experienced special divine influences.

Spirit of the Age.—The receipts of benevolent societies, as reported during the Anniversary week in New York, were as follows:—Board of Missions of the Presbyterian Church $95,682; American and Foreign Bible Society $31,739; Seamen's Friend Society, $17,515; American Anti-Slavery Society $8,797; American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society $12,635; New York Colonization Society $5,813; Foreign Evangelical Society $14,820; American Baptist Home Missionary Society $30,794; Female Moral Reform Society $6,693; American Tract Society $160,150; American Home Missionary Society $119,453; American Bible Society $210,386; Society for Relief of Jews $6,690; American Temperance Union $1,522; American Protestant Society $19,709.

From Burmah.—The New York Recorder has received from Burmah the interesting intelligence, that fourteen hundred converts, in the field of Rev. Mr. Abbott's labors, are waiting for baptism.

General Intelligence.

WAR NEWS.

The war news for a week past, may be summed up in few words. Gen. Scott has gone to Puebla, where he will be able to concentrate a force of about 6,000 men. Gen. Taylor seems to be standing nearly still, which he is compelled to do on account of the number of volunteers leaving the army at the expiration of the time for which they enlisted. The fever at Vera Cruz is increasing, and there is more or less sickness among all our troops. There is much trouble in the city of Mexico to elect a President. Santa Anna is said to have been elected, but declined. Other reports say Herrera has been elected. The opinion of the ~~captured Mexi~~can officers, particularly La Vega, is that there is little or no prospect of immediate peace. They assert, that Mexico will not make peace so long as the Americans have a hostile foot this side of the Nueces.

SIXTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

By the steamship Cambria, which arrived at Boston on Thursday last, European news to June 4th was received.

The price of Flour and Grain has fallen considerably since last advices, a result which is attributed to the unusual fineness of the weather, promising a favorable home harvest. There is a report of the partial failure of the potato crop both in Ireland and Jersey, but the report does not seem to be fully credited. The Cotton market has improved since last advices. The financial prospects of England are represented as animating.

This arrival brings intelligence of the death of two distinguished individuals—Daniel O'Connell of Ireland, and Rev. Dr. Chalmers of Scotland.

Mr. O'Connell died at Genoa on the 15th of May. His health, which had been feeble for a long time, was decidedly worse for several days previous to the 15th of May, in consequence of congestion of the brain, of which he died. He was attended by his son, several Catholic clergymen, and other friends. His heart is to be embalmed, placed in a silver urn, and deposited at Rome. His body is to be embalmed and conveyed to Ireland. His son, John O'Connell, is appointed his successor in the Repeal Camp. At the funeral of O'Connell, at Genoa, which was celebrated with great pomp, the United States Consul appeared in his official costume, and the Consuls of the other nations, except England, were present.

Dr. Chalmers died at his residence at Mooningside, near Edinburgh, very suddenly, and unattended by any person in his last moments. He went to church on Sunday, the 30th ult., and retired to bed in the evening apparently in good health, and on Monday morning, the 31st, he was found dead in his bed by a servant. It is supposed that the cause of his sudden decease was an apoplectic stroke. He was in his sixty-seventh year. It is stated that a very great sensation was created throughout Edinburgh when this melancholy intelligence became known. "It was like a shock which seemed to electrify the public feeling! It was generally felt," says the Edinburgh Advertiser, "that an eminent character, a renowned master in Israel, had been cut off; that a champion had fallen, whose name, for the last thirty years, had filled so prominent a space in our ecclesiastical annals." The North British Mail says that he has been justly extolled as the most distinguished and able of Scottish divines. His works fill twenty-five volumes. Dr. Chalmers has left a widow and six daughters, two of whom are married. The Mail remarks, that Dr. Chalmers' reputation was European; he was universally beloved as well as admired; and will be followed to the grave by the tears of his country and the world.

The eldest son of Jerome Bonaparte has just died at Florence. It would appear that the French Government had denied him permission to proceed to the waters of Vernet, near the Pyrenees, from which, at the beginning of his illness, he might have derived benefit.

A letter from Leeds, gives an account of an explosion of fire damp which recently took place about two miles from that town. The explosion was of a very terrific character, and resulted in the death of nine human beings, the serious injury of another, and the destruction of much of the property used in the working of the mine.

Speaking of the Irish emigrants to the United States, the Tyrawley Herald says: "Already have the best and wealthiest portion of our farmers departed from our shores, and those who have at all the means at their command, are fast preparing to follow them. To some persons, this system of emigration may appear as calculated to lessen the evils which press on the country, as it will diminish the amount of the population, but it will not be attended with any good consequence. On the contrary, its effects will be found to be most injurious, for the persons thus emigrating are the very bone and sinew of the land, the men who alone were able to cultivate the farms and to give employment to laborers.

The emigration from Germany to the United States continues on a truly gigantic scale. It will this year far exceed that of any previous year.

The collection for the relief of the suffering Scotch and Irish amounts to $7,523 in Western India alone. The natives have shown a deep interest in the calamity, and contributed liberally to the fund.

The latest intelligence from Hong Kong is to the 30th of March. At Canton the heat had been oppressive, and the residents were engaging houses for the summer at Macao. It was said that Sir John Davis would proceed north in her Majesty's steamer Vulture, and that he would visit Pekin, having power to treat for the prevention of riots at Canton. After leaving Pekin he was to visit Japan, and endeavor to open a trade with that country.

Disaster at the Sault St. Marie.—A letter from the Editor of the N. Y. Tribune, dated at Sault St. Marie, June 11, says:—"A fearful casualty took place here yesterday—namely, the upsetting of a row-boat in passing down the rapids, and the drowning of three of the nine men who embarked in her. One of them was Dr. Hugh T. Prouty, of Norwalk, Ohio, here on a tour of observation, accompanied by his wife, leaving several children at home to mourn their sudden bereavement. Thomas Riches, Engineer of the Propeller Independence on Lake Superior, was another; and William Flynn, an intelligent and worthy laboring man, was the third. Among those who narrowly escaped death was Mr. Seymour, who represented this County in the last Legislature of Michigan. He had sunk, to rise no more when an Indian who was fishing in the rapids, seeing a man's body at the bottom of a lucid pool, seized a boat-hook and drew him up. The others generally preserved themselves till assistance could arrive by clinging to an oar or the capsized boat. The bodies of the three who were drowned have not been recovered.

Trophy of War.—A correspondent of the Auburn Advertiser, writing from Vera Cruz, gives the following graphic account of an incident in the capture of that town. One such scene is enough to fill the land with mourning:

"During my peregrinations I came to a lofty and noble mansion in which a terrible bomb had exploded, and laid the whole front of the house in ruins. While I was examining the awful havoc created, a beautiful girl of some seventeen years, came to the door and invited me into the house. She pointed to the furniture of the mansion torn into fragments, and the piles of rubbish lying around, and with her beautiful eyes filled with tears, informed me that the bomb had destroyed her father, mother, brother, and two little sisters, and that she was now left in the world alone!"

Curious Discovery.—In digging on Tuesday, among the foundations of Grace Church, at the corner of Broadway and Rector-st. which has recently been pulled down, a coffin, apparently of silver, was discovered, about two feet and a half in length, containing the body of a female child, with an inscription bearing date 1767. The coffin had a glass over the face, and a little farther down on the coffin a looking-glass set in the metal. Near the foot of the coffin was an aperture closed by a glass stopper, which being opened it appeared that the coffin was filled with spirits of turpentine, in which the body was preserved, so that the features, though somewhat collapsed, were seen through the glass. The whole was enclosed in a strong deal outer coffin. [Eve. Post.

Anti-Slavery in France.—The Christian Secretary says that recent intelligence from Europe represents the tide of anti-slavery feeling in France as rapidly swelling, and already does it wear a formidable aspect. A very able and spirited debate sprung up in the Chamber of Deputies not long since, in which strong anti-slavery speeches were made by several distinguished members. These speeches were highly spoken of by the better class of French papers. Petitions for the immediate abolition of slavery in the French colonies were signed by upwards of 11,000 persons, among whom were some of the most eminent of the clergy, magistrates, merchants and others.

SUMMARY.

The accounts from Grosse Isle, the quarantine ground, 30 miles below Quebec," are of the most alarming description—nearly 2,000 emigrants have died either on the passage out or at the quarantine station, and typhus fever of the most malignant kind is raging at Grosse Isle. The Quebec correspondent of the Montreal Herald had ascertained, that, up to the 5th inst. 600 Roman Catholics and 75 Protestants, had been buried at Grosse Isle; that 1,300 lay sick in the churches, shops, and tents, and that 12,000 persons were in the ships at anchor there.

The English have discovered a new object for importation. The natives of Australia have magnificent teeth which they are willing to part with for mere trifles, as handkerchiefs, knives, or other things of like value. An English merchant in Australia has entered largely into this speculation, having sent several boxes of human teeth to London, where they have been eagerly bought up by the dentists.

A letter received from the Army in Mexico furnishes an account of the late duel between Lieut. Mumford, of Carrington's Company, and Lieut. Mahan, both of Virginia. They fought with muskets. Both were wounded at the first fire, Mumford receiving seven buck-shot. Mahan's friends have three letters, written on the evening of the duel, (21st May,) when both were living, but not expected to recover.

A London paper has matured a plan by which it proposes in future to avoid railway collisions. It advises that an iron chair be constructed directly in front of the locomotive, and that one of the directors should sit therein on every trip. It thinks this patent railway buffer will effect the desired object.

Rev. J. J. Green, of the Sandwich Islands, has, we learn, in preparation, and designes to publish, if spared to forward to the United States, in the course of 1847, "The Life and Times of Bartimeus Puceaiki, the Blind Hawaiian Preacher, with a Sketch of the Sandwich Islands, their state, &c., up to this date."

By New-Orleans Picayune and Delta Extras, issued at noon, 9th inst. we have particulars of a dreadful explosion which occurred on board the steamer Eda, 4th inst., in the Ouchita river. Twenty-five persons were killed and eight wounded.

Old Parr died at the age of 152 years, leaving the following excellent advice to posterity: "Keep your cool by temperance—your feet warm by exercise, and if you are inclined to grow fat, keep your eyes open and your mouth shut."

The English shipbuilders are beginning to use mahogany instead of East India teak. The present low price of the former is caused by the extensive use of other woods, as black walnut, oak, &c., in the manufacture of cabinet ware.

A man calling himself Herr Ryninger undertook to walk across the Schuylkill on a wire, below and parallel with the suspension bridge at Philadelphia. The wire was stretched about 25 or 30 feet above the water, and a vast crowd assembled to witness the feat. The first time, the wire broke when he was a third of the way over and gave him a ducking. He tried again and had nearly reached the opposite side when he fell off into the water, striking his shoulder against a boat as he fell, and injuring himself severely. This ended the sport.

A man and his wife in Rochester, lately undertook to see who could do the most breaking. He commenced with a teacup and she followed with a saucer, and between them they smashed up all the crockery, and household furniture in the house. The woman thought she had the worst end of the bargain and entered a complaint at the police office, but the magistrate decided that it was a draw game, and sent the parties home to ruminate on their broken furniture.

Eight or ten years ago the Marquis Daligre of Paris, calculating that he should live to the age of 150, deposited with the New York Life Insurance Co., the Farmer's Trust, and the Ohio Trust, $100,000 each, from which he realized a life annuity of $49,200. He has died at the age of 83, and of course the above companies are immense gainers, making from $25,000 to $50,000 apiece.

It is stated in the English papers, as an almost nnaccountable fact, that, while the distress in Ireland was at its height, the deposits in the Savings Banks in that country were larger than they had ever been before. A similar increase is also observable in the receipts into the treasury of the United Kingdom.

While a party of friends were recently passing through a wood in Glenville, near Schenectady, a root, mistaken for "spignet," was pulled up near a creek, and eaten, which caused the death of a young lady named Elizabeth A. Boyer. The action was so sudden and violent as to produce death before medical aid could be procured.

The following appears in a Scotch paper:—"Abstinence.—A gentleman, addicted to intemperance, will be received as a boarder in a genteel family, in the country, where efforts, successful in the reformation of others, will be used for his."

A collision took place upon Lake Erie, near Conneaut, Ohio, between a steamer and a schooner. Both were sunk, and the engineer of the steamboat and thirteen others were missing, and were supposed to be lost.

A Mr. Holmes of Moscow, N. Y., has at length perfected a metallic hub, spoke and rim, carriage or wagon wheel. by bracing the spokes in two rows on the hub, which is in two parts, a cylinder, in which the spoke is screwed or rivited and the axle sheeted. The spoke is also rivited or screwed into the rim.

The following from the Picayune speaks for itself: "The parting scene between the Mississippi Regiment and Gen. Taylor, we are told, was affecting in the extreme. As the men marched by him to return to their homes, overpowered with the recollection of the high deeds which had endeared them to him, and, with their demonstrations of respect and affection, he attempted in vain to address them. With tears streaming down his furrowed cheeks, all he could say was, 'Go on, boys—I can't speak.'"

There appears to be considerable fog about the matter of the Watertown Bank. A letter from that place states that the Bank had been enjoined, and the Watertown Journal states the same fact, while the Albany Evening Journal says: "We are authorized to say that the Exchange Bank of this city has regularly redeemed, and will continue to redeem, the notes of the Bank of Watertown."

DIED,

At Ephrata, Pa., on Sabbath. the 12th inst., Mrs. Margaret Konigmacher, wife of Benjamin Konigmacher, Esq.

The day previous to the departure of our much-beloved sister, (an aged member of the German Seventh-day Baptist Society,) she enjoyed a comfortable degree of health; was unusually cheerful; walked about the garden with delight, admiring the rich productions of a bountiful Providence; ate her supper with customary relish; spent the evening very pleasantly in conversation with a friend; retired at nine o'clock, and talked with her two daughters until a late hour. During the night she was seized with paralysis, became insensible instantly, and expired the following afternoon, without, apparently, suffering any pain whatever.

In this afflictive dispensation of the Arbiter of Life and Death, the remnant of the little flock at Ephrata, has sustained a severe, an irreparable loss. She was truly a Mother in Israel—one, who, for many years, adorned the doctrine of God her Saviour; was a living epistle known and read of all men—a pattern of unostentatious piety and Christian gentleness. Ripe in years and ripe in the graces of the Spirit, she waited, patiently, for the coming of the Master, to be transplanted into the Paradise of God.

But few persons' walk in life is characterized by such uniform, prudent deportment and conciliatory manners, as to win the warmest affections of all within their immediate circle, and end their pilgrimage on earth with the universal esteem of the whole community in which they reside; which it was the happy lot of our departed sister to enjoy in a pre-eminent degree, and to an unlimited extent, for an uninterrupted period of upwards of three score years and ten. Of her it may be justly said:

None knew her, but to love;
None nam'd her, but to praise.

A VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

• Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold th reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; a number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

SAMUEL RUSSELL,
President of the Board of Trustees.

Alfred, June 23, 1846.

Miscellaneous.

I AM COLD.

A stricken mother weeps;
She bends in anguish o'er him,
To watch him as he sleeps.
Dropping a tear unwilling,
He starts—that buy once bold—
"Is this you, my mother?
Dear mother—I am cold."

"Oh mother, I am aching,
Do take me to your heart;
I cannot keep from crying,
The tear-drops fast will start.
I am not easy now, mother;
The blanket closer fold;
Tell me, oh! what can it mean?
Do warm me; I am cold!"

"Where is my father, mother?
And where is sister dear?
Both gone! oh! how, my mother!
I wish that they were here.
Give sister all my playthings,
Tell them all I have told,—
I am tired of talking now,
And oh! so very cold!

"Once, mother, I was naughty,
And once I told a lie;
Will God—will God forgive it,
And take me to the sky?
Once more, once more, dear mother,
Your arms around me fold;
Kiss me again upon my lips;
I'm very, very cold.

"I love the birds, the flowers;
Dear mother, must I die?
Have I been good, my mother?
Shall I live with God on high?
O tell me, shall I live there
Till I grow large and old?
Mother, I must be dying,
I am so dreadful cold."

That eye has lost its brightness,
The oil which fed it, dry—
The silken fringes softly fell,
And now how still they lie!
That boy, the brightest dew drop
E'er loaned to human mould,
To earth he's lost forever,
For there he lies, death cold.

She tries to bow submissive,
But hope has lost its hold;
This world, this world is nothing;
In death her child is cold.
Oh mother! cease thy moaning;
This lamb of Jesus' fold
Will warm him in Christ's bosom,
And there forget his cold. [Neal's Sat. Gaz.

THE ORPHAN BOY.

"He faded, yet so calm and meek,
So gently wan, so sweetly weak."

The bustle of the fight was over; the prisoners had been secured, and the decks washed down, and the schooner had once more relapsed into midnight quiet and repose. I sought my hammock, and soon fell asleep. But my slumbers were disturbed by wild dreams, which, like the visions of a fever, agitated and unnerved me; the late strife, the hardships of my early life, and a thousand other things mingled together as figures on a phantasmagoria. Suddenly a hand was laid on my shoulder, and starting up I beheld the surgeon's mate.

"Little Dick, sir, is dying," he said.

At once I sprang from my hammock. Little Dick was a sort of protege of mine. He was a pale delicate child, said to be an orphan, and used to nature; and from the first hour I joined the schooner my heart yearned for him, for I too had once been friendless and alone in the world. He had often talked to me in confidence, of his mother, whose memory he regarded with holy reverence, while to the other boys of the ship he had little to say; for they were rude and coarse, he delicate and sensitive. Often, when they jeered him for his melancholy, he would go apart by himself and weep. He never complained of his lot, though his companions imposed on him continually. Poor lad! his heart was in the grave with his lost parents. I took a strange interest in him, and had lightened his task as much as possible. During the late fight I had owed my life to him, for he rushed in just as a sabre stroke was leveled at me; and by interposing his feeble cutlass had averted the deadly blow. In the hurry and confusion since, I had quite forgotten to inquire if he was hurt, though, at the time, I inwardly resolved to use all my little influence to procure him a midshipman's warrant in requital for his service. It was with a pang of reproachful agony, therefore, that I leaped to my feet—

"My God!" I exclaimed, "you don't mean it? He is not dying?"

"I fear, sir," said the messenger, shaking his head sadly, "that he cannot live till morning."

"And I have been lying idle here!" I exclaimed with remorse. "Lead me to him!"

"He is delirious, but in the intervals of lunacy he asks for you, sir," and as the man spoke, we stood beside the bedside of the dying boy.

The sufferer did not lie in his usual hammock, for it was hung in the very midst of the crew, and the close air around it was too stifling; but he had been carried under the open hatchway, and laid there in a little open space of about 4 feet square. From the sound of the ripples, I judged the schooner was in motion, while the clear, calm blue sky seen through the opening overhead, and dotted with myriads of stars, betokened that the fog had broken away. How calm it smiled down on the face of the dying boy. Occasionally a light current of wind—oh! how deliciously cool and refreshing in that pent up hold—eddied down the hatchway, and lifted the dark chestnut locks of the sufferer, as, with his head reposing in the lap of an old veteran, he lay in an unquiet slumber. His shirt collar was unbuttoned, and his childish bosom, as white as that of a girl, was open and exposed. He breathed quick and heavily. The wound of which he was dying had been intensely painful, but within the last half hour, had somewhat lulled, though even now his thin fingers tightly grasped the bedclothes, as if he suffered the greatest agony.

A battle-stained and gray-haired seaman stood beside him, holding a dull lantern in his hand, gazing sorrowfully down upon the sufferer. The surgeon felt with his finger on the boy's pulse. As I approached they all looked up. The veteran who held him shook his head, and would have spoken, but the tears gathered too chokingly in his eyes.

The surgeon said—

"He is going fast—poor little fellow—do you see this?" as he spoke he lifted up a rich gold locket, which had lain upon the boy's breast. "He has seen better days."

I could not answer, for my heart was full—here was the being to whom, but a few hours before, I had owed my life—a poor, slight, unprotected child—lying before me, with death already written on his brow—and yet I had never known his danger, and never sought him out after the conflict. How bitterly my heart reproached me in that hour. They noticed my agitation, and his old friend, the seaman that held up his head, said sadly,

"Poor little Dick—you'll never see the shore you have wished for so long. But there'll be more than one, when your log's out," he spoke with emotion—"to mourn over you."

Suddenly the little fellow opened his eyes, and looked vacantly around.

"Has he come yet?" he asked, in a low voice. "Why won't he come?"

"I am here," said I, taking the little fellow's hand, "don't you know me, Dick?"

He smiled faintly in my face. He then said, "You have been kind to me, sir—kinder than most people are to a poor orphan boy. I have no way to show my gratitude—unless you will take the Bible you will find in my trunk. It's a small offering, I know, but it's all I have."

I burst into tears; he resumed,

"Doctor, I am dying, ain't I?" said the little fellow, "for my sight grows dim. God bless you, Mr. Danforth."

"Can I do nothing for you, Dick?" said I; "you saved my life. I would coin my blood to buy yours."

"I have nothing to ask—I don't wan't to live—only, if it's possible, let me be buried by my mother—you will find the name of the place, and all about it in my trunk."

"Anything—everything, my poor lad," I answered, chokingly.

The little fellow smiled faintly—it was like an angel's smile—but he did not answer. His eyes were fixed on the stars flickering in that patch of blue sky overhead. His mind wandered.

"It's a long—long ways up there—but there are bright angels among them. Mother used to say that I would meet her there. How near they come, and I can see sweet faces smiling on me from among them. Hark! is that music?" and lifting his finger, he seemed listening for a moment. He fell back, and the old veteran burst into tears. The child was dead. Did he indeed hear angel's voices? God grant it.

THIEF OF GENIUS.

Two young men of fashion, were lately in the saloon of a hair dresser at Paris, one waiting while the other's moustache was receiving its utmost capable. During the 'hands off' of the artistic caiffuer, the gentleman in the chair maintained a broken conversation with his friend, between the questions and answers of which, it was developed that he had just received the pay of a gambling debt, of two thousand francs, the solid tin, he added, being at that moment comfortably asleep in the drawer of his secretary, minus only the small sum taken from it for that day's amusement. The two friends then discussed their plans for that day's diversion, by which it became apparent that they would not be at their respective domicils till the "single hours" proper for bachelor observance. On leaving the saloon, the young man who had confessed the funds, found a stranger's hat in place of his own, but taking it to be a mistake, which under the circumstances was a mere trifle, he stepped into a hatters near by, bought a new one, and began his day. It was afterwards discovered, by the detection and trial of the offender, that a gentleman swindler, who happened to be in the saloon at the same time, and overheard the conversation between the young men, was the intentional exchanger of hats. With curious ingenuity of thought, he took the stolen hat to the manufacturer, whose name was inside, and pleading an incidental exchange as his reason for asking the question, procured from him the young man's address to whom it belonged! He then went to his apartment, got the key from the porter as a friend who would wait the return of the young man, and at his leisure forced the secretary, and carried off the 2000 francs comfortably sleeping within.

ECONOMY IN ENGLAND.

I observed, that a considerable number of passengers carried a comfortable picknick box or basket with them, and spread their own tables. With some, doubtless, this provision proceeded from a fastidious taste, that feared some poisonous dirt would be found in the common fare of a steamboat. But with many, I presume, arose from a habit, which presents a marked difference between the people of England and of America; I mean, the habit of economy. In America, we are ashamed of economy. It is this feeling, which would forbid among us such a practice as that referred to; and not only this, but a great many more and better practices. In England, economy stands out prominently; it presides over the arrangements of a family; it is openly professed, and fears no reproach. A man is not ashamed to say, of a certain indulgence, that he cannot afford it. A gentleman says to you, "I drive a pony chaise, this year; I have put down my horse and gig, because I cannot pay the tax." A man, whose income, and expenses, and style of living far exceed almost any thing to be found among us, still says of something quite beyond him, which his wealthier neighbor does, "We are not rich enough for that." One of the most distinguished men in England said to me, when speaking of wines at his table, "The wine I should prefer, is claret; but I cannot afford it, and so I drink my own gooseberry." I have heard that many families carry the principle so far, that they determine exactly how many dinners they can give in a year, and to how many guests; nay, more, and how many dishes they can put upon the table, when they do entertain. [Dewey.

A man who has but a dollar in his pocket, would give a penny for almost any purpose. If he had a hundred dollars, he might give one; carry it higher and there is a falling off. One hundred dollars would be considered too large a sum for him who has ten thousand; while a present of one thousand would be deemed almost miraculous for a man worth one hundred thousand—yet the proportion is the same throughout—and the poor man's penny, the widow's mite, is more than the rich man's sounding and widely trumpeted benefaction.

PRIMITIVE METHODS OF ADVERTISING.

There is a very simple and very ancient way of assembling the people in Norway for public business. A bud-stick, or message-stick, of the size and shape of our constable's baton, is painted and stamped with the royal arms, and made hollow, with a head to screw on upon one end, and iron spike on the other. The official notice to meet, the time, place, and object, are written on a piece of paper, which is rolled up and placed in the hollow. This is delivered from the public office or court-house of the district to the nearest householder, who is bound by law to carry it within a certain time to his neighbor, who must transmit it to the next, and so on. In case of two houses equally distant, it must be previously determined by the foged at which he shall deliver it. If the owner is not at home, he is to stick it "in the house-father's great chair, by the fire-side;" and if the door be locked, must fasten it to the outside. Each is bound to prove, if required, at what hour he received, delivered, or stuck it. He who, by his neglect, has prevented others from receiving the notice in time to attend the meeting, pays a fine for each person so absent. There are fixed stations at which the "budstick" rests for the night, and it cannot be carried after sunset or before sunrise. The householder to whom it comes last takes it back to the office. In a country so extensive, with its population scattered in valleys, divided by uninhabited "Fields," and with few paths of communication, this primitive sort of gazette is the most expeditious mode of publication. In the Highlands of Scotland, the stick, burnt at one end, and with blood on the other, was a similar device for assembling a clan in arms.

An Anniversary Ninety-six Years ago.—The following is from the Gentleman's Magazine for 1753, published in London.

Boston, N. E, August 8th, 1753.

"This being the annual meeting of the Society for encouraging industry and employing the poor, Rev. Mr. Cooper preached an excellent sermon before them and a vast assemblage of other persons of all ranks and denominations; and after the sermon £453 old tenor, was collected (beside the subscription money of the society) for the farther promoting that laudable undertaking. In the afternoon about 300 spinners, all neatly dressed, and many of them daughters of the best families in town, appeared on the Common, and being placed orderly in three rows at work, made a most delightful appearance. The weavers also, cleanly dressed in garments of their own weaving, with a loom and a young man at work, on a stage erected for that purpose, carried on men's shoulders, attended by music, preceded the society, and a long train of other gentlemen of note, both from town and country, as they walked in procession to view the spinners; and the spectators were very numerous."

Gates.—Every field on the farm should be entered by a good self-shutting and self-fastening gate. How long does it require to take down and put up a set of bars? At least two minutes, which, if repeated three times a day for a year, amounts to thirty hours, or three days of working time—which would yearly pay for a good gate. Or, examine it in another point of view—three times a day is eighteen hundred times a year; now, is there any man between Halifax and California who would take down and replace a set of bars eighteen hundred times in succession in payment for a farm gate? Hardly—yet this is the price yearly paid by those who use bars that are constantly passed, and the gate is not obtained by it. Again—how much better is a well hung gate than one half hung?—or one with a good self-fastening latch, than one with a pin crowded into an auger hole? Try it by dragging a badly hung gate over the ground, eighteen hundred times in succession, securing at each time with a pin, and see if you do not think this labor would pay for good hinges and a latch.

Court Etiquette.—A stranger, wishing to be presented at the Court of St. James, or Tuilleries, must write or call on the Minister of his country, stating his wish, and the time he would like to be presented, when the Minister, if he finds nothing objectionable in the character of the person, and is willing to favor him, sends his name to the master of presentation at Court, who registers it and grants permission, unless there are more names already registered than can be presented at the Levee, which is the state occasion for presenting all unofficials. A court suit, consisting of body coat, white vest, satin breeches, silk stockings, (white or flesh-colored,) and wig, are required, unless the person is a diplomatic, military or naval officer. All such persons may be presented in the uniform of their office. Less ceremony is observed at the French than at the English Court, but court costume is required at both. We give the information to gratify several querists. Court suits can always be hired at the costumers in London and Paris.

The King and the Reaper.—In one of his excursions during harvest, the King of England passed a field where he saw only one woman working. His majesty asked where her companions were.

"They have gone to see the King," she replied.

"And why did you not go with them?" added the King.

"I would not give a pin to see him," replied the woman; "besides, the fools who have gone to the city, will lose a day's work, and that is more than I can do; for I have five children to whom I must give bread."

"Very good," said the King, putting some money in her hands; "you can tell your companions who went to see the King, that the King came to see you."

Crumbs for the Birds.—Good children will be careful never to waste a crumb of bread; for a crumb will be food for the starving birds in winter. The sparrows chirp to you, and the robin readbreasts sing, and this we will call their thanks for the kindness of their little benefactors.

That little red robin will sit here and sing,
His thanks for the crumbs that in deep snows you bring;
And still for your pleasure, the whole summer long,
Will warble the notes of his own pretty song;
In your thick hazel tree he will build him a nest,
And each closing day he will sing you to rest,
And when from that nest his little ones fly,
He'll teach them a song in the sweet-briar by,
How pleased you will be when they cheerfully sing,
How well you'll be paid for the crumbs that you bring."

THE HOUSEWIFE.

Rice Milk.—This dish is an excellent one, and very simply and quickly made. After washing a pint of rice in two different waters, boil it well with about half a pound of raisins from which the stems have been carefully picked. Pour off the water, and mix a quart of rich milk with the rice. Let it boil for about five minutes, and after mixing with it four table spoonfuls of brown sugar, beat two eggs until they are light, and pour them into the milk, stirring it all the time. After the rice and eggs are well mixed together, they should boil from three to five minutes. If they are not well stirred, the eggs will form a custard on the surface, which is not desirable.

Indian Pudding.—Place over the fire a quart of milk, and add to it a quart of molasses, and a pound of butter cut up; stir them well together until the milk boils. Then remove from the fire and stir into this mixture a pint of Indian meal, previously sifted and scalded; after which, add seven eggs, previously beaten until they are perfectly light, and a little lemon juice, or ten drops of the essence of lemon. Stir the whole together, until the mixture seems quite light, and bake it in a moderately hot oven.

Plain Rice Pudding.—To make a plain rice pudding, boil a pint of rice until it is quite soft. Mix two ounces of butter and four table spoonfuls of sugar, a quart of rich milk with the rice, boil them up together, and let them partially cool. Beat five eggs until they are quite light, and stir them into the rice. It should bake about an hour.

Roast Beef.—When meat is put on the fire, salt should be sprinkled on it, and the bony side turned towards the fire first. When the bones get well heated through, turn the meat, and keep a brisk fire—baste it frequently while roasting. There should be a little water put into the dripping pan when the meat is put down to roast. If it is a thick piece, allow fifteen minutes to each pound to roast it in—if thin, less time will be required. The tender loin, and first and second cuts off the rack, are best as roasting-pieces.

Rice Bread.—Take one pound of rice, and boil it gently to a thick paste, which when mixed with the usual quantity of yeast, will be sufficient to make five pounds of wheat or barley meal into a dough. When risen, bake it in the usual way.

VARIETY.

A very small object near at hand makes as large a figure on the retina as a larger object at a proportionably greater distance, so that you may place a dollar in such a position as to hide a city from your view. And this fact in optics has its counterpart in morals. The most paltry interest of the present may conceal the greatest claims of the future, and the little gain or gratification of to-day may throw altogether out of view the momentous concerns of eternity.

The London Herald relates an anecdote of a poor Irish woman who kept a small fruit store in the vicinity of Covent Garden, and who seems to have had her own understanding of the motto, 'Of two evils choose the least.' Being asked by a gentleman who purchased some fruit of her, 'how trade was,' she replied, 'Och, yer honor, I'm sure it's bod enough; it's myself that's thinking of givin' it up,' and going over to the famine.'

The birth places of 605 missionaries have been ascertained as follows: 19 were born in Maine, 50 in New Hampshire, 63 in Vermont, 162 in Massachusetts, 1 in Rhode Island, 85 in Connecticut, 118 in New York, 21 in New Jersey, 27 in Pennsylvania, 13 in Virginia, 6 each in North and South Carolina and Kentucky, 10 in Ohio, 3 in Georgia, 2 in Indiana, 2 in the District of Columbia, 24 in Germany, India and France.

Fenelon, the chaplain of Lous XIV., was one day at the chapel with the monarch. The King expressed his surprise at seeing only a few persons, instead of a numerous congregation, as was generally the case. Fenelon said to him, 'It is because I told them that your majesty would not be at the chapel to-day, so that you might know who came to adore God, and who camo to flatter the King.'

A father says that on entering his parlor one evening he heard a soft, sweet voice saying, "Peet-a-boo Ane! Peet-a-boo Ane!" On looking around he observed his darling babe, not two years old, holding in its little hands a picture representing a group of angels, one of which was peering over a cloud, which the happy child had innocently imagined was playing with her.

A family of the name of Dolan, consisting of a man, his wife and five children, started from England, a few months ago, for this country. When the voyage had almost been completed, two of the children died and were thrown overboard. They were soon followed by two more of the children. The mother then sickened and died; just as the ship—James H Shepherd—was coming into the port of Boston, the father died, One poor orphan only of this numerous family reached the shores of this country.

From the Montreal Herald of June the 9th, we learn that 9,251 immigrants had arrived at Quebec, up to the 7th inst.—that 52 vessels had left ports in Ireland, England and Scotland, between the 1st and 19th of May, for Quebec, with 14,592, none of which had arrived in America as yet—that on June 5th, there were 52 vessels detained at quarantine, at Grosse Isle, (30 miles below Quebec,) with 14,000 passengers—and that things are improving very much at Quarantine.

The most beautiful, touching, grand, yet simple piece of composition in our language is the Lord's Prayer. Of the sixty-nine words it contains, all but five are from the Saxon. So are the words home, wife, child, mother—indeed all the words expressive of tenderness.

A disease called the gapes, so destructiv among chickens, may be prevented, and if not too far advanced cured, by a slight mixture of assafœtida in their food. Four ounces costing six cents per ounce, dissolved in water and mixed once a day in food, is enough for four hundred chickens.

CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE.

REV. J. T. HEADLEY, EDITOR.

THE CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE, formerly under the care of Rev. D. Mead, commences its fourth volume under the editorship of Rev. J. T. Headley, author of "Napoleon and his Marshals," "Sacred Mountains," "Letters from Italy," &c. We hazard nothing in saying that this Magazine, so deservedly popular hitherto, is destined to fill a large place in public estimation; that it will not only maintain its present enviable distinction, but earn to itself a far higher popularity, and become the companion of many a circle to which it is now a stranger, gladdening by its presence, while it exerts an influence pure, elevating, and healthful. The Editor will bend his energies to make this the most popular Magazine of the day, and while he avails himself of articles from the best writers, he will draw freely from his own exhaustless store.

It will continue to maintain its high moral tone, and nothing will be admitted into its columns which will minister to the corrupt passions and tendencies of youth, or which, "the author dying would wish to blot."

The design of the Editor and Publisher is to present a Magazine containing all the facination and interest of the lighter Periodicals, while at the same time it moves in a different path, and is not exposed to the same objections. It is issued monthly, containing 32 pages of original matter, printed on fine paper, in handsome covers, with a splendid steel engraving, and a beautiful colored flower, and music, to each number, and got up in every respect in the best style of the art, making a yearly volume of 384 pages, full of choice illustrations, and forming a handsome ornament to the Parlor Table, or a rich and valuable present to a friend.

☞ Price, two dollars a year. Three copies for five dollars. —A few good, responsible agents wanted to circulate this work; to whom the best inducements will be offered.

COMMENTARY FOR THE PEOPLE!

NOW PUBLISHING, THE ECLECTIC COMMENTARY ON THE BIBLE, from the works of Henry and about one hundred other writers. The work is printed on fine paper, and with large, clear type. It will be completed in twenty-four parts, of eighty pages each, imperial size, all of which is now stereotyped. It will be beautifully illustrated by accurate views of scriptural scenes, designed especially to embellish a Commentary, and executed by the most eminent artists. Tables and charts are likewise added, where necessary, for purposes of illustration; the whole comprising as valuable a series of illustrative engravings and embellishments as have ever been united in any similar work. It may be used with any edition of the Bible. Will be published semi-monthly. Price, 25 cents per part.

The design of the Committee of the London Tract Society, under whose supervision the English work was prepared, has been to cover that ground where all evangelical denominations meet, and to make a plain and practical exposition of religious truth and duty.

This work is based on the Commentaries of Henry and Scott, and more than one hundred other writers in the various departments of Biblical Literature; the most important observations of these eminent divines being quoted, constituting a digest of the most valuable results at which the learned men of all ages have arrived in their critical study of the Holy Scriptures. Reference has been had to the wants of Sunday School Teachers, and of families engaged in the systematic study of the Scriptures.

Perhaps there never was a juncture of time when true religion more greatly needed a safeguard against attacks which are both boldly and insidiously aimed at her vital principles; perhaps true religion was never in a more perilous position between open enemics and pretended friends, than at this particular crisis; and surely never was it more incumbent than now, on every true friend of her holy precepts, every conscientious master of a household, every anxious parent, guardian and protector, to be provided with antidotes to the poison which is so unscrupulously scattered abroad, or an argument against each dangerous fallacy which is propounded to the injury and detriment of that religion, which is the faithful oracle of the Divine Creator, and the best exponent of His will.

The object of the compilers has been to provide a Commentary compact in size, moderate in price, and suited to Christians of every station, rank, and denomination.

"The family into whose hands this work comes, have in their possession a store of biblical science and practical instruction, of more value than gold. The republication is a great undertaking, and we hope it will receive an adequate support."—New York Observer.

"This Commentary has enjoyed extraordinary popularity as a practical exposition of God's Word. It differs from any other, presenting the best exegetical, illustrative and practical comments which the editors were able to select from the best scholars, on each passage, in course. The text being omitted, it is enabled to present a vast amount of learning in a small space. The sources from which it is compiled afford a perfect guaranty of its soundness, both of doctrine and interpretation, while the advantage of having the opinion of different commentators, is apparent and very great."—N. Y. Evangelist.

"We regard the Eclectic Commentary, now in course of publication by Mr. Shannon, as especially deserving the patronage of Protestant Christians. Its cheapness, beautiful finish of mechanical workmarship, and its comprehensiveness, embracing, as it does, the cream of all the commentaries, all entitle it to very high consideration."—Christian Parlor Magazine.

We have received the most favorable notices from many distinguished clergymen of various denominations of this country, and also from the press, which cannot be inserted in a newspaper advertisement on account of their length; they will be found on the cover of each part.

THE GERMAN SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.

The prominence which the persecuting prosecutions of this sect of our fellow Christians have acquired for their name, renders a succinct account of them of unusual interest at the present time. There are several published accounts of the origin and progress of the Society at Ephrata, Lancaster Co., Pa., but none, that I know of, respecting the Society at Snowhill, Franklin Co., Pa. The following information I obtained during my recent visit among them.

They are situated in that beautiful and fertile valley which lies between the Kittany or Blue-ridge mountains, extending from northern Pennsylvania to the Shenandoah valley in Virginia. The section where they live was early settled with a German population, and their immediate neighborhood with first-day Baptists, more commonly called Dunker Baptists; of which there is now a large Society, who own a stone meeting-house about three-fourths of a mile distant from the Snowhill meeting-house. Belonging to this Dunker Society, was one Andrew Snowberger, from whom the Snowhill Society receives its cognomen. Berg, in German, signifying a hill, his name is literally Snowhills. So seldom, however, do adventitious names correspond with localities, that they often convey to the uninformed reader but a very incorrect idea of situation or circumstance. The establishment called Snowhill, is located in a small verdant vale of a large valley, in latitude 39° N., about seven miles from Hagerstown, Md. In the convent attached to the estate resides an old sister, now between ninety and one hundred years of age, who gives the following account of the origin of the Society in this place. She is the daughter of Andrew Snowberger, above mentioned. When she was a little girl—she does not remember what her age then was—her father, by a diligent study of his German Bible, became convinced that the seventh day of the week was the only divinely-appointed Sabbath, and firmly determined to keep it. This caused some difficulty in the family, and the neighborhood; but Andrew Snowberger was not to be deterred from keeping the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus Christ, by a few difficulties. On he went in the path of duty, believing in God who can make the rough ways smooth. His family at length complied with his regulations, and some time afterward embraced his views. There was no Society of that faith near him; but Andrew maintained the worship of Jehovah in his own house, and a very Bethel it has been ever since. He desired to continue in membership with his first-day brethren; but they frowned upon him for his new-fangled sentiments, and finally disowned him. This was painful to Andrew; but he observed, that he could better bear the frown and disowning of men, than to disobey God and feel that he incurred His displeasure.

Some time after this, Andrew had a sore trial, and a great deliverance, which much strengthened him, and which laid the foundation for the present establishment. The country was yet a wilderness, and much of the labor of those early settlers was to clear away the superabundant forest wood. One first-day he took his little daughter with him into the fallow clearing to burn brush-wood. At this time the fences were all brush-wood. After they had been at work some time, and the neighbors of that sparse population had all gone to meeting, the wind blew a breeze, and Andrew's fires spread so fast that he and his little girl could not control them; the brush fence on one side of the lot took fire, and spread rapidly, in spite of all their efforts to put it out. He could very well bear the loss of his fence, but it connected with all the buildings of his next neighbor's home establishment; and he saw plainly enough, that before human help could be obtained, the whole must be burned, unless the Lord his God interfered. In this his extremity, he kneeled down amidst the piles of burning brush, and raising his blackened hands and smoky face towards the heavens, cried out, "Oh Lord, if it be from thee that I keep the seventh day for a Sabbath, and work on this day, according to thy law, do thou stop this fire." While he was thus praying, the wind chopped round, and a sudden gust took the whole fire out of the brush fence, so that it became easily manageable. This remarkable answer to prayer, Andrew immediately improved, by vowing unto the Lord to be steadfast in his law, and to make his house forever a house for the servants and service of God—a vow which Jehovah seems to this day to have accepted. For years after this, however, Andrew was the only master and minister in his house devoted to the servants and service of God; but divine worship was steadfastly and constantly maintained, and not without success, for he had the happiness of seeing some of his neighbors, one at a time, come and join themselves with him in this way of serving God.

After several years, Elder Lehman came from Ephrata, and joined himself unto them, and proposed to raise an establishment similar to the one at Ephrata, Lancaster Co. To this Andrew readily assented, and as soon as circumstances would permit, the whole estate and buildings were formally deeded to the Society. It was not entirely a gift, however. Andrew had a family, and he was not worse than an infidel, neglecting to provide for his own. Every thing was fairly apprised, and time given to the Society to pay off the apprisement to himself and his heirs. No injustice, therefore, was done to any one; and so far as is known, no dissatisfaction ever occurred on account of the transaction. Nothing but the happiest results seem to have followed. Andrew and his family were amply provided for. He lived to see his vow accepted and prospered of Jehovah, and a happy Society arise, of which his children and his children's children became members. He and the companion of his life went down to the grave in happy company with this Society, and are now doubtless numbered with them who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

The farm at present consists of 165 acres of land, in a good state of cultivation, and is very productive. It is a stiff loam, upon a limestone bottom, and is therefore well adapted to grass and the cereal grains. They are plentifully supplied with farm buildings. The principal barn, situated on a side hill, built of stone and brick. is 102 feet long, by 50 feet wide, with a roomy overshot on the lower side. The lower or underground story contains five stables, capable of accommodating thirty head of horses or cattle. The yard is well supplied with water from the creek below, by a very simply-constructed force pump. There are two flourishing orchards, and two neatly cultivated gardens. Attached to the premises, is a weaving shop for the sisters to labor in; a blacksmith's shop, and a cooper and cabinet maker's shop for the brethren to labor in; likewise a flouring mill, at which they have made two thousand barrels of flour in a year, besides custom work. This is situated on a perennial stream flowing through the estate—a branch of the Antetum river, which empties into the Potomac. Along the south bank of this pure crystal stream, at about six paces distant, is built the dwelling-house, or as the people of the country call it, the nunnery. It is not like the Papal or Greek nunneries, however. It may safely be called a convent, or religious house; but to this I shall refer hereafter. By my own measurement, it is one hundred and fifty feet long by thirty feet wide, three stories high, the lower story of blue lime stone, and the above stories of brick; the middle story is even with the ground on the south side, before which and between the two orchards there is a small grassy lawn. There are three front entrances; within these are thirteen large-sized rooms and thirty-six sleeping rooms. The middle entrance opens into the dining hall, which might very well accommodate sixty or seventy-five people. On the north side, projecting from the middle of the main building, with an entrance into the dining hall, is the cook-house, or kitchen, and bakery. Over the dining hall, in the next story, is the family chapel, where all who are able assemble in the morning and at night for worship. Above this is a small cupola, with the convent bell, and a rope passes from it through each floor into the center of the dining hall. The west end of the building, from the dining hall round, contains exclusively the apartments of the brethren of the house; the east end of the building, beginning with same division, contains exclusively the apartments of the sisters. In each department there are convenient sitting rooms and spare rooms for company, with sleeping rooms on the north side in both stories. In the center of the cellar story there is a beautiful fountain of spring water, from which I judge flows out a barrel at every minute and a half. This is distributed in a very convenient manner to the wash houses, and to the dairy, and as far as is required, and also serves as a cooler for the store room. On the north side of the house is a fine meadow, from sixty to a hundred paces across, through which runs the creek before mentioned, and another smaller stream about two-thirds of the distance across. Over these are two small wooden bridges, which lead to the meeting-house, situated on the north side of the meadow, adjoining a public road which runs through the estate. The meeting-house, which is built of stone, is sixty by fifty feet, without a gallery. On the west end is an adjoining building of smaller dimensions, with a door from without, and into the meeting-house, exactly like an English vestry, but which is really a kitchen; the use of it I will explain hereafter. Near the east end of the meadow, about twenty-five paces from the convent, there is a waste-gate for the mill. At this point there is a bend in the creek, and here is formed their baptistry, well supplied with pure water. Three fixed steps lead down into this beautiful pool.

Surely here, if in any part of the earth, they may chant with effect the 23d Psalm—"The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters." S. D.

VERDICT OF THE POOR.

Sits a maid upon a stone,
Singing slow in under-tone;
Comes a man across a moor—
He is old, and lame, and poor.

"Riches are a glorious boon,
As is aught beneath the moon."
Thus the maid, upon the stone,
Singeth slow, in under-tone.

"Not for hoarding;—daily care
Dwells where hoarded riches are:—
Not for wasting;—sinful deed
Squanders what the wretched need.

"But for giving;—God above
Gives to all men in his love.
Hoard or squander—desperate sin
Thy sad heart hath drunken in."

Came the man across the moor—
He was old, and lame, and poor;
And the maid upon the stone,
Spake him thus, in under-tone.

"Here is gold—the wretched feel Miseries which the rich can heal."
But, abashed, he hangs his head,
Asking not another's bread.

"Heav'n hath daughters—daughters three,
And one's name is Charity;
She is fair, but more I prize
Her sister of the bandaged eyes.

"Mercy treads with glorious feet;"
Thus he makes her answer meet—
"She is fair, but most I prize
Her sister of the bandaged eyes.

"Industry will up and strive;
Idleness will never thrive;
Sluggard heart will lose its shame,
Begging alms in holy name.

"THERE'S NAE STRIFE HERE."

A FACT.

In one of Scotland's northern towns, a family were seated round the breakfast table, waiting for "the father," and wondering why he was later than usual. At length he appeared; his step was heavy, and his brow cloudy. Having asked the blessing, he sat resting his head on his hand, wrapped in melancholy thought.

This unhappy looking man was one of the elders in a neighboring chapel; he possessed much energy and zeal, and it was hoped real piety; but alas! he was governed by a naturally bad temper, and too often forgot the words of the wise man—"He that ruleth his spirit is better than he that taketh a city;" and in consequence of his unrestrained temper, the meetings for the chapel business were the constant scenes of anger and noisy strife.

The venerable minister being a true disciple of the Prince of Peace, deeply lamented his elder's unchristian spirit. On the previous day a meeting had been held, which was even more contentious than usual; for the elder had been particularly angry and quarrelsome.

The good minister's heart sunk within him while he sat amidst this strife of tongues, and most thankful was he, that evening, to retire to a friend's house some miles from town, for the peace and quiet of the country is soothing to a wounded spirit.

It was on the following morning, that the elder came down to breakfast in so melancholy a mood. His wife, after looking anxiously at him for some time, said, "Are you ill, my dear?"

"No."

"Then what has happened to make you look so sad?" He slowly raised himself up, and looking earnestly at her, said, "I have had a most extraordinary dream."

The look of anxiety vanished from his wife's face as she said, with a smile, "Why, you always laugh at my dreams." "Yes, but mine was so remarkable. I dreamt I was at the bottom of a steep hill, and when I looked up, I saw the gate of heaven at the top; it was bright and glorious, and many saints and angels stood there. Just as I reached the top of the hill, who should come out to meet me but our aged minister! and he held out his hand, crying, 'Come awa, Jond, come awa, there's nae strife here.' And now I cannot help thinking of the grief my contentious spirit has given to the dear old man."

The husband and wife sat for some time in mournful silence, which was broken by the entrance of a servant, with a letter. The elder hastily read it, whilst an expression of the deepest grief overspread his face; then dropping it from his hand, he covered his face, as if to hide from those around him the bitter anguish of his soul.

His wife took up the letter, which was from the minister's host—its contents were as follows:

"My dear ——, we had the great pleasure yesterday of receiving our dear minister, little thinking it would be the last time we should welcome him to what he called his peaceful retreat.

"When we sat talking together in the evening, he spoke with much grief of the chapel meeting. 'Indeed,' he added, 'I am so tired of all this strife and turmoil, that I wish my dear Lord would take me home.'

"In the morning, as he did not come down to breakfast, I ran up and knocked at his door, but receiving no answer, I went down stairs again, thinking a longer rest than usual would do him good.

"After returning to his door once or twice, and hearing no sound, I went in. He was in bed, and apparently asleep. I spoke to him, but received no answer. Yet it was long, very long, ere we believed it to be the sleep of death; for a heavenly smile rested on his placid face, and his snowy locks lay unruffled on the pillow; but he slept in Jesus; for his dear Lord had taken him home." * * *

The elder never recovered this shock. He sorrowed for his friend; but still more for his sin. He gradually sunk, and in three weeks was laid by the side of his aged minister.

THE CITY BIBLE SOCIETY—NEW YORK.

(CIRCULAR.)

To the friends of the Bible throughout the United States and Canada:

The City Bible Society of the city of New York, auxiliary to the American and Foreign Bible Society, is engaged in the distribution of the Bible among the poor and destitute. It is desirable that its object should be fully known, that its efforts may avail as much as practicable. When its own limited means of usefulness, and the increasing demand for the Scriptures, are taken into consideration, the duty of the Society in carrying forward the great work of distribution, becomes oftentimes arduous and difficult. Persevering and vigorous efforts, with a firm reliance upon an overruling Providence, will, however, accomplish much, and develope the mode and means of accomplishing more. This is our strong hope. All persons friendly to this cause of benevolence are solicited to forward the minutes and proceedings of associations, State conventions, and other public and religious bodies, containing information necessary and available in the progress of the Bible cause. This society also seeks information relative to the best mode of transportation to particular places, for which appropriations are to be made; also, as to the language spoken, the character of the people of any given locality, their ability to purchase, and the necessity of gratuitous distribution. Such information is required, that its instructions may be adapted to the wants of the community to whom Bibles and Testaments are supplied. Applications should be accompanied with reference to persons residing in the city of New York, whenever practicable, and when not, by a reference to persons residing in the country, known to the Board of Managers; and also, with full directions, plainly and distinctly written. This society still continues, so far as its limited means will permit, to circulate the Scriptures among the poor and destitute in cities villages, towns and counties where there are no auxiliary societies to supply the wants of the people. Clergymen and others are solicited to secure contributions in aid of the society, and payments for Bibles and Testaments sold, whenever practicable. By so doing, individuals will essentially aid in the great work of distribution, and perhaps also cause those who thus contribute, to more ardently love the Bible, and to more justly appreciate the importance of the Bible cause. For several years this society has been gradually extending its operations, until the funds supplied by its friends and patrons are not sufficient to meet the demands upon its treasury. Were it possible, we would send the Bible to all who are destitute. In this great work of love, we invite the coöperation of all who love the Lord Jesus Christ. Newspapers throughout the United States and Canada friendly to Bible distribution, are solicited to publish this circular with editorial remarks.

Communications are to be addressed to EMERY TOWNSEND, 64 John street, New York.

CONSTANT PIETY.

In a family in the north of Ireland a pious young woman was engaged as a servant. The poor girl was much ridiculed for her religion by the young ladies, but did not render evil for evil; on the contrary, she would allow them to laugh at her, and then mildly reason. She made it her study to be attentive and useful to them; took opportunities to speak to them about religion, and would offer to read the Scriptures to them when they went to bed. They commonly fell asleep while she was reading, but she was not to be discouraged. Having exemplified Christianity in her life, Providence sent a fever to remove her to a better state. The young ladies were not permitted to see her during her illness, but they heard of her behaviour, which did not lessen the impression which her previous conduct had made upon them. Soon after the two elder ones began to make a profession of religion, the little leaven spread; and now all the young ladies appear truly pious. Nor is religion in this highly favored family confined to them. Other means were employed by God in producing this great change, but one of the two who became serious, declared that she chiefly ascribed it to the life and death of her servant-maid. Be not weary in well doing; never be ashamed of Christ and his Gospel. Always try to bring others to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. All can do some good, if they only are willing.

THE DAUGHTER'S PORTION TRANSFERRED.

Mr. Rodgers often related little anecdotes concerning the unexpected repulses, on the one hand, and the agreeable surprises on the other, which occurred in the course of his begging season.

One of the latter class shall serve as a specimen. Attended by an officer of the church, Mr. Rodgers called one morning at the house of an excellent woman, a widow, who had recently lost, by death, a pious and beloved daughter. As her circumstances were narrow, little was expected from her. Indeed, they called upon her chiefly to testify their respect, and to avoid the imputation of either forgetting her person, or despising her mite. To their great surprise, however, when their errand was made known, she presented to them, with much promptness and cordiality, a sum which, for her, was very large—so large, indeed, that they felt and expressed some scruples about accepting it. She put an end to their scruples by saying, with much decision, 'You must take it all. I had laid it up as a portion for my daughter; and I am determined that He who has my daughter shall have her portion too.'

REWARD OF HONESTY.

There is something in female honor, or virtue in a woman, which charms as much as honesty in man, and both are so rare, and at the same time so inestimable, that this celebrated distich of our moral bard will equally apply to either—

"A wit's a feather, and a chief's a rod;
An honest man's the noblest work of God."

The Cardinal Farnese, who was very properly named the Patron of the Poor, gave public audience once a week to indigent persons in his neighborhood, and distributed his bounty among them according to their wants. A woman of genteel address, but in a dejected forlorn condition, presented herself one day with her daughter, a beautiful creature about fifteen years old, before this liberal ecclesiastic.

'My lord,' said she, 'the rent of my house (five crowns) has been due some days, and my landlord threatens to turn me into the street, unless he is paid within the week. Have the goodness, my Lord Cardinal, to interpose your sacred authority, and protect me from this dreadful outrage, till by our industry we can satisfy the demand of our persecutor.'

The cardinal wrote a billet which he put into the petitioner's hand, and said, 'Go to my steward with this paper, and receive from him five crowns.' But the steward, on her presenting the document, paid down fifty. The woman absolutely refused to receive more than five; alledging that his eminence gave her to expect no more, and that it must be a mistake.

Both were so convinced of acting literally according to order, that it was mutually agreed to refer the matter to the Cardinal himself.

'It is true,' said he, 'there must be a mistake. Give me the paper, and I will rectify it.' He then returned the billet thus rectified to the woman, saying, 'So much candor and honesty deserves recompense. Here—I have ordered you a thousand crowns. What you can spare out of it, lay up as a dowry for your daughter in marriage, and regard my donation as the blessing of God on the upright disposition of a pure mind.'

A PROMPT TREASURER.

One of the most useful men to any church and society, as many know by experience, is a prompt, gentlemanly Treasurer. On the appointed days, and, perhaps, at the same hour on those days, he makes his appearance at the pastor's house, and the pastor sees in him, as it were, a whole congregation earnest to fulfill their obligation to their minister. The bonds of love, through a delicate sense of obligation and gratitude, insensibly grow stronger in their pastor's heart. He respects his people more; he is admonished and quickened in his duties. But when the Treasurer comes far behind his time, and then pays over only a small part of the large arrears, and dolefully tells the minister that the society is very poor, and that they find it exceedingly difficult to raise his salary, then the minister and his wife have long and sad conferences about their straightened circumstances; they meditate an encroachment upon a little property which a relative left her, the knowledge of which is the reason felt, or assigned, by some parishioners, for refusing to pay their dues. From the experience which brethren in the ministry have related in confidence, it may be asserted, that if there be any cruelty, and any suffering, which is peculiarly exquisite and keen, it may be found in the treatment of a sensitive pastor by an unfaithful people, and in his secret sorrows on account of it.

All men love to be paid promptly. It is a universal truth, that "short reckonings make long friends." You never pay money to a laborer or tradesman promptly, and with a willing mind, without putting him in good humor. How freely he speaks about the weather, inquires for the health of your family, indulges his innocent wit, smiles, thanks you, and makes you feel that you are one of his benefactors and friends. Now, if any man taunts ministers for loving to be paid promptly, and cheerfully, they may say to him in the words of Terence: "Homo sum, et nil humani a me alienum puto;" and if he asks what that means, it might not be unkind to tell him, that, if he had a more liberal education, he would both have known the English of it, and never have uttered the reproach.

LEPERS OF RHODES.—Mr. Daniel, an English gentleman, relates that in a voyage from the main land to Rhodes, a little barque, containing lepers, was cast on shore which gave him an opportunity for examining the character of that extraordinary disease called leprosy. There were seven persons in every stage of it. Three were far gone, a man and two women. The men were blind and speechless, and all three had lost the use of their extremities, which appeared to have been eaten away. Two others had not lost the use of their hands, but their toes were gone, which almost prevented them from walking. A fine young man, and a well-grown and rather handsome girl, at a distance appeared unharmed, yet on a nearer approach the bandages on one foot of the female, and over one eye of the youth, demonstrated the fact that the plague spot was upon them. There appears to be no disease analagous to this ancient malady, for which there seems no remedy within the resources of medicine.

"Jerusalem is the city of the great King, saith the Lord. Where is Jerusalem? Where the eye overflows with tears of mourning after God; where the knee and the heart are bowed at the throne of grace; where the hands of faith are lifted up to the cross, and lips of sincerity utter their prayers and praise—there is Jerusalem. The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, July 1, 1847.

THE "SABBATH DISCUSSION."

Our disputants spent much time in examining the question, whether the Sabbath was a part of the Moral Law. In order to this, the nature of moral precepts, as contradistinguished from positive, was brought under discussion, and much able argument elicited on both sides. To follow in a close review of the positions taken by them respectively, would be tedious, and, so far as the practical aspects of the question are concerned, quite unnecessary.

To us, "Indagator" seemed to be laboring under the delusion, that all positive institutions were of necessity swept away by the abrogation of the Old Covenant, and that nothing of the Old Testament was now of any binding force, except what was in the purest and most rigid sense moral. We take issue with him on this point. If he were to say that all positive institutions peculiar to the Levitical service, were swept away, we should not demur. We have no more of a disposition to Judaize by upholding the Levitical service, than he has. But it by no means follows that because an institution is positive, it is therefore ceremonial, however true it may be that all ceremonial institutions are positive. Neither does it follow that because an institution is positive it must therefore cease to be of binding force after the gospel dispensation is set up.

The true doctrine on this point is, that a positive institution continues binding as long as the system of religion to which it belongs is binding. Hence, if there was a system of religion given to man before either Christianity, or its type—Judaism—was given; and if there is a positive institution appropriately belonging to that system; the introduction of the gospel dispensation does not set it aside, unless it also sets aside the system.

The heroes of this "discussion" seem not to be aware, that the Bible reveals any other system besides Judaism and Christianity. But we very clearly see another. Before man sinned, and consequently before any notices of a Redeemer, or any types of a Redeemer, were given, it was just as necessary for him to serve God according to some system of religion, as it became afterwards. Adam in Paradise, therefore, received a system, which devolved upon him with all the weight of obligation that creating goodness could enforce. The transgression of this system constituted him a sinner, and created the need of those two other systems, Judaism and Christianity—or, rather, parts of the same system—which are predicated upon the gift of a Redeemer.

The system of which we speak is substantially that which was afterwards more formally developed in the Ten Commandments. Whether Adam was gifted naturally with powers sufficient to discern it himself, without a revelation, is a question which it is unnecessary to discuss, as it does not concern the point at issue. But appropriately belonging to it was the Sabbath, which, according to "Indagator," must be considered as a positive institution. There is no use in disputing the position of "Indagator;" it only leads to protracted argument, without ultimately changing the real aspect of the question. We admit the Sabbath to be a positive institution. BUT unless we can also admit that the system of religion to which it appropriately belongs was set aside by the gospel, we cannot admit that this positive institution was set aside. It remains; and stands on precisely the same ground that all other positive institutions do, viz: as a memorial of the great fact in which the system, of which it is a part, originates.

We have not yet named the system of religion we are speaking of. That system, which was revealed to the Israelites through Moses, is by common consent termed Judaism. That, which receives its full development in the New Testament, is called Christianity. Yet neither of these terms are found in the Bible. They are however sufficiently designative, and perhaps no real objection can be found to their use. But if uninspired terms may be employed to designate two of the three systems, we see no reason why we may not invent some term to designate the other. We should at once employ the term Natural Religion, were it not that this term has already been appropriated, by general consent, to that system, which man is supposed to be able to discern without the aid of revelation. The term Moral Law may also be objectionable, inasmuch as writers generally mean by moral duties something as contradistinguished from those which they choose to call positive; hence the labored efforts of those who wish to uphold the Sabbath, to show that it is a moral duty, and on the other hand the no less labored efforts of those who reject it to prove that it is a positive duty merely. But for our own part, we use the term Moral Law, not as rigidly exclusive of every thing of a positive nature, but as a comprehensive term to denote a system. The appropriateness of the term consists in the fact that the greater part of the duties which the system enjoins are rigidly moral in distinction from positive. Just as we sometimes use the term Book of the Law in reference to the Old Testament, or the term Book of the Gospel in reference to the New Testament. Not that the Old Testament consists exclusively of law, without any intermixture of gospel; for every one knows that all the promises of a Redeemer, as well as all the typical illustrations of his grace, were substantially gospel. And not that the New Testament consists exclusively of gospel, without any law; for every one knows, or ought to know, that the precepts of law are scattered all through it. But these terms are used simply with reference to what constitutes the predominant part of the one and of the other.

We therefore designate the system of religion, which was given to Adam in Paradise, and which was afterwards more formally developed in the Ten Commandments, as the Moral Law, in spite of all objections that captious, carping critics may found upon the fact that the Sabbath is positive and not moral. If "Indagator," and those of his creed, choose to plume themselves in the fancy that they have gained a great victory by proving that the Sabbath is a positive institution, they are welcome to all the honor it reflects upon them. It is indeed a positive institution; but neither "Indagator," nor any of his fraternity, dares to deny that the system of religion which bound Adam in Paradise is binding still; for the violation of that system is what constitutes man a sinner; and he knows that being "under grace," rather than "under law," gives no one a license to sin. The only alternative left for him is to deny, out and out, that the Sabbath is an appropriate part of that system; which he does by maintaining that it originated in the wilderness—a notion which we have already proved to be groundless.

We conceive, then, that the extended discussion of "Indagator" and "E. W. D.," though managed with ability on both sides, was not calculated to bring the question to a speedy issue. "E. W. D." seemed to fancy that he could not uphold the Sabbath successfully without disproving the position of his opponent, that it was a positive institution; and "Indagator," on the other hand, thought himself to have gained quite an advantage by proving that the Sabbath must be viewed as a positive institution, in contradistinction from those institutions which are more rigidly moral. We believe that the controversy would never be ended in this way. But more at another time. *

THE WRATH TO COME.

There is something very peculiar in this scriptural phraseology. The wrath of God, the wrath of the Lamb, and the wrath to come, are synonymous terms; and though each of these terms may have some variation of meaning, yet they refer to one and the same awful subject. To my mind, there is something inexplicable in this language. When I read that "power belongeth to God," no difficulty presents itself, because I am surrounded with the vast and magnificent displays of it. When I read this beautiful text, "God is love," both nature and grace spread out a volume before me in which I see it proved and illustrated in the most multifarious forms. I can conceive of the attributes of wisdom, justice, and mercy, as essential to a lovely and perfect being. But when I take up the wrath of God, and dwell upon it, I find a theme which my mind cannot well define. The universally-received idea of wrath is violent anger or rage. On the part of man, a display of it is considered wicked; yea, a wrathful man, or one who is very liable to be so, is but little esteemed by his neighbors, and mostly avoided. The rising of wrath in the mind is an evil thing, as it destroys for the time being peace and happiness. This state of mind, experienced by a good man, a child of God, is the occasion of sorrow and deep repentance. Human definitions and ideas of wrath, cannot apply to the wrath of God. What is meant, then, by this language? Perhaps the question may be answered thus: It is holy indignation towards sin committed against a perfectly holy and lovely being. It is letting the natural results of violated law come upon the aggressor without restriction. The former—that is, the natural result of violated law—is experienced by the sinner in this life. The latter—that is, without restriction—is experienced in the world to come, the state of existence after death. The word of truth declares, that God is angry with the wicked every day. How is this truth manifested? By the voice of God within, or conscience arraying his sins before him, and announcing in his ears the threatenings annexed to transgression. By the blighting of his schemes, which have been formed in the neglect of God or in defiance of his holy laws. Sometimes, by letting him take his fill of pleasure, and succeed in every enterprise, until he is sated with his own prosperity, and his very luxuries become loathsome. Sometimes he is allowed to go on undisturbed in the accumulation of wealth, until his love of money becomes so strong, his cravings for still more so irresistible, that all the enjoyment of life is lost, and the very beggar is happier than he. Frequently the transgressor's course ruins his health, his family and his reputation, and at last he dies a miserable wretch. Let all this be weighed, and it will be seen that it is the natural result of violated law. In the present life, the penalty is not fully endured, for two reasons. First, because the sinner is not capable of bearing it; and, second, because the world is the grand theatre for the display of the mercy of God to a race of rebels. But in the spirit world, the threatening will be fully executed. Conscience, aided by memory, will bring all his crimes before him. The unhallowed passions which have been nourished through life, and have governed the man, will be panting for gratification without any object to feast upon. The destitution of love to God, as a holy and lovely being, will be our unavoidable barrier to that friendship between God and the soul which constitutes the real happiness of an immortal creature. Having neglected the great end of life, and for which he was commanded to use it, namely, the security of his soul's salvation by the reception of the gospel and the practice of its precepts, the glory of God by a holy and devoted life for the good of others, he must wail forever in despair. Dying impenitent, with all the gall of iniquity in his heart, eternity will be spent in sin, and the penalty of a holy law, attending all his crimes without termination or respite. Who then does not tremble at "the wrath to come?" W—R.

SALEM, N. J., May 30, 1847.

THE PENNSYLVANIA CASE.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Knowing that many of your readers, as well as yourself, feel an intense interest in the issue of the case of my German brethren, which it was expected would be decided by the Supreme Court of that State, at its present sessions at Harrisburg; and being prevented from being in attendance, which I confidently expected to be, but which was overruled by uncontrollable circumstances; I have not been able to advertise you, at an earlier period, of the position of the case, having only to-day received intelligence of the disposition made of it.

The Supreme Bench being composed of five Judges, and there being but four present, the case was laid over until next sessions of the Middle District, (May 1848,) to which Franklin County belongs.

Whether it is absolutely essential to have a full-bench, when a case comes up which requires the Court to revise a question which has already been before them, and reäffirm or revise the principle of a former decision, I am not informed; or whether it was the choice of our attorneys, or the privilege of our persecutors, I know not. Certain it is, we may gain some advantage by it, and perhaps it was so deemed by our friends. Had the case been argued, the Court might have been divided two and two; and so it would have had, necessarily, to be postponed and tried over again. Whether the case required a full bench, or whether the Judges had no disposition to try the case, and availed themselves of that circumstance to choke it off for the present, I do not pretend to determine. All I know is, that we have to abide the time, and that no delay, nor any stratagem, can destroy our cause, while our people are true to themselves. I rejoice, with thankfulness, to witness the response of the Central Association in the matter. With such prompt action, with such candid coöperation of Sabbath-keepers, we must prevail in having our constitutional rights respected and restored unto us. With stout hearts to stand by each other, and indomitable spirits to brave persecution, we shall eventually have deliverance, if there remain any virtue in the Republic, and any integrity to the sacred principles of religious liberty in the Judicial functionaries of the Union.

In haste yours,

WM. M. FAHNESTOCK.

☞ The following letter was addressed to the Seventh-day Baptist Central Association, and is now published by request of the Association:—

DERUYTER, June 7, 1847.

DEAR BRETHREN:—A hope of aiding in disseminating a zeal for a thorough education among the youth of our denomination, was a prominent incentive in locating ourselves among you in our present capacity. Effort on our part alone, will be too puny to secure the essential benefits to the mass of our youth. With the hope of preparing the way for being useful to a greater number, we laid a proposition before the Eastern Association, which we in like manner proffer to you, and to all who are pleased to accept it, viz: If any society, either of the Association, or of a church or neighborhood, or any mite society, or other benevolent association, will recommend any worthy person, either male or female, to our school, with the qualifications specified below, and said society will pay the tuition or tuition and room-rent of such person for two terms, we will furnish the same gratuitous the third term, and so on every third term during our connection with the school as at present. Qualifications—1st. Indigent circumstances. 2d. A good moral character. 3d. A benevolent disposition. 4th. A promising talent for improvement. 5th. A discreet and conscientious observance of the Sabbath.

It may be asked, why we reserve our benefactions to the third term? We answer, We wish to present inducements for a stay long enough for some practical benefit. Scholars should, before leaving, acquire sufficient solidity of thought to balance their pride of opportunity. There is a good idea, if not misconstrued, in Pope's Essay:—

> "A little learning is a dangerous thing;
> Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring.
> There shallow draughts intoxicate the brain,
> But drinking largely, sobers us again."

There has formerly been an opinion, that Education Societies should confine their benefactions to the incipient clergy. But an educated clergy will be properly sustained and appreciated only by an educated people. Again, an educated people are armed with a power to compete with others in the enterprises and improvements of this bustling age. To be able successfully to rise above the embarrassments in business that grow out of our peculiarities, we must be an educated people. Our rising mechanics, tradesmen, and farmers, must have a thorough intellectual training, irrespective of poverty or wealth. That the plants of knowledge may flourish in our intellectual garden, they must be early fostered by the hand of educated mothers. That the mothers of the next generation may be educated mothers, we must educate our sisters and daughters; and that all may share in this benefit, we must feel that we have a common interest in each other, and we must allow that feeling to act, act understandingly and perseveringly.

Yours with Christian love,

JAMES R. IRISH,
GURDON EVANS.

JEWS CHANGING THEIR SABBATH.—About one year ago, a company of Jews in Frankfort concluded to keep their Sabbath on Sunday instead of Saturday. The fact was trumpeted by the religious press all over the land, and talked about as a triumph of the "Christian Sabbath" over the "Jewish Sabbath." But in a few months the real state of the case came to light, and put an end to this rejoicing. It proved that the Jews, who had been so much applauded, were more infidels than Jews, and had transferred their Sabbath from the Saturday to the Sunday, not for conscience's sake, but for the sake of saving themselves the inconvenience of keeping a different day from their neighbors. Another case has just occurred, which we presume will turn out about as well. It is stated among the items of foreign intelligence received by the last steamer, that a portion of the Jewish population of Konigsberg, said to number about 700, have agreed to change the day of their Sabbath, and keep the Sunday with the mass. No doubt it will be a subject for congratulation among a large class of professing Christians. But it strikes us, that under existing circumstances it would be quite as well to wait a while, and see how this matter turns out, before saying much in favor of the movement.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.—We have received the Tenth Annual Report of the American and Foreign Bible Society, presented at New York, May 11, 1847. The pamphlet contains, besides the Report, the Minutes of the Annual Meeting, a List of Auxiliary Societies, Life Directors and Members, and Addresses, Correspondence, &c. This Society has its attention directed to the importance of furnishing a correct translation of the Scriptures for distribution in China. It seems that the first translation of the Bible into the Chinese tongue was the work of the Baptist Missionary Marshman. But his work was imperfectly done, because done at a distance from China. Several other efforts have been made, but none of the translations are regarded by Baptists as faithful. They desire, therefore, to have one prepared which they can circulate with confidence. The importance of the undertaking must be evident to every one who considers that the Chinese are peculiarly fond of books, and that there is no act on the part of the missionaries which so surprises them as the gratuitous distribution of the Scriptures. The idea that it is not done in quest of money, but for the welfare of their souls, awakens their admiration, and draws from them the confession, that the doctrine which produces such fruit must be good. We are glad to notice in the list of Vice Presidents of this Society the name of Bro. Eli S. Bailey, of Brookfield, N. Y.

SINGULAR OFFENCE.—Mr. Roussel, writing to the N. Y. Evangelist from Paris, states that he has before him the prospect of a trial for a singular offence, which shows the state of religious, or rather the absence of religious freedom, in that boasted land of refinement and civilization. Last year Mr. Roussel sent to the 32,000 curates of France, copies of a tract entitled an "Appeal to the Priests." Some of these were seized from him by the powers that be. At length a prosecution has been commenced against him, as he says, "for insulting the Catholic religion and its priests, by counseling them to abandon a profession which they exercise against their conscience." He counts, however, on an acquittal.

METHODIST BOOK CONCERN.—According to a report presented to the late Philadelphia Conference, it seems that the Book Concern of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in the city of New York, has a capital, after deducting all liabilities, of $627,215. The branch located in Cincinnati has a capital of $163,724. Together, their capital is $790,957. Of the proceeds of the business from this capital, the dividends made for the benefit of superannuated and worn-out preachers, their widows, orphans, &c., is the present year $500 to each Conference, numbering in all 23, without including the Liberia or German missions, making the entire appropriation of $11,500, or something less than two per cent. on the nett capital stock of the whole concern.

CHURCH UNION.—Something like a hundred years ago, when State patronage began to exercise a baneful influence on the popular religion of Scotland, a few eminently pious ministers abandoned their benefices, and formed what has since been known as the Secession Church. On the 13th of May last, at a great meeting in Edinburg, the Relief Church, another off-shot from the Scottish establishment, was united with the Secession Church, and henceforth they will be known as "The United Presbyterian Church" of Scotland. The number of congregations thus united is about five hundred. They are distinguished by being entirely independent of State bounty.

ROMAN CATHOLICS AND SECRET SOCIETIES.—We learn from one of our exchanges, that at the Roman Catholic Council held at Baltimore, it was decreed that no member of the Romish Communion should belong to any secret society whatever, under pain of excommunication. The Romish Council is the highest ecclesiastical tribunal in the United States, and its decrees are of course binding upon all their members. If carried into execution, it will strike a heavy blow upon secret societies.

PREJUDICE AGAINST MISSIONARIES IN CANTON.—A letter from Mr. Roberts, Baptist Missionary at Canton, China, says that the field for labor there is vast, and the people numerous enough to engage the energies of a multitude of missionaries. But it is difficult to obtain houses for them. Mr. Roberts and Dr. Devan are the only persons who have been able to get houses. One of the missionaries had been to see twenty-five places, and had failed in every case. He thought the prospect gloomy for foreigners to get houses in Canton. Mr. Roberts, however, has more courage, and does not despair of getting houses, if more means and missionaries can be supplied.

CONSECRATION OF A HEBREW SYNAGOGUE.—On sixth-day last, the new Hebrew Synagogue in Wooster street, New York, was consecrated to the worship of Almighty God. The minister, Rev. Mr. Isaacs, delivered a discourse on the occasion, from the 6th, 7th and 8th verses of the 26th Psalm, which is well spoken of by those who attended. At the conclusion of the religious exercises, a subscription was opened to assist in paying for the edifice, to which the rich and the poor, each according to his own notions of duty, subscribed with uncommon liberality.

CHEERING RESULT.—There has been another Floral Exhibition in Philadelphia for the benefit of the Robert Raikes Union School. The ladies and children engaged in the enterprise with great animation for several days, and the result was that some twelve hundred dollars was raised, which will constitute a fund for the prosecution of this enterprise of pure and elevated philanthropy.

VISIT OF THE PRESIDENT.—The President of the United States visited this city on sixth-day last, and remained until second-day. He was received with the usual marks of respect, such as military parades, the firing of cannon, and feasting. His tour is to be continued east and north, to New Haven, Hartford, Springfield, Worcester, Boston, Lowell, Concord, Portsmouth, Portland, and perhaps Augusta.

SAILING OF MSSIONARIES.—A new band of missionaries, Rev. Messrs. Benton, Cochran, and Bliss, with their wives, and Miss Mary S. Rice, under the care of the American Board, sailed June 21, from Boston for Malta.

DOMESTIC SLAVERY CONSIDERED AS A SCRIPTURAL INSTITUTION: in a Correspondence between the Rev. Richard Fuller, of Beaufort, S. C., and the Rev. Francis Wayland, of Providence, R. I.

Such is the title of a neatly-printed volume of 254 pages, published by Lewis Colby & Co., of 122 Nassau-st., New York. The importance of the subject, combined with the character of the writers, can hardly fail to secure for this book a great number of readers. It has already reached the fifth edition, which is a very good indication of the estimation in which it is held.

ANOTHER BOOK BY EMILY CHUBBUCK.—Lewis Colby & Co., have just published another book by Emily Chubbuck, (now Mrs. Judson,) entitled "Allen Lucas, the Self-made Man." It is a good story, charmingly told, and conveys a lesson which it would benefit every body to read.

THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW for May has been re-published by Leonard Scott & Co., of 79 Fulton-street. It contains articles "On the Whole Doctrine of Final Causes," "Natural History and Origin of Dogs," "State of Scottish Towns," "Lord Lovat," "Popular Serial Literature," "Madagascar, Medina, Tahiti," "Painless Operations in Surgery," "The New Planet Neptune," "Political Economy of a Famine," &c.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE for June has been republished with their usual promptness by L. Scott & Co., of 79 Fulton-st. It contains articles on "North America, Siberia, and Russia," "Letters on the Truths contained in Popular Superstitions;" "Constantinople, and the Declining state of the Ottoman Empire;" "A Turkish Watering Place;" "Pacific Rovings;" "The Nutritive Qualities of Bread now in Use," &c., &c. It is a rich number.

MODEST, BUT PRAISEWORTHY.—On the 15th of June, Prof. Sears, of Newton Theological Seminary, received the following anonymous letter, enclosing three bank notes of $1,000 each:—

——"June 10, 1847.

"REV. AND DEAR SIR,—I wish you to put two of the enclosed notes to the subscription for a permanent fund for the support of the President of your Institution, if not already full; if that should be the case, then apply the amount to the general purposes of the Institution. The other note is for the benefit of the A. B. M. Union; and allow me, my dear sir, to say, be careful of the great missionary cause; be kind and tender to all who embark in this great and responsible enterprise; * * * * and may Christ, the great head of the church, prosper and abundantly bless your efforts in his cause.

A."

The (New School) General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States has addressed letters to the churches in Ireland and Scotland, in reply to their remonstrance against the countenance given by it to slavery, stating that it does not deem farther communications on that topic necessary.

Under the title of "The Presbyterian Church in America," a new church was founded in Cincinnati a few weeks ago, which adheres to the old standards, but resolves that slaveholders and the advocates of slavery cannot be received into its communion.

General Intelligence.

WAR NEWS.

The intelligence received from the seat of war during the past week relates principally to the depredations of the guerilla parties upon our trains conveying provisions and money. The guerilla war seems to have fairly commenced, and now that it is reduced to a system proves exceedingly annoying to our forces. Robbery and murder have become legalized, and every species of atrocity is practiced.

A large train of 125 wagons and 600 pack mules, having in charge $225,000 in specie, left Vera Cruz for Puebla on the 4th of June. It was attacked by the Mexicans, and a large quantity of provisions, but no money, taken; Gen. Cadwallader came to their rescue, with a force of 800 men, and repulsed the enemy, killing many of them. It is said that the Mexicans lost more than 100 men, while our loss was 15 killed and 30 or 40 wounded.

A fight occurred between sixty of the advanced guard of Doniphan's force, and one hundred Camanches, 20 miles from Parras. One Missourian was wounded. Seventeen Indians were killed and several wounded. Six Mexican boys and two women were retaken and liberated.

Gen. Scott was at Puebla at the last accounts. Gen. Taylor was expected soon to march on San Luis, and thence to the Capital.

The prospect of a speedy peace is now regarded by the best judges, as very small. Indeed there is reason to doubt whether any cessation of hostilities can reasonably be expected until one party or the other is annihilated.

A Discarded Card-Player.—M. Gudin, an officer in the royal household of Louis Philippe, has been banished to this country for cheating in cards. So our republican imitators of royalty must look out. His tricks had been a good while suspected, and it is said that the Duchesse d'Aumale, one of the Princesses, remarked to him one day, "You are very lucky, sir; but take care, you are watched."

He was watched. On the Saturday of Chantilly, he was invited to a grand party at lansquenet, a game in which there is a particular temptation to cheat by adding cards. He won three hundred louis and retired, alledging that his duty called him to the prince, but he would return as soon as he should be disengaged. As soon as he was gone, the cards were counted which he had been dealing, and it was found he had added several. To trap him, another pack was counted, and the number set down and certified. On his return they were delivered to him, and he played with his usual success. When he had exhausted the cards, the spokesman of the party said to him, "Sir, these cards were counted in advance. We suspect you of having added to them." On re-counting it appeared he had added twenty-six! The next morning he had the hardihood to present himself on duty at the chateau, when the prince ordered him to send in his resignation in a quarter of an hour, and leave immediately for America. Such an immigrant as this, we think a fair subject for Native American indignation. Let him be sent back to the Christian Princes who educated him.

The Siecle says the "culprit was pushed into the fatal road to satisfy the prodigality of a lioness—who belongs neither to the Opera, nor to the parish of Notre-Dame de Lorette, as some vulgar souls might suppose, but who herself, also occupies a brilliant position in the most aristocratic society." [Chronotype.

Emancipating Slaves by Thousands.—A number of the Democratic Pacifique, received by the Cambria, contains a highly interesting letter from its correspondent at St. Petersburg, dated 13th May, from which it appears that the work of abolishing slavery in Russia has just taken a vast step, thanks to the generosity, as noble as it was unexpected, of M. Ruminn, one of the principal proprietors of that country.

Yielding to the impulse of a noble heart, this wealthy individual has suddenly granted complete enfranchisement to eight thousand serfs of both sexes, who belonged to him in the Governments of Nijui and Riazan, and what is more admirable in his conduct is, that completing his work of charity, he has abandoned to this population, restored to liberty by him, for a trifling rent, the enjoyment of the domains over which they are diffused. This double deed of charity has, moreover, been accomplished with a simplicity which still farther enhances its merit.

Law of Periodicals.—1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, are considered as wishing to continue their subscriptions.

2. If subscribers order the discontinuance of their periodicals, the publisher may continue to send them until all arrearages are paid.

3. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their periodicals from the offices where they are directed, they are held responsible till they have settled their bills, and ordered their papers discontinued.

4. If subscribers move to other places without informing the publisher, and the periodical is sent to the former direction, they are held responsible.

5. The Courts have directed that refusing to take a periodical or paper from the office, or removing and leaving it uncalled for, is prima facie evidence of intentional fraud.

Rochester was visited soon after midnight Tuesday morning, with a thunder storm of unusual violence. Several of the shocks were so heavy as to shake the houses like an earthquake. One bolt descended with fatal effect upon the house of Mr. Wm. Matthews, 28 Wilder-st., killing three persons, Mr. Matthews, his wife and daughter.

Rev. Dr. Breckenridge has resigned the Presidency of Jefferson College, in Canonsburgh. His place is to be supplied by Rev. Dr. Baird, a gentleman well known for his Lectures on Europe.

SUMMARY.

The following specimen of female spirit was displayed in Louisiana a few days since. A young man, who was dissipated, succeeded in gaining the affections of a young lady, and the promise of her hand if he would reform. He promised to do so, and behaved so well that the lady married him. After the ceremony, his friends made him drunk, when the bride refused to have any thing farther to do with him, and retired to single blessedness again, and to this hour remains firm in her determination to neither see or live with her husband.

We understand that in addition to the various arts which are pursued at the N. Y. State Lunatic Asylum, a printing press has been recently set up, and some first impressions already worked off. There are a number of practical printers in the institution of course, for they are every where. We have no doubt the printing office will be a powerful rival of the whittling school. There have been papers published at the Asylum for some time in several of the halls, evincing wit and talent that would entitle them to a respectable circulation, but they have been in manuscript.

The efforts made by the city authorities of Paris, during the past six months, to relieve the poor, have been very great. The object to which they aimed has been to enable the poor to obtain bread at a cheaper rate than the market price. They have already expended eleven hundred thousand dollars, and nearly four hundred thousand more will be required before harvest. On the first of May there were 422,410 persons, in a population of 945,731, who were numbered as receiving bread tickets. This is almost one-half the population of the whole city.

The Warsaw (Ill.) Signal of the 12th inst., states that the Mormon Temple has been sold to a Committee of the Catholic Church, for the sum of $75,000; and that the purchasers had also bought some considerable other property in the city. The contract for the Temple, however, was so far incomplete, as to require the ratification of the Bishop. It is understood that the building is to be appropriated to educational purposes connected with the Church into whose hands it has passed.

A fatal accident occurred in Front street, Philadelphia, on Saturday morning. While a number of workmen were engaged in raising a large piece of granite to the second story of one of the buildings being erected there, the arch of a large and deep vault gave way, and fell with an awful crash, burying beneath it a laborer by the name of Caswell. Measures were promptly taken to remove the rubbish, but the body of the unfortunate man was not reached until near five o'clock in the afternoon. He must have been instantly killed.

The health of John Quincy Adams has much improved since his return from Washington. He walks daily without the assistance even of a cane, a greater or less distance, according to the weather or inclination. He has the complete use of his faculties, mental and physical, and takes as much interest as ever in all the occurrences of life.

The jail of Mason Co., Ky., was destroyed by fire on the night of the 14th ult. It was fired by a prisoner named Cummings, under sentence for one year. He did not succeed in effecting his escape, but was indicted, the court being in session, for house-burning, and sentenced for fourteen years longer.

A physician, while engaged in writing at his dwelling, a few evenings since, was aroused by a loud noise very near him, like the report of a musket. On looking up, he perceived that a valuable looking-glass plate, very large and thick, was split across, a foot or more from the bottom. It was soon after discovered, that the plate was broken by the heat of a solar lamp which stood near it in front.

A young man was recently drawn into the current above the Niagara Falls, and though not a hundred yards from the shore, he was carried over, notwithstanding his struggle for life. His efforts kept the boat stationary for some time, but nature gave, out and he leaped into the river. The shattered remnants of his frail craft were found below the falls.

Augustus G. Vail was arrested in Albany for some offence committed in Rochester. The telegraph noted his arrest—when Rochester replied 'hold on to him.' A few hours, the line again replied, 'let him go; we've examined witness—he's innocent.' He took up his knapsack, bound for New York and the war. But for the telegraph, he must have been a prisoner several days.

In the packet-ship Washington Irving, which sailed from Boston some days since, went passenger a young shoemaker from Quincy, under contract for one year, to take charge of a shoe factory in Liverpool, to instruct the operatives in the making of pegged boots and shoes—an art which they do not understand in England yet.

Dr. Amos Binney, late President of the Boston Society of Natural History, died at Rome on the 18th of February. He left a legacy of $10,000 on condition that $20,000 more should be raised for the purpose of procuring a suitable building for the objects of the Society.

One Drayton, an apothecary's clerk in New York, is in prison, for selling laudanum under the name of syrup of rhubarb, thus giving a dose which proved fatal to Mrs. Ann Hart.

The number of railroad trains arriving and departing daily from the Salem station, is sixty-one—counting the through trains once only. This number is said to be unequaled at any other railroad station in the country.

Strawberries, it is said, have recently been more abundant than ever in Cincinnati. One cultivator had 100 pickers engaged on 60 acres, who gathered some 100 bushels a day.

More than $150,00 have been received by the N. Y. Relief Committee, and invested in provisions, and nearly the whole has been already delivered to the poor of Ireland.

The United States Gazette establishment is to be merged into the North American, the price paid for it being $45,000.

Francis Fauvel Gouraud, celebrated for his phonographic and other theories, died at Brooklyn on the 15th, aged 39.

The Perry (N. Y.) Democrat says that that neighborhood has been so thoroughly drained of wheat that it has been somewhat difficult to find enough for home consumption of late. A week or two ago, a farmer of our acquaintance in view of the foregoing circumstances—and when all others held their wheat at from $1 75 to $2—placed a lot in R. H. Smith's mill, in this village, expressly to accommodate the poor and mechanics of the neighborhood—giving directions to the miller not to charge over $1 50 per bushel, nor let any one person have more than two to three bushels for their own use.

The N. Y. Tribune says that after a discussion which has extended through seven special meetings, and furnished an arena for the exhibition of the highest skill and talent on both sides, the Boston Prison Discipline Society has laid on the table the resolutions which involved the merits of the Separate (Philadelphia) and Congregate (Auburn) Systems of Discipline. It seems to be agreed on all hands, that the discussion has done good in awakening attention to a subject hitherto greatly neglected, and in placing before the people facts and principles which must eventually form the basis of a decision as to the merits of the two systems.

The National Era says that although from a few localities reports concerning the crops are unfavorable, generally the accounts are such as lead us to anticipate an abundant harvest. Though the produce may not be as much in proportion, yet so vast has been the additional quantity of seed put in, that the absolute produce will be far greater, we predict, than the country has yet witnessed. Thank Heaven, there is little hope for speculators, but much for the poor.

A Philadelphia correspondent, in a note dated June 18th, says: "The proper authorities yesterday paid over to the trustees of the Pennsylvania Hall Association the sum of $27,943 77, being the amount of the judgment obtained against the county of Philadelphia, with interest, for damages occasioned by the burning of the Pennsylvania Hall, in May, 1837."

Mr. F. O. J. Smith, the Director of the Telegraph, says that in a short time he expects to have the wires of the Telegraph reach Halifax, thereby bringing England nearer to us by at least two days. So that we may safely calculate upon obtaining foreign news within ten days of the time of the steamer's leaving England.

A shoe manufacturer, who had made a contract to supply shoes for the army at $1 05 per pair, had a large lot of them condemned as unsuitable by the Government Agent in Philadelphia. A Yankee packed them up and started off South, and sold them to another Government Agent for $1 50 per pair.

John Finkle was tried at Hudson for assault and battery, with intent to kill, found guilty, and sentenced to two years and two months in the Penitentiary at Sing Sing. He was taken to prison on Wednesday. This is the third of the name of Finkle sent to prison for the same offence. There are two more of the name under indictment.

The colored people of Western New York have made arrangements for celebrating the anniversary of the Abolition of Slavery in the British West Indies on the 2d of August next. Addresses will be delivered by Frederick Douglass, C. L. Remond, S. R. Ward, and H. H. Garnet. The celebration will take place at Canandaigua.

It is estimated that the receipts of flour, wheat, and corn, at Troy and Albany, during the month of May, were as follows: Flour 650,000 barrels; wheat 250,000 bushels; corn 930,000 bushels.

The Watertown Journal says that the officers of the Bank of Watertown intend to make arrangements to continue the redemption of their notes at the Exchange Bank at Albany.

This season (May and June) 29,248 settlers from Europe had reached Quebec and Montreal up to last Monday, and many more were at Quarantine. They are chiefly from Ireland and England.

A man named Turney was recently hung at Toronto, Canada, who confessed upon the scaffold that the murder for which he was about to suffer the penalty of the law, was the sixth which he had committed in the course of a few years.

Six men were drowned from a boat containing 16 men and a yoke of oxen, a few days since, on Des Plains river. The boat was upset by the oxen becoming unmanageable and rushing to its edge.

Dandridge Eppes, who murdered Mr. Muir near Petersburg, Va., a year or two ago, and who was erroneously reported to have recently been arrested in New Orleans, is now said to be residing in Texas near San Antonio.

The Bible Society of Virginia have authorized the presentation of Bibles to such colored members of the Baptist Church as are able to read and unable to purchase them. Very few of the slaves, if any, are able to read.

Three thousand volunteers have already been killed, or have died in Mexico. In the late war with England only 1,334 were killed, and 1,673 wounded.

There are nearly 30,000 persons in the State of Illinois, upwards of 20 years of age, who cannot read.

Hon. Harman Denny, of Pittsburgh, has presented to that city eleven acres of land, valued at $11,000, as a location for a hospital.

The New-Orleans Southerner states that there is good reason to believe that Gen. Taylor will return to the United States in about a month, on a temporary leave of absence.

Within the last six months, 182,544 barrels of flour, and 1,355,560 bushels of corn, have been received at Boston, by the western railroad.

More than 300 dollars were paid in fines for the violation of the license law at the term of the court recently held at Amherst, N. H.

The Missionary Herald tells us that in all Africa, in 1843, there were 170 mission stations, 434 laborers, 15,068 communicants, and 20,090 scholars.

The Nashville Whig states that the Second Regiment of Mississippi Rifles has lost by sickness, small pox, &c. 156 of its number.

The Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger says: The death of Mr. Beasley, our late Consul to Havre, has brought a number of distinguished strangers to town. They are thus far principally from Georgia and Tennessee. He leaves it to the imagination of his readers to divine what these "distinguished strangers" come for!

From the official statement of the affairs of the Plainfield Bank, made by the Receivers, which we find in full in Thompson's Bank Note Reporter, it appears that the entire assets of every kind amount to $266,344, and the liabilities to $127,245, of which $125,146 is in circulation, as near as can be ascertained. Of the assets, $126,000 are in the notes or endorsements of M. Y. Beach & Sons.

Capt. Canot, a well-known African slave-dealer, and the owner of one of the most extensive slaving establishments on the coast, was arrested in this city, where he had been for some days, by officer Smith, a Deputy United States Marshal, for having fitted out at this port, in December last, a vessel for the slave trade, in which he himself went out to Africa as a passenger.

As long since as 1751, Mr. Richard Dunhorne, of Cambridge, on computing the course of the comet of 1556, said he was led to the conclusion that the two were identical, and that its return might be expected about 1848. Subsequent investigations confirm this conclusion—and there is, therefore, good reason to look for the reäppearance of this comet during the year 1848.

The Little Rock (Arkansas) Gazette, says that the farmers in that State commenced reaping their wheat the latter part of May, and the crop is represented to be a very good one. The editor says the heads of the wheat grown in that region are as large and heavy as he has ever witnessed.

The Connecticut House of Representatives have passed a bill granting a charter for the establishment of a railroad from New London to Norwich, on the west bank of the Thames, thence to Willimantic, and from that point to the Massachusetts line, in the direction of Springfield.

We find in one of our last London exchanges that a train on the New Western Railway, drawn by one of Mr. Stephenson's ordinary patent engines, attained a maximum speed of seventy-five miles an hour!

One Roman Catholic Bishop, twenty-eight priests, and six nuns, came passengers in the packet-ship Havre, to New York, a few days since. Twenty-nine other priests are on their way to the same port in the packet Splendid.

The beautiful grounds and mansion in Bordentown, belonging to the estate of the late Joseph Napoleon Bonaparte, ex-king of Spain, were sold at auction for Thirty Thousand five hundred dollars. Mr. Thomas Richards, of Philadelphia, was the purchaser. It is said that the buildings alone cost over $60,000.

The distance from Allyn's Point to Worcester, 66 miles, was run in 1 hour 52 minutes, including three stops. The engine which performed this feat is called the Col. De Witt, built by Rogers, Ketcham & Grosvenor, of Paterson, N. J., and is said to be one of, if not the very fastest, machines ever built in the United States.

Monday's Montreal Herald contains the appalling intelligence, that, during one week, up to the 13th inst. 249 immigrants had died on the cold and bleak quarantine ground of Grosse Isle, below Quebec, where 1640 were suffering from the famine fever, in hospital or afloat.

The Genesee farmer says that "the hog crop in the United States, this past year, is three times the worth of the cotton crop. The standing army of swine consume annually two hundred millions of bushels of corn."

It is stated in a New Orleans paper, that Gen. Vega is to be detained as a hostage for the safety of Midshipman Rogers, now a prisoner in Mexico, and will be executed, by orders from our government, in case violence should be done to the midshipman.

MARRIED,

In Hartsville, N. Y., June 12th, by Eld. N. V. Hull, Mr. Charles Saunders, of Alfred, to Miss Finetta Pettibone, of Hartsville.

On the 17th of June, by the same, Mr. David R. Stillman to Miss Martha Greene, all of Alfred.

In Alfred, N. Y., on the 16th ult., by H. G. Greenman, Esq., Mr. Clark Green, of Alfred, to Miss Abigail S. Green, of Andover, Allegany Co., N. Y.

DIED,

In Brookfield, N. Y., May 31st, after an illness of five days, Miss Susanna Langworthy, in the 37th year of her age. Although the death of Miss L. could scarcely have been anticipated by herself or her friends until a few hours before it occurred, still she has left to her afflicted friends the best consolation that such a severe affliction will admit. She became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield at eleven years of age, and since the organization of the second church in that town, until the time of death, was a worthy and useful member of that church. Though dead, her life will long speak a eulogy on the Christian faith.

In DeRuyter, N. Y., on the 9th of June, of inflammation on the lungs, Jonathan Coon, aged 84 years. The subject of this notice professed religion in early life, and died in hope of a blessed immortality.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

DERUYTER INSTITUTE.

SILAS S. CLARKE, Teacher of Physiology.
CAROLINE E. WILCOX, Preceptress.
M. SAMANTHA NEWTON, Assistant.
AMELIA R. CLARKE, Teacher of Instrumental Music.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First	commencing Wednesday,	Aug. 25,	and ending Dec. 1
Second	" "	Dec. 15,	" March 22
Third	" "	April 5,	" July 12

Tuition, per term of fourteen weeks,	from $3 00 to $5 00
Extras—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold th reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; a number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

President of the Board of Trustees.

Miscellaneous.

THE GOOD OLD PLOUGH.

Let them sing who may of the battle fray,
  And the deeds that have long since past;
Let them chant in praise of the tar whose days
  Are spent in the ocean vast;
I would render to these all the worship you please,
  I would honor them even now;
But I'd give far more from my heart's full store,
  To the cause of the Good Old Plough.

Let them laud the notes that the music floats,
  Through their bright and their glittering halls;
While the amorous twirl of the hair's bright curl
  Round the shoulder of beauty falls;
But dearer to me is the song from the tree,
  And the rich and blossoming bough;
Oh! these are the sweets which the rustic greets,
  As he follows the Good Old Plough.

Then how jocund the song as it comes along
  From the ploughman's lusty throat;
Did the hunter his shout ever yet give out
  To the brown woods a merrier note?
Though he follows no hound, yet his day is crowned
  With a triumph as good I trow,
As though antlered head at his feet lay dead,
  Instead of the Good Old Plough.

Full many there be that we daily see
  With a selfish and hollow pride,
Who the ploughman's lot in his humble cot,
  With a scornful look deride;
Yet I'd rather take, aye, a hearty shake
  From his hand, than to wealth I'd bow,
For the honest grasp of that hand's rough clasp
  Has stood by the Good Old Polugh.

All honor be then to these grey old men,
  When at last they are bow'd with toil;
Their warfare then o'er, why they battle no more,
  For they've conquered the stubborn soil;
And the chaplet each wears are his silver hairs,
  And ne'er shall the victor's brow,
With a laureled crown to the grave go down,
  Like these sons of the Good Old Plough.

HAYMAKING.

In the making or curing of hay, the first things to be considered are the proper periods for cutting the grass, and the length of time and modes adopted to cause it to dry. On these points, practiced men do not all agree; some preferring to cut when in full flower, by means of which, they say, they obtain more and better hay, and the crop is less exhausting to the land; while others consider it best to permit the grass to stand until the seed has just ripened sufficiently to vegetate, which will be more or less scattered for the benefit of the succeeding crop, and the hay, it is thought, is more nutritious, and consequently will afford more flesh and strength.

Lucerne and clover, undoubtedly, afford better and more hay when cut in the flower, and are better adapted for dairy stock than when cut late; but to avoid loss in weight and quality, by heat or fermentation, it is better to salt them down in the mow or stack the same day they are cut, after being exposed a few hours to a hot sun. Two bushels of salt, if uniformly scattered among the hay, are sufficient to cure three tons.

Red-Top, Timothy, and the more substantial grasses, generally are not cut before they have arrived at their full growth, at about the time they begin to ripen their seeds. If cut when in a growing state, the unripe juices of the plant are apt to bring on violent heat and fermentation; and thus deprive the crop of much of its substance and nourishment. The truth of this has been confirmed by the observations of Mr. Isaac Reeves, of Delaware, who is of opinion that, by mowing these grasses before they are ripe, the roots bleed and die out, and that this is the reason why a second crop does not spring up for a long time after. "I once," said he, "purchased the fifth part of a crop of Timothy on one of the islands in the Delaware, with the intention of cutting my lot at the same time the other four purchasers did theirs, but I was called from home, and it was not done until the seeds would vegetate. I thought my hay was spoiled; but it was preferred to that of all others for horse-feed; and behold, the next year, my lot of land yielded double the crop of the others, and at the end of three years, it had increased to two and a half tons to the acre, overgrowing all the other grasses, having a uniform crop five feet in height, and preferred before all others at the market. Since that, I have never cut Timothy before the seeds will just vegetate; and I would take a poor field, that shows only a few spires of Timothy growing in it, and by these simple means, engage, in five years, to cut two and a half tons per acre, of superior hay, provided the land be suitable to the growth of the crop."

"With regard to the best mode of making hay, there also prevail various opinions. One class of farmers never move their hay out of the swath on the day it is cut, but on the second day, shake all that was cut on the day previous, by giving it two turnings. If shaken the day it is cut, they say the hay is reduced by the heat of the sun; but by leaving it in the swath, it "soaks its own sap," and will be reduced very little afterwards. The more of the natural juice or moisture that can safely be left in the hay, the less, they say, will it suffer from that portion of the loss which arises from the drying. Another class contend that the more quickly the drying is effected, the less extensive will be the change in the starch of the plants; and consequently the hay will retain more of its substance in a soluble or digestible state. The last assertion would seem to be correct, from observations made in England some time since on the two modes of drying hay. In the dales of Yorkshire, where great attention is given to the frequent turning of the hay, and the consequent increased rapidity of drying it, the cattle can be fattened upon hay alone, which is said to be rarely the case in Scotland; on the Tweed, where the process is more slow, occupying three or four days.

The plan generally adopted in the United States, and the one which long experience seems to justify, is to mow during the early part of a fair day, while the dew is on the grass, say until nine, ten, or eleven o'clock; then spread and turn the hay; towards evening rake it up into cocks of about 100 pounds each; and if the weather be very dry and hot, draw it to the barn or stack the same day. But if the crop is very heavy and green, it is suffered to remain in the cock over night, and about eleven o'clock the next forenoon, it is opened or spread, and four or five hours after is conveyed to the stacks. A Curious Calculation.—What is a billion? The reply is very simple, a million times a million. This is quickly written, and quicker still pronounced; but no man is able to count it.—You may count 160 or 170 in a minute; but let us even suppose that you may go as far as 200; then an hour will produce 12,000, a day 280,000, and a year of 365 days, 195,120,000. Let us suppose now that Adam, at the beginning of his existence, had begun to count, had continued to do so, and was counting still; he would not even now, according to the usually supposed age of our globe, have counted near enough. For to count a billion he would require 9,512 years, 34 days, 5 hours and 39 minuets.

DWELLINGS FOR THE POOR IN VILLAGES.

A company has been formed in London, with a capital of £200,000, for the purpose of building villages in healthy situations, within a short distance of the metropolis, and accessible by railways. They will consist of tasteful cottages and gardens, at from four to eight miles from London, built on an average of eight or ten to the acre, giving to each resident a good garden. The plan will afford charming residences at reduced rents, including railway fare daily to and from home, to persons of moderate income, who now pay comparatively high rents in crowded and unhealthy districts of the city.

Each village will be laid out in attractive style, with a church, school, lecture and reading rooms, play grounds, bath and wash houses, and such other establishments as are requisite to furnish the necessaries of life at a cheap rate and of the best quality; the rents are not greater than will be sufficient to pay a clear interest of 7 1-2 per cent. on the capital; of which 2 1-2 will be reserved for repairs, &c., and the balance paid to stockholders.

The stock is divided into shares of £5 each; this will afford a good opportunity to the tenants to invest their savings, with the solid security of receiving five per cent. interest and a preference in the allotment of houses; while they will get their rent at one-third or one-half the amount generally paid by them, for miserable dwellings in cities. The cottages will be of different styles and prices, embracing all the improvements and conveniencies of modern architecture. Provision is made for the purchase of houses by the tenants, at a small advance on cost, when desirable.

Several Railway Companies have acceded to the terms offered by the Association, and land is freely offered on eligible terms. The plan seems to be well digested and unexceptionable, and has the patronage of several of the nobility and members of Parliament. Farther details can be seen in the London People's Journal—a periodical devoted, with a praiseworthy and consistent zeal, to the amelioration, in physical as well as moral respects, of the condition of the poor.

YANKEE MODE OF TESTING COURAGE.

It is well known that in the time of the old French war, much jealousy existed between the British and Provincial officers. A British Major, deeming himself insulted by General (then Captain) Putnam, sent a challenge. Putnam, instead of giving him any direct answer, requested the pleasure of a personal interview with the Major. He came to Putnam's tent, and found him seated on a small keg, quietly smoking his pipe, and demanded what communication, if any, Putnam had to make. 'You know,' said Putnam, 'I'm but a poor miserable Yankee, that never fired a pistol in my life, and you must perceive that if we fired with pistols, you would have an undue advantage of me. Here are two powder kegs; I have bored a hole, and inserted a slow match in each! If you will be so good as to seat yourself there, I will light the matches, and he who dares to sit the longest without squirming, shall be called the bravest fellow.' The tent was full of officers and men, who were heartily tickled with the strange device of the 'old wolf,' and compelled the Major by their laughter to squat. The signal was given, and the matches lighted. Putnam continued smoking quite indifferently, without watching at all the progressive diminution of the matches—but the British officer, though a brave fellow, could not help casting longing and lingering looks downward, and his terror increased as the length of the matches diminished. The spectators withdrew, one by one, to get out of the way of the expected explosion. At length the fire was within an inch of the keg; the Major, unable to endure longer, jumped up, and drawing out his match, cried out, 'Putnam, this is wilful murder; draw out your match; I yield.' 'My dear fellow,' cried Putnam, 'don't be in such a hurry, they're nothing but kegs of onion seeds!'

SOCIAL SYSTEM IN JAPAN.

The great characteristic of political society in Japan, is that every appointment and profession is hereditary, whence the absence of all those moving impulses to individual ambition, which animate and convulse society in Europe. The population of the country is divided into eight classes, viz: the reigning princes or governors, the nobility, the priesthood, military, civil officers, merchants, artisans, and laborers. There is one solitary profession, which seems, like the Parias of India, to form a caste beyond the pale of society—and this is the profession of a tanner. All intercourse with tanners is avoided as well as forbidden; and this class supplies the public with executioners. The Japanese female enjoys scarcely less freedom than the European; she is the presiding deity at all festivals, and the ornament of social life. The samsie or guitar, is to the younger branches of the gentle sex, what the piano forte is to our unmarried country women, and there are few who neglect to acquire the art of playing upon it. Agriculture and manufactures are in as advanced a state in Japan as in any Eastern country. Telescopes, thermometers, watches, and clocks of excellent quality, are made at Nagastei. I have seen a clock which was twelve feet in length and three in breadth; it was embellished with a landscape of neatly varied features, and a golden sun; when striking the hour, a bird flapped its wings, a mouse emerged from a hole and climbed a hill, while a tortoise crept slowly along for the purpose of marking the hour on the face. In Queen Anne's time drunkenness was rather popular than otherwise. In the manuscripts of the British Museum, there is a letter from the private Secretary of the celebrated Dutchess of Marlborough, addressed to the Pope, which began thus, "Sir, my lady the Dutchess being drunk, was unable to see you when you called yesterday." Temperance societies were unknown in those days.

GUILT SOMETIMES MAKES CHILDREN AFRAID.

Charles and Maria were brother and sister. Charles was about five years old, and his sister was about three. Their parents were pious, and gave them good instruction. They had often told them that God loved good children, and would take care of them. One evening little Charles forgot himself, and told his little sister that there was a bear out by the wood-house, and that if she went out after dark he would catch her.

His mother, happening to overhear this conversation, called him to her, and said, "Charles, what have you been telling your sister? You know, my child, there is no bear any where about here. How often have I told you that bears live in the woods, and not in such a place as this; so you have told your litttle sister what you knew was not true. Now you have displeased God, and I must punish you for it." So she told him he must go out in the dark to the wood-house, and fetch in a pail.

Charles began to weep, and said he was afraid to go after the pail. I do not suppose he was afraid of any bear, for he knew there was none to fear, but he had displeased God, and was afraid he would not take care of him in the dark. But his little sister, who was a good child, and knew she had not been guilty of telling a lie, was not afraid to go; she started up, and said, "Come, Charley, I'll go with you, and I think God will take care of us." It would have done your heart good to see this little creature take her brother by the hand, and to hear her encourage him to hope that God would take care of them. They went out and brought in the pail, and I do not recollect that I have heard little Charles tell an untruth since it happened. [S. S. Advocate.

A FEARFUL HISTORY.

The following is the history of eight families in one town, the heads of which used intoxicating liquor:—

The first had one child, a daughter. A great sum was expended on her education. She died from the effects of strong drink.

The second had an only son. He was educated with great care and great expense, but was killed by wine.

The third had four sons and one daughter. The daughter is a drunkard, and one son has gone to the drunkard's grave.

The fourth had three sons. One died of intemperance, one was killed in a duel, and the other is a drunkard.

The fifth had one son who killed himself by drinking, and two step-sons who are drunkards on wine.

The sixth had five sons. Two are dead through intemperance, and another is a drunkard.

The seventh had five sons. Four are drunkards, and one through the influence of liquor is an idiot.

The eighth had five sons and three nephews. Four of the sons have been killed by alcohol, and the fifth is a drunkard, and the three nephews are in the drunkard's grave.

Thus the sin of drinking and its punishment go from parents to children, sweeping many, very many to a premature grave, and rendering many more a torment to survivors.

A Ministering Angel.—In one of the letters describing incidents of the battle of Buena Vista, we find the following:

"There was one little scene on the field, which excited great sympathy. A Mexican woman was found in a gorge under one of the peaks of the mountain, having about her ten or twelve of her countrymen, five or six of whom were dead. She was endeavoring to make the beds of the living as easy as she could, by removing the stones from under them, and placing their heads upon her own person. She refused bread and water herself, tendering every thing that was offered her to the sufferers about her. It was almost the only bright spot on that bloody ground. A monument should be raised to her, which should stand as long as the battle of Buena Vista is remembered. I saw the good woman afterward in one of the wagons, with her wounded men, apparently full of joy and hope, thankful, I suppose, that she had fallen into merciful hands."

A Curious Connection.—In a family of six persons, the following relation exists, viz: 2 fathers, 2 mothers, 2 brothers-in-law, 2 sisters-in-law, 1 brother and sister, 2 uncles, 2 aunts, 3 cousins, 3 husbands, 2 wives, 3 daughters, 1 son-in-law, 1 father-in-law, 1 mother-in-law, 3 nieces, 1 grandfather, 1 grandmother. How does the relation exist?

Solution.—A man marrying his sister's daughter, becomes husband to his niece, and son-in-law to his sister, and his sister becomes his mother-in-law. His sister marries her second husband, who becomes brother-in-law, and father-in-law to his wife's brother, and he also is son-in-law to his brother-in-law. The two married couple have each a daughter, who of course are cousins, and one of the daughters is sister-in-law to her aunt, and the aunt becomes sister-in-law. The daughter is niece to her grandmother.

Prejudice against Color.—The N. Y. Tribune says that Rev. Henry H. Garnet, an educated and highly respectable colored clergyman, in passing down Lake Champlain in the steamer Saranac the other day, was not allowed to eat his dinner even at the second table. In deference to the aristocracy of the skin, he modestly waited till the first table had been cleared away, supposing that his ticket would entitle him to a place at the second without molestation. After he took his seat, however, he was ordered away, and, not choosing to feed alone, like a beast, he fasted, and perhaps prayed also, until his arrival at Burlington, for the removal of the prejudice which subjected him to so much annoyance. Mr. Garnet says that at least two who sat at the first table were so drunk that they were scarcely able to navigate. But it mattered not if they were only white.

To Cure Warts or Corns.—Take the yolk of an egg, thicken it with fine salt, which apply as a poultice at night, leaving it off in the morning. Thus continue for two or three nights, until the part affected bears a whiteish appearance; then leave it off entirely, and the wart or corn, it is said, will come out root and branch. If a little of the leaves of rue is bruised and added, it is said to be the better.

The Emperor and the Judge.—Many merchants in Russia lamented bitterly, in my hearing, the iniquitous corruption of the courts of law; and told me that no cause can ever be brought to a successful termination without a decent and proper administration of bribes. But justice even in Russia sometimes finds out the wicked, as is instanced by the following story, often told at St. Petersburgh:—A poor woman having an affair of much importance under litigation in one of the courts, was given to understand that the cause would never be brought to a satisfactory termination without a present to a senator of 20,000 roubles. Horror-struck at this, and seeing no chance for procuring the immense sum, and thus terminating the expensive lawsuit, she one day addressed the Emperor in the street, and begged him to lend her 20,000 roubles. His Majesty questioned her as to what she could want with so large a sum, and having heard her story, gave her the money, privately marked by himself. The poor woman immediately made the corrupt judge the required present. The Emperor shortly after met the senator, and begged of him to lend him some money; the wretched man, without any hesitation, put some of the spoil of the poor woman into his Majesty's hand. He recognized his own money! The senator is said to have disappeared.

Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb.—The next term in the New-York Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, will open on the first day of September next. The Legislature of the State of New-York has made provision for the education of one hundred and sixty indigent deaf mutes, who are between the ages of twelve and twenty-five years. Those who wish to avail themselves of this public provision, in the education of their children and wards, must make application to the Superintendent of Common Schools at Albany. Relative to the admission of those who are educated at the expense of their friends, the undersigned may be addressed directly. H. PRINDLE PEET,

President of the Institution.

Save your Newspapers.—A newspaper is a perfect history of the time. It is a record of events transpiring in the place of its publication, in the State, the nation, and the world. Every family should carefully preserve their newspapers, and have them bound, too, at the end of each year. They will thus have a most valuable and costly history of the world for the mere subscription to the paper and the cost of binding. Such a history carries with it a thousand interesting reminiscences. We say again preserve your newspapers, and our word for it you will never regret it.

VARIETY.

Near Fryberg, in Baden, there is a chasm in a remarkable mountain, which from the extraordinary sounds which occasionally issue from it, has been long the wonder of the simple people in the neighborhood, and is the source of much spiritual fancy. Melodious sounds issue from the tops of the fir trees, which crown the rocky heights in the neighborhood of a lovely cascade. The current of air ascending and descending through the chasm receives a counter impulse from an abrupt angle of a rock which acting on the tops of the trees forms a natural Æolian harp, the tones of which blend with the gurgling water-fall in thrilling song, wild as the waters and the wandering winds.

The following is an Indian's idea of the Trinity. He had been listening to a missionary: "When I went home," said he, "I thought and studied long upon what my white brother told. I was dark! very dark! I could not understand how one should be three, and three should be one. At last, I looked around me; I saw water ice and snow. I called the Father, water; the Son, ice; and the Holy Ghost, snow. There I could see three and one—all water yet distinctly three forms. I then understood the speech of my white brother, and the Great Spirit he worshipped."

An Irishman, who had been begging piteously, was taken up before the Warrington magistrates the other day, and, on searching him, nothing was found but a large ball of soap. He prayed they would not take that from him, as "he liked to be clean, though he was poor." The earnestness of his entreaty led the gentleman to cut the piece of soap in two, and inside was found £16 in gold.

A ring of zinck and one of copper, placed in contact around either fruit or ornamental trees, will prevent any insect from ascending and injuring them. The moment the insect touches the battery, it receives a galvanic shock, and is killed, or falls to the ground. The action of the battery is unceasing, being sufficiently powerful in either dry or wet weather. So says the Macon Journal.

Roast meat contains nearly double the nourishment of boiled, but boiled meat is better adapted to weak digestion. Frying is one of the very worst methods of dressing food, as boiling is one of the best. Baked meat has a strong flavor, is deprived of some of its nutritious qualities, and is difficult of digestion. Spices, sauces, and melted butter, should never be used by an invalid.

It is related of the great Dr. Clarke, that when, in one of his leisure hours, he was unbending himself with a few of his friends in the most playful and frolicksome manner, he observed Beau Nash coming; upon which he suddenly stopped. "My boys," said he, "let us be grave; here comes a fool."

The branches of trees, when loaded with fruit, may be kept from breaking in the following manner: Connect with cords all the heaviest branches, commencing with the lower ones, and fasten the ends to the upper part of the trunk. Branches when thus secured together cannot break. This plan is far superior to the old method of props.

The most agreeable of companions is a simple, frank man, without any pretensions to an oppressive greatness; one who loves life, and one who understands the use of it; obliging—alike at all hours; above all, of a golden temper, and as steadfast as an anchor.

It is a remarkable peculiarity with debts, that their expanding power continues to increase as you contract them.

CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE.

REV. J. T. HEADLEY, EDITOR.

THE CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE, formerly under the care of Rev. D. Mead, commences its fourth volume under the editorship of Rev. J. T. Headley, author of "Napoleon and his Marshals," "Sacred Mountains," "Letters from Italy," &c. We hazard nothing in saying that this Magazine, so deservedly popular hitherto, is destined to fill a large place in public estimation; that it will not only maintain its present enviable distinction, but earn to itself a far higher popularity, and become the companion of many a circle to which it is now a stranger, gladdening by its presence, while it exerts an influence pure, elevating, and healthful. The Editor will bend his energies to make this the most popular Magazine of the day, and while he avails himself of articles from the best writers, he will draw freely from his own exhaustless store.

It will continue to maintain its high moral tone, and nothing will be admitted into its columns which will minister to the corrupt passions and tendencies of youth, or which "the author dying would wish to blot."

The design of the Editor and Publisher is to present a Magazine containing all the facination and interest of the lighter Periodicals, while at the same time it moves in a different path, and is not exposed to the same objections. It is issued monthly, containing 32 pages of original matter, printed on fine paper, in handsome covers, with a splendid steel engraving, and a beautiful colored flower, and music, to each number, and got up in every respect in the best style of the art, making a yearly volume of 384 pages, full of choice illustrations, and forming a handsome ornament to the Parlor Table, or a rich and valuable present to a friend.

☞ Price, two dollars a year. Three copies for five dollars.

A few good, responsible agents wanted to circulate this work; to whom the best inducements will be offered.

COMMENTARY FOR THE PEOPLE!

NOW PUBLISHING, THE ECLECTIC COMMENTARY ON THE BIBLE, from the works of Henry and about one hundred other writers. The work is printed on fine paper, and with large, clear type. It will be completed in twenty-four parts, of eighty pages each, imperial size, all of which is now stereotyped. It will be beautifully illustrated by accurate views of scriptural scenes, designed especially to embellish a Commentary, and executed by the most eminent artists. Tables and charts are likewise added, where necessary, for purposes of illustration; the whole comprising as valuable a series of illustrative engravings and embellishments as have ever been united in any similar work. It may be used with any edition of the Bible. Will be published semi-monthly. Price, 25 cents per part.

The design of the Committee of the London Tract Society, under whose supervision the English work was prepared, has been to cover that ground where all evangelical denominations meet, and to make a plain and practical exposition of religious truth and duty.

This work is based on the Commentaries of Henry and Scott, and more than one hundred other writers in the various departments of Biblical Literature; the most important observations of these eminent divines being quoted, constituting a digest of the most valuable results at which the learned men of all ages have arrived in their critical study of the Holy Scriptures. Reference has been had to the wants of Sunday School Teachers, and of families engaged in the systematic study of the Scriptures.

Perhaps there never was a juncture of time when true religion more greatly needed a safeguard against attacks which are both boldly and insidiously aimed at her vital principles; perhaps true religion was never in a more perilous position between open enemies and pretended friends, than at this particular crisis; and surely never was it more incumbent than now, on every true friend of her holy precepts, every conscientious master of a household, every anxious parent, guardian and protector, to be provided with antidotes to the poison which is so unscrupulously scattered abroad, or an argument against each dangerous fallacy which is propounded to the injury and detriment of that religion, which is the faithful oracle of the Divine Creator, and the best exponent of His will.

The object of the compilers has been to provide a Commentary compact in size, moderate in price, and suited to Christians of every station, rank, and denomination.

"The family into whose hands this work comes, have in their possession a store of biblical science and practical instruction, of more value than gold. The republication is a great undertaking, and we hope it will receive an adequate support."—New York Observer.

"This Commentary has enjoyed extraordinary popularity as a practical exposition of God's Word. It differs from any other, presenting the best exegetical, illustrative and practical comments which the editors were able to select from the best scholars, on each passage, in course. The text being omitted, it is enabled to present a vast amount of learning in a small space. The sources from which it is compiled afford a perfect guaranty of its soundness, both of doctrine and interpretation, while the advantage of having the opinion of different commentators, is apparent and very great."—N. Y. Evangelist.

"We regard the Eclectic Commentary, now in course of publication by Mr. Shannon, as especially deserving the patronage of Protestant Christians. Its cheapness, beautiful finish of mechanical workmanship, and its comprehensiveness, embracing, as it does, the cream of all the commentaries, all entitle it to very high consideration."—Christian Parlor Magazine.

We have received the most favorable notices from many distinguished clergymen of various denominations of this country, and also from the press, which cannot be inserted in a newspaper advertisement on account of their length; they will be found on the cover of each part.

THE GERMAN SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.

As the Society keeps no journal, has no written history, nor humanly-composed creed, I cannot present a more acurate account of their religious character and observances than to give a simple narrative of my visit to them. I may as well here observe, however, that they have a charter obtained from the State Legislature, in which they are known as Seventh-day Baptists. It authorizes them to hold and govern the estate and the house, by bye-laws of their own adoption, which are authoritatively represented and defended by five trustees, elected by a plurality of all the votes of all the male members of the Society. And yet the State of Pennsylvania has a law to compel all its inhabitants, these chartered Seventh-day Baptists not excepted, to observe Sunday, or Lord's Day! What a contradictory, bungling piece of legislation! In these bye-laws it is made a condition of admission, that the inmates of the house shall be single persons; whether they have ever been married before or not, is not a condition. They must likewise be strict observers of the seventh-day Sabbath, and baptized persons of reputed piety. Their application for admission must be made to the trustees, who are the authorized judges of their eligibility. No vow, no promise of continued celibacy, is ever required; but the simple condition is laid down, that if they ever thereafter wish to marry, they must leave the house, as is sometimes the case, when no unkind treatment ensues, but rather a brotherly and sisterly attention to the wants of those entering the conjugal relation. No person can enter and retain independent estate or personal property; but if they bring any kind of property with them, an appraisement is made, and certificate of the same given, and should the person afterwards leave, the same or its vulue is restored without interest. If the inmate dies in the convent, or a recognized inmate of the same, all the property accrues permanently to the establishment. No wages are paid to the inmates, but all share alike the comforts of the establishment, and the charter secures the whole of the estate and its incomes to the single brethren and sisters as their property. No one, therefore, can assist out-door relations while an inmate of the house. The labors of the establishment are shared alike by all in a well-arranged series; the brethren under the direction of the Prior, or, as it simply means, Superintendent; and the sisters under the direction of the Prioress. In no respect, however, is there any preëminence of class; their offices are for order's sake only; they are in truth a band of brothers and sisters, and equals in every respect affecting their honor or happiness. There are at present fourteen sisters and nine brethren. The out-door members of the Society have no personal rights in the property of the estate; and there is no more community of interests among them, than among other denominations of Christians. The religious interests of the Society are entirely congregational—as truly republican as any other congregation of Baptists. Their officers are voluntarily elected, like ours. They do not hold, however, to paying their Pastor a stated salary; but believe that he should be voluntarily assisted as he has need. In this respect they and the Dunker Baptists are of one mind. What their practice is, year in and year out, I know not. They paid my expenses liberally and kindly.

I went from Philadelphia by railroad to Chambersburg, the county seat of Franklin county. Snowhill is fourteen miles to the south of this. Here I found Bro. John Monn, Jr., who provided me a passage in a barouch; and I put up with him that night. He is a fore-handed German farmer, and resides less than half a mile from the Snowhill house. The next day was the sixth day of the week, and the love-feast approached. A little before noon, he accompanied me to the Convent, where I was introduced to the venerable Pastor, Andrew Fahnestock, and the other members of the household. This good man has recently lost his wife by death, made a distribution of his property among his children, and now become an inmate of the convent. The house and establishment I have already described. I have only to add, that I was exceedingly pleased with its neat and clean appearance. The furniture is plain and convenient, without any superfluities or finery; and I gladly accepted their invitation to make it my home while the meetings continued, being very anxious to learn all I could. I was furnished, as every inmate is, with a separate sleeping room. During the day, little parties arrived from a distance, and likewise took up lodgings with us; and here commenced one of their religious observances. As they arrived, every brother saluted the visiting brother with a holy kiss; the sisters thus saluted the visiting sisters; brothers and sisters only shaking hands, as other Christians do. The same observance was affectionately tendered all round on their departure, when the meetings were over, on second-day morning. There was no ostentation attending this; it was performed with much simplicity as a reciprocal expression of Christian affection; indeed, I observed that if they met or parted in a public place, amidst a mixed assembly, they merely shook hands, and reserved the kiss of charity to a better opportunity. At noon all in the house dined in the hall. In the evening a supper was spread in the meeting-house for the commencement of the love-feast. Every thing, however, had been previously prepared. There was no cooking at this time, except for our coffee. Here was the first use of the vestry kitchen adjoining the meeting-house. In a cellar beneath was a well-stored larder. In the vestry itself, were vessels over fixed furnaces, for heating water, coffee, &c. The meeting-house has two front doors, and is seated with the males on one side and the females on the other. It is furnished with several settees and long narrow tables, the tables serving for their books during worship, and for meals during the love-feasts, by placing two of them together, side by side. On the back side, midway of the house, is one about eight feet long, appropriated to the ministry, there being no other pulpit in the house. I judge that between sixty and one hundred sat down to this well-prepared meal. At this and all the following meals, there was a good supply and a sufficient variety of the best household aliments, without any superfluities. They were just such meals as the best German housekeepers would provide for a friendly party, and better than that, no man need wish for. After all had fairly become seated, a blessing from the great Giver of all good was invoked by the venerable Pastor. All kept their seats, except such as served at table, until every one had finished the repast, and then a hymn was sung, in which the whole company joined. We rose from the tables and went out, enjoying the balmy air in happy conversation as we walked across that verdant meadow.

The Sabbath approached. They keep their Sabbath from evening to evening, knowing nothing of that midnight obscurity which lets the Sabbath come and go while they are wrapped in silent slumbers. They hailed its return as a glad time to their souls. All repaired, ere light was gone, to the house of God, and found the tables cleared and spread afresh with snow-white cloths, and well furnished with hymn books, music books, and the holy word of God. We sang, we prayed, and a chapter was read, on which the venerable Pastor made a short discourse, and Eld. King and myself followed; and all, I trust, felt that it was good to be there. I may remark here, that as the older members are most familiar with the German, the aged pastor officiates in that language usually. Eld. King and myself spoke altogether in English, with which all of them have some acquaintance. On Sabbath morning, the convent bell called us at ten minutes before five o'clock; at five we assembled for a morning season of worship, with some extra exercises beyond their usual morning worship. Between six and seven we breakfasted, as we supped the night before. At ten o'clock a thousand or twelve hundred people came together within and without the meeting-house; and the worship was conducted as on the preceding night. At the close of this meeting, three candidates for baptism, who had been previously accepted as such by the pastors of two of the Societies, were announced as ready to be baptized. After being suitably attired, they repaired to the baptistery, where the thronging multitude had already assembled. We sang a hymn and prayed, and Eld. Fahnestock went down into the water; the candidates, assisted by bystanding brethren and sisters, descended after him. They were females. As each reached the lower step, he took her by the left arm, and led her in to a suitable depth, where she kneeled down. It was a hot sunny day, but that pure water was cold, and at first made respiration short and labored. She applied water to the face, and he to the back of the head, waiting a moment for her to recover, and reäcquire a devout frame. Then, laying his left hand upon the fore part of the head, and his right hand upon the back, between the shoulders; he said, "Ich taufe euch im namen des Faters," and immersed the candidate, face foremost; then, raising her up to her former position, he gave time for a like recovery of self-possession, and adding, in an audible voice, "und des Sohnes," he immersed her in the same manner a second time; then, giving a like time for a similar recovery, he added, "und des Heiligen Geistes," and proceeded as before; raising her up to her first position, that is, still kneeling, and giving time for the candidate to recover, while she was yet kneeling he laid both hands upon her head, and offered a short invocation for the Spirit of God to seal this obedient handmaid as a child of God. Thus he proceeded with all the others; and the service closed much as with ourselves. There was no hurrying to see how quick it could be done; nor any apparent impatience with the candidates; both candidates and administrator seemed to act as though they believed the Saviour was near.

After they had changed their garments, the bell rang, and we sat down to dinner in the meeting-house, as we had supped and breakfasted before, with this addition, that all who attended the meeting were invited to partake as there should be opportunity. After the first company were done, there was no more religious exercises at the end of the meal. I judged that they fed seven hundred people that day, and all had enough; of course it took a considerable part of the afternoon.

When the evening was come, we sat down again, with the communion table furnished for the Lord's Supper. After we had sung and prayed, read the thirteenth chapter of John, and discoursed upon it, Elders Fahnestock and King rose from the table, laid aside their coats, went to the kitchen vestry, and girded themselves each with a long towel, and took a small tub, capable of holding three or four gallons, half filled with tepid water—(here again was seen the use of the kitchen)—returned to the brethren's side of the meeting-house, and commenced washing the saints' feet, as many as chose to permit them. Two aged sisters did the same on the female side of the house. When this was ended, they sat down again, and took the bread of the communion of the body of the Lord Jesus. After the giving of thanks, and imploring divine favor, Eld. King took the plate of bread—(it was unleavened bread in thin slices about the width and length of two fingers)—and carried it before Eld. Fahnestock, so as to stand before two of the communicants. He then, breaking one of the pieces of bread into two, gave one half to one, and the other half to the other, saying, "Nehmet, esset dass ist mein leibf, der für euch gefrachen wird; solches thut tsu meinen gedächtniss,"—(1 Cor. 11: 24)—thus doing and pronouncing this formulary each time of breaking the bread, until all the communicants had received a bit. In distributing the wine there was no difference between their mode and our own, save that the ministers carried the cups, instead of the deacons. This, however, I have seen among the first-day Baptists. Afterward we sung a hymn and went out. Thus ended the love-feast; and as the exercises of first day, Sunday, next following, were given to me to preach upon the subject of the Sabbath, I reserve that matter for another communication.

I will only add a few remarks that did not seem to be in place in the course of this brief narrative. Their hymns in German were all composed by members of their own order, and have never been given to the world. The same is true of their music, which is perfectly unique. I never before heard nor conceived of such solemn, soft, soul-stirring melodies as they make in most of their pieces. They have three volumes, of which a small edition has been printed for their own use; and I was told that there is not a light or jigging line or beat in the whole collection. They are frequently making additions in manuscript, and take great delight in making new books transcribed with the pen, and very richly ornamented pages done in the same manner; indeed, they have prefixed to one of their books Rev. 14: 3—"And they sung as it were a new song, before the throne, and before the four beasts, and the elders; and no man could learn that song but the hundred and forty and four thousand, which were redeemed from the earth." It appeared to me that their music was composed with this idea in mind throughout. Greatly as I admired it, I could not help observing that it somewhat disqualified them for a good expression in Americo-English music. Every person of genius and taste, I am confident, would well excuse the latter, after hearing a few of their melting melodious strains, with four and five parts. They have no choir, as modern congregations have. They have, however, a leader, and all, young and old, sing.

Some of the first members of the Society were truly learned men; but in cultivating the devout Christian, they have too much overlooked the importance of the intelligent; so at least it appeared to me. If, for example, they had founded a good library, and kept up a course of literary instruction, they would now have been better able to advocate their truly scriptural faith in the world. They profess to have no other guide but God's inspired Book, and to this they profess exactly to conform, omitting nothing enjoined, and adding nothing to the observances there given. Their simplicity is truly remarkable, and I believe truly pure. They are non-resistant in sentiment, which in my estimation leads them to deficiency in government, or church discipline. They however faithfully preach the righteousness of the kingdom of heaven, and tell people plainly what they ought to be and to do. They are a godly people, full of love and kindness, and are on the whole so remarkably amiable, that I am sure a true Christian who should really become acquainted with them must love them. S. D.

AN OLD POEM.

The following is an excellent translation of a Latin Poem which has received the enthusiastic encomiums of GOETHE, Dr. JOHNSON, Sir WALTER SCOTT, and other distinguished men. It is said that Dr. JOHNSON always wept in reading the 10th stanza. The Earl of ROSCOMMON expired with the 17th verse upon his lips. The original was written by a monk of the 13th century. We find the translation in the Newark Daily Advertiser. [Albany Evening Journal.

Day of wrath, that day of burning,
All shall melt, to ashes turning,
As foretold by Seers discerning.

Oh! what fear it shall engender
When the Judge shall come in splendor,
Strict to mark and just to render.

Trumpet scattering sound of wonder,
Rending sepulchers asunder,
Shall resistless summon thunder.

All aghast when Death shall shiver,
And great nature's frame shall quiver,
When the graves their dead deliver.

Book where every act 's recorded,
All events all time afforded,
Shall be brought, and dooms awarded.

When shall sit the Judge unerring,
He'll unfold all here occurring,
No just vengeance then deferring.

What shall I say that time pending?
Ask what Advocate's befriending,
When the just man needs defending?

King Almighty and all knowing,
Grace to sinners freely showing,
Save me, Fount of good o'erflowing.

Think, O Jesus, for what reason
Thou endur'dst earth's spite and treason,
Nor me lose in that dread season.

Seeking me, Thy worn feet hasted,
On the cross, Thy soul death tasted,
Let such labor not be wasted.

Righteous Judge of retribution,
Grant me perfect absolution,
Ere that day of execution.

Culprit-like, I—heart all broken,
On my cheek shame's crimson token—
Plead the pardoning word be spoken.

Thou who Mary gav'st remission,
Heard'st the dying Thief's petition,
Cheer with hope my lost condition.

Though my prayers do nothing merit,
What is needful, Thou confer it—
Lest I endless fire inherit.

Mid the sheep a place decide me,
And from goats on left divide me,
Standing on the right beside Thee.

When th' accursed away are driven,
To eternal burnings given,
Call me with the bless'd to Heav'n.

I beseech Thee prostrate lying,
Heart as ashes contrite, sighing,
Care for me when I am dying.

On that awful day of wailing,
Human destinies unveiling,
When man rising, stands before Thee,
Spare the Culprit, God of glory. A. G.

EARLY INSTRUCTION IN MUSIC.

BY REV. JOHN TODD.

Till within a short time, the opinion has been almost universal, that but few could be taught to sing; that the talent for music was a peculiar gift of nature, bestowed upon only a few, and they, favored ones, were to have it to themselves. Parents have neglected their children, and unless they took up singing of themselves, have decided that, unfortunately, their children had no ear for music. The opinion has become so common, that but a small part of our congregations even pretend to sing, or think they can. Nor can they as they now are; but would it have been so if the proper pains had been taken with their childhood? How much pains do parents take to teach their children to speak correctly? Had children no better opportunity to hear speaking, or of being taught to speak, than they have to learn to sing, would any more be able to speak? I shall not say that every child who can speak might sing; but I believe the exceptions are very rare. Allow me to present a few facts on this point:—

In an orphan asylum in Germany, containing two hundred children, there are only two certainly who have not learned to sing, and that, too, correctly. These children are probably taught early and have great pains taken with them; whether this be or be not so, this fact has great weight in deciding such a question.

In all the common district schools in Germany, singing and music are taught, and every child is as much expected to sing as read and write and recite any other lesson. They are all respectable performers, and many of them proficients.

The reading of musical notation is learned even in the snow-covered huts of Iceland. In passing through the continent of Europe the traveler finds every festival, whether national or religious, graced with music. Serenades from the common people are heard every night in the streets. Music echoes from the shops, the boats, and the harvest fields. Some of the best performances of Mozart's difficult pieces are said to proceed from the privates of Prussian regiments. As a general thing, every house in Germany and Switzerland has some musical instrument.

I once stopped at a German settlement of no great size where I was invited to hear some music at the house of a mechanic. Here a small company performed, vocally and instrumentally, almost the whole of Haydn's Creation. The master of the house, a blacksmith, more than sixty years of age, took the first violin; his aged wife, in spectacles, gave us a vocal part; the eldest son, a joiner from a neighboring village, sat down at a Leipsic piano, on which, after tuning it, he executed with great skill the whole accompaniment; several young men and women filled the remainder of the score. A boy, five years of age, was pointed out to me as beginning to play on the violin. Upon inquiry, I found there was not a house in that town without a piano or some keyed intstrument. This evening's entertainment has often occurred to me, as illustrating the happy influence of music upon domestic life and social habits. If you would have young people love home, induce them to cultivate music. It will beguile many a winter night, which might otherwise be worse than wasted. Few pleasures are cheaper, or more innocent, or more within the home circle. Almost all foreigners are proficients. A few years ago a party of emigrants encamped for the night on a small eminence, about half a mile from my residence. About sunset we were surprised by the most delightful sounds wafted across the valley by those sojourners. It appeared to be their evening hymn, accompanied with horns. The effect was indescribable.

REMARKABLE CIRCUMSTANCE OF PERSECUTION.

At the time of the great persecution, in 1762, at Stalbridge, England, a report had been propagated for some weeks that on the 29th of May, at ten o'clock in the morning, all the Methodists at Stalbridge were to be hanged. William C., an old inveterate persecutor, aged about seventy, a clock and watch-maker, engaged to make three effigies, to personate Robert Sydserf, William Drew, and Ann Royal. Early in the morning of the above mentioned day, a large drum was beaten round the town, and multitudes from the neighboring villages flocking in, many hundreds were soon assembled. About ten o'clock the effigies were brought forth; and after having been carried round the town, accompanied by the beating of a muffled drum, they were brought into the market-place to be executed. While the executioner was fixing the ropes round the mock necks, the above-mentioned William C. was leaning upon the top of his staff, apparently feasting his eyes with the transaction; and, to the surprise and terror of the multitude, the instant in which the effigies were turned off, he fell to the ground, and was taken up speechless. He was carried to his house, and lived two or three days after; but he spoke no more. His own sons, who were also persecutors of the Methodists, and others who attended him, declared that, before he died, his countenance was horrible beyond description, and that his face resembled the visage of the effigies. [Lon. Ch. Mis.

THE FAITHFULNESS OF THE LORD.

A pastor named Augustus Schultz, who was settled in a village near Berlin, had a very small salary. But when occasion offered for him to give to the poor, he seemed to be rich, and gave freely. Some said that he was even extravagant in his charities. Perhaps there was some foundation for the reproach; but if he gave too much he acted from love to God, and God did not forsake him.

It happened one day—and this was not the first time—that there was not a morsel of bread in the house; nor money to buy any. The pastor Schultz asked his wife to set the table as usual. "But, my dear," said his wife to him, "you forget that we have nothing to eat." "Be easy," answered the faithful servant of God, "the Lord is able to give us what we need." The table then was set out, the cloth spread, but there was nothing upon it. The pastor and his wife prayed. During their prayer, a loaded wagon stopped before the pastor's house. It was filled with bread, and other food, which some Christian friends had sent to the good pastor, whose beneficence they knew. The servant of Christ realized then that the Lord never forgts those who trust in his goodness.

POWER OF PERSONAL HOLINESS.

Never will the church meet her solemn responsibilities, until her children, bursting asunder the shackles that bind them, and rising out of the slough of earthliness in which they are sunk, come up to that high measure of evangelical sanctification which the voice of Scripture and the exigencies of a dying world alike demand of them. There is a moral omnipotence in holiness. Argument may be resisted; persuasion and entreaty may be scorned. The thrilling appeals and monitions of the pulpit, set forth with all the vigor of logic, and in all the glow of eloquence, may be evaded or disregarded. But the exhibition of exalted piety has a might which nothing can withstand: it is truth embodied: it is the Gospel burning in the hearts, beaming from the eyes, breathing from the lips, and preaching in the lives of its votaries. No sophistry can elude it, no conscience can ward it off; no bosom wears a mail that can brave the energy of its attack. It speaks in all languages, in all climes, and to all phases of our nature. It is universal—invincible; and clad in immortal panoply, goes on from victory to victory.

* * *

A black cloud makes the traveler mend his pace, and mind his home; whereas a fair day and a pleasant way waste his time, and stealeth away his affections in the prospect of the country. However others may think of it, yet I take it as a mercy that now and then some clouds come between me and my sun, and many times some troubles do conceal my comforts; for I perceive, if I should find too much friendship in my inn, in my pilgrimage, I should soon forget my Father's honor, and my heritage. [Dr. Lucas.

* * *

Many think themselves to be truly Godfearing, when they call the world a valley of tears. But I believe they would be more so, if they called it a happy valley. God is more pleased with those who think every thing right in the world, than with those who think nothing right. With so many thousand joys, is it not black ingratitude to call the world a place of sorrow and torment? [Jean Paul Ritcher.

* * *

There is not a nobler sight in the world than an aged Christian; who, having been sifted in the sieve of temptation, stands forth as a confirmer of the assaulted, testifying, from his own trials, the reality of religion; and meeting, by warnings, and directions, and consolations, the cases of all who may be tempted to doubt it.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, July 8, 1847.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE "SABBATH UNION."

Within the last three or four years, several large pamphlets have appeared before the public, under the imposing title of "Permanent Sabbath Documents," and bearing the imprint of "The American and Foreign Sabbath Union." It is understood that these pamphlets were prepared for the press by Rev. Justin Edwards, D. D., who is, we believe, the principal agent, if not, indeed the soul and body of this vaunted "Sabbath Union." One peculiarity of the documents in question—perhaps their chief distinguishing feature—is that they argue very largely for the observance of a Sabbath from the necessities of man and the nature of things. They seem to take it for granted, that the command of God is not a sufficient basis upon which to rest the duty; hence they present an array of facts to prove that men, beasts, and things, need just one day in seven to rest—that under this system of resting one day after every six days of labor, a man can do more business, a horse can draw more loads, and a mill can grind more corn, than under any other system. Repeatedly have we alluded to this characteristic of the publications of the Sabbath Union, and expressed our conviction that their tendency is most dangerous to the interests of the sabbatic institution, because they remove it from a permanent and tried foundation to place it upon one which is no better than a heap of sand. We are more than ever convinced of the truth of this position, by reading the comments of various newspapers upon a pamphlet just issued, entitled "The Fourth Annual Report of the American and Foreign Sabbath Union." A copy of this pamphlet was sent to Elizur Wright, Jr., editor of the Boston Chronotype; and in a late number of his paper we find a long article, (which has been copied more or less into other papers,) reviewing and disproving several of the fine-spun theories of the Sabbath Union, and leaving upon the mind of the reader an impression, that after all the duty of observing the Sabbath is a very doubtful one, for which its best friends can only present some abstruse and far-fetched reasons. Another copy of this pamphlet was sent to Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Editor of the Liberator; and in his paper we find some comments upon it tending to the same result. That our readers may form a just idea of how the matter is regarded by others, we will give them a few passages from Mr. Garrison's article. After alluding to the efforts of the Union, he gives the following account of its principal agent:—

"The Rev. Justin Edwards, D. D., is the principal agent of this Union, whose interests he makes identical with his own, and who is admirably qualified for his deceptive work. The Pope of Rome has not a more sanctimonious air—(indeed, the present Pope seems to be almost human, and disposed ere long wholly to discard his divinity)—no Cardinal has a more cat-like tread, or wariness of procedure in mousing, than this same Reverend Doctor. Catch him, if you can! Whenever or wherever he 'holds forth,' in behalf of the Sabbath, rest assured it is under such circumstances, at such times, and in such places, as to secure himself from interrogation, defeat by exposure, or a free discussion of the subject. Observe, too, how careful he is to move in no plebeian circle. It is among the titled, and the occupants of high stations, that he delights to circulate. If he can only secure a judge, a governor, a general, a prominent statesman, or a high church dignitary, to his side of the question, such testimony he regards as calculated to silence forever all vulgar inquiry into the claims of the first day of the week as the Sabbath."

So much for Dr. Edwards. Now for his arguments. One prominent position taken in the pamphlet is thus stated: "The Sabbath is founded on the nature of things; and men are required, not only in the Bible, but by natural laws, to observe it." Upon this statement Mr. Garrison remarks:—

"Now, if this be true, the Sabbath cannot possibly be in any danger, and the work of this Sabbath Union is quite superfluous. What man's necessities require, in 'the nature of things,' he will be pretty sure to possess and retain. Eating and drinking—wearing raiment to cover the body—sleeping during a certain portion of every twenty-four hours—are required by natural laws, and founded on the nature of things; yet it would be manifestly absurd to organize an association to convince mankind that they ought to eat and drink, to clothe their bodies, and to welcome 'Nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep,' at the proper time! No one who is weary needs an argument drawn from scripture, or reason, to convince him that it is right and proper to rest, according to the extent of his bodily prostration. If sabbatizing be a natural act, then the proof of this is to be made out by evidence drawn from nature; and revelation has no more to do with it than it has with the mode of cultivating rice or cotton. It is, then, a physiological, not a theological question; it relates to a physical, not to a moral law."

Another position argued in the pamphlet, is stated in the following language: "Those who labor continually seven days in the week, are, as a body, less healthy and long lived than those who labor only six; they perform on the whole a smaller amount of business, and in a less perfect manner." Mr. Garrison comments upon this position thus:—

"Why, here we have 'a Daniel come to judgment,' but with a fool's-cap and bells on his head! In what contempt must the Rev. Dr. Edwards and his associates hold the reason and perception of the laboring classes, to adduce an argument so absurd as this! It is unprofitable, and injurious to health and life, for laboring men to toil without ceasing! Wonderful discovery! Beyond a doubt, it would be hurtful for them to eat and drink without ceasing. But what does an argument like this prove? The folly of those who present it—nothing more. Now, instead of wishing to see the laboring classes toiling seven days in a week, it afflicts us to see them running the gauntlet six days out of seven to procure a precarious subsistence; and we maintain that they ought to have two, three, aye, at least four days in a week in which to rest from bodily toil, and to cultivate their social, intellectual, and moral powers."

The foregoing extracts are sufficient to show in what light the species of argument used by the American and Foreign Sabbath Union is regarded by those who reject the Sabbath entirely. They see very clearly, that if the duty of Sabbath-keeping rests mainly upon the necessities of man and the nature of things, it would be just as easy to establish the sabbatic character of one seventh part of each day as of one whole day out of every seven. Many of them have adopted that theory, or a theory similar to it, and contend that a man should rest whenever he is tired, each day, instead of setting apart one whole day in seven without reference to fatigue. And surely if it is a question of man's necessities alone, they have the best of the argument. The publications of the Sabbath Union establish them in their position. We give the author of those publications credit for entire sincerity, and an earnest desire to promote the interests of the sabbatic institution. We must nevertheless dissent from the course he pursues, believing that it is adapted to remove the only substantial foundation upon which to build up the duty of keeping the Sabbath. "If the foundations be removed, what can the righteous do?" There never was a time when an appeal "to the law and to the testimony," upon this subject, was more imperiously demanded. But a difficulty lies in the way of appealing to the law; that says, "the seventh day is the Sabbath," whereas the church says the first day is the Sabbath. So long as there is such a conflict between the law of God and the teachings of men, trouble in establishing the claims of the Sabbath must be expected.

ASSOCIATIONS—FAMILY PRAYER.

☞ The following thoughts came to us in a business letter. But they may be read with profit by others, and we therefore publish them:—

I had the pleasure of attending one day of the meeting of the Stonington Baptist Association, which was held at the new house of the second church in North Stonington, where a multitude assembled sufficient to fill the house three times; and none, I think, could have occasion to say at the close, that it had been a lost season to them. It appears to be the object of this Association, to render its meetings as spiritual as possible—a large portion of the time being spent in preaching, praying, exhorting, and singing. The business is nearly all performed by committees, named by the Moderator, and confirmed by the body. Letters were read from all the churches [eighteen,] some of which were not only interesting but cheering. Others complained of barrenness and dearth, and reported more deaths than baptisms; after reading which, the Moderator called for reflection and solemn prayer to be offered in behalf of such churches. One church complained of having been annoyed by rum and secret combinations; yet their statistics showed, that while they had excluded eight from the church, eighty-seven had been added by baptism. Their letter closed by saying that they had no fellowship with rum, secret combinations, slavery, or our war with Mexico, but were resolved to cling to the cross of Christ. Who could not say, Amen? The additions to the churches of this Association, during the past year, by baptism, were about three hundred; while from the statistics of our own Association, (held a few weeks previous to this, in an adjoining town,) we find the additions to be but one hundred and sixteen to twelve churches. The question may be asked, Why have the churches of the Stonington Association received nearly double the additions the past year to those of our Eastern Association? Can it be from the fact that God is a respecter of persons; or that they are more zealous to obey the laws of God rather than the laws of the State, and manifest this zeal in maintaining his holy and divine precepts? Certainly not? What, then, can be the reason? A number of reasons may be rendered. They are more thorough in their Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes; give their ministers a better support, thus affording them more time for religious and pastoral visits; and it is to be hoped that they are not so slow to acknowledge and worship God in their families as many of us. According to their efforts and activity in the cause of Christ, they are blest.

Perhaps it would not be amiss, again to bring before the minds of your readers, the fourth resolution of the Eastern Association, passed at its last session:—

> Resolved, That we consider it the duty of every Christian who sustains the responsible relation of the head of a family, to maintain the regular and daily worship of God in his own house; and that the neglect of this duty is a deplorable feature in the character of those professors of religion who are guilty of it, calling for the earnest labors of pastors and ministers to correct the evil.

This is thought by some to be one of the best and most important resolutions that can be found on the Minutes of the Association; and yet, like others, it will be of no avail to those who merely read it, and with one consent begin to make excuse, and so let it pass by. Reader! you may excuse yourself from this duty and high privilege now; but when standing in judgment before that Being who has pronounced a woe on those families who call not on the name of the Lord, there can be no excuse. The ignorant heathen, in their blindness, are said to be punctual in the worship of their gods in their families, as well as in other places, and yet they are perishing for the want of the knowledge and belief of the Gospel. If so, what must be the doom of those who know the right way, profess to walk in it, and live from week to week, and month to month, without ever evincing to their families or church that their attachment to the cause of Christ is sufficient to prompt them to the regular and daily worship of God in their own houses. If you consider your God and your soul of more value than your property and your body, then, for the sake of all that is good and abiding here, and all that is blessed and glorious beyond the grave, give your time and affection to each, something in proportion to their great value.

Yours in the Gospel, B. F. L.

ALEXANDER VINET.

The same steamer which brought intelligence of the death of Dr. Chalmers of Scotland, brought news also of the death of Alexander Vinet, who has been called by Merle d'Aubigne and others the Chalmers of Switzerland. Dr. Vinet was born at Lausanne, the Capital of the Canton of Vaud, on the 17th of June, 1797. At the age of twenty he was appointed Professor of the French Language and Literature in the University of Basle. He resided there many years, giving instruction, and preaching to a French Protestant Church. In 1837 he was appointed Professor of Theology in the Academy of Lausanne, which post he continued to occupy until his death. In a short sketch of his life, prepared by Dr. Baird, it is said that no man since the days of Pascal has ever used the French language with more dexterity than Mr. Vinet. The Doctor thinks he was "by far the ablest Christian philosopher in Europe, in his day. His powerful intellect comprehended more perfectly than that of any other man living—or I am wholly mistaken—the philosophers of the Scotch, French and German schools. The French have had no man since the days of Descartes, to compare with him. And he was not only a profound philosopher, but he was a Christian philosopher. He demonstrated that the highest, truest philosophy, is not only not opposed to Christianity, but coincident, if not identical with it. He was indeed a profound thinker, and whatever he wrote was read with an avidity which was truly remarkable, by such men as Merle d'Aubigne, Guizot, Gasparin, and others, who are the elite, as to intelligence and cultivation, of the Protestant world in France."

Church Action on Peace.—It is a fit subject for congratulation, that the evils of war and the desirableness of peace, are attracting the attention of the principal ecclesiastical bodies of this country. The Old School Presbyterian Assembly, at its recent session in Richmond, Va., passed a resolution, that in view of the present posture of our national affairs, the continuance of war, and its dreadful results, it be earnestly recommended to all the churches to humble themselves before Almighty God, and pray that there may be a speedy, righteous, and amicable adjustment of all our existing difficulties with other nations, and that we may be permitted to enjoy the blessings of peace. The same body requested all the pastors to bring this subject before the people on the second Sunday in June. The New School Presbyterian Assembly, at a meeting recently held in Cincinnati, Ohio, passed a resolution recommending all the churches to observe the second Sunday in July as a day of prayer in view of the war now existing between this country and Mexico, and that the ministers preach on that day a sermon on the subject of peace. The Rhode Island Congregational Association, at a late meeting, passed a series of resolutions upon the subject, deploring the existence of the war with Mexico, and expressing a conviction that the return of peace, and its future permanence, is eminently important to the steady and enduring prosperity of religion, and to the highest success of the various enterprises of Christian benevolence. Such action on the part of influential religious bodies, indicates a growing favor for the doctrines of peace, and cannot fail to have an influence upon the course and length of the war.

Centenarians of Harvard College.—The Boston Transcript says that Dr. Ezra Green, of Dover, N. H., who graduated at Harvard College in 1765, has recently completed his hundred and first year, with his powers of mind scarcely, if at all, impaired by the length of his days. He has outlived, by more than sixteen years, all his class-mates; the latest survivor, Andrew Fuller, having died at Lyndeborough, N. H., in April, 1831, aged 88 years. Another individual will soon be added to the centenarial roll, if his life is spared, viz., Hon. Timothy Farran. He was born July 11, 1747, and graduated in 1767; was formerly of the Supreme Bench of New Hampshire, and has passed his life mostly at New Ipswich, N. H., until about five years since, when, for the solace and society of a daughter, he removed to Hollis. Such instances of longevity among educated men, speak well for the influence of mental culture upon the physical system. Perhaps some credit is also due to the climate of New Hampshire, of which State they have been residents for a greater part of their lives.

Letter to President Polk.—During the recent visit of President Polk to Boston, a letter was addressed to him on behalf of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, calling his attention to the fact of his being a slaveholder, and exhorting him, as a Democrat and a Christian, to emancipate his slaves. Speaking of his relation to the slaves, the letter says: "Men, women, and children, are by you held in slavery—recorded in your ledger as chattels personal—worked like brutes, without wages or stipulation, under the lash of the driver, and fraudulently and tyrannically deprived of all their just earnings. No greater sin can be committed against God, no more atrocious crime against man, than this. He who commits it in this age of the world, and especially in a land so full of light and knowledge as our own, is preëminently guilty. It is man-stealing—an act, in comparison with which, the crime of theft, burglary, or arson, 'whitens into virtue.'" Speaking of the rights of the slaves, the following language is used:—"Every one of them is your equal in birth, and an eternal destiny. The act may be attended with difficulties; but, be assured, it will redound to your imperishable renown, and in life and in death be to you a source of exhaustless felicity. But, while you hold them in bondage, your hands will be stained with blood, and your garments with pollution; and their cries against you will continue to enter the ear of the Lord of Sabaoth, until his judgments shall be fully executed against you." Pretty plain talk, that, with which to welcome a President. But merited, beyond a doubt, and therefore none too plain.

Union Theological Seminary.—The Tenth Anniversary of the Union Theological Seminary in the City of New York, was held on Wednesday evening of last week. Several essays were delivered by members of the graduating class; after which the class was addressed by Prof. Robinson on the part of the Faculty, and by Rev. Mr. Hatfield on the part of the Trustees. Thirty-five young men were graduated, of whom eight are under appointment as missionaries of the American Board, all expecting to sail for their destinations during the summer or autumn. One sailed from Boston, a short time since, for the Nestorian mission; another goes to the Syrian mission; a third to China; two to Bombay; one to Ceylon; and three to the Sandwich Islands. Of the remainder of the class, several go to the Far West, others to Mississippi, Tennessee and Virginia, and a few will remain at the East. We rejoice to learn that the Seminary is now in a prosperous condition, its lectures having been attended during the past year by nearly 120 persons. It has also recently been made the legatee of thirty thousand dollars, by Mr. Roosevelt, and has received a valuable gift of books from C. O. Halstead, Esq.

A Pleasant Retrospect.—The New York True Sun says that it was stated on a recent Sunday, by the Pastor of the Seventh Presbyterian Church, on the corner of Ridge and Broome sts., during his 12th annual sermon, that it was not thirty years ago since the first sermon was preached there by Rev. Mr. Baldwin, and that there had been added to the church since that time 2,600 members, of whom 829 had been received by certificate from other churches, and 1,771 on profession of faith. Of this number 1,721 were added during the past twelve years; 488 of them were received by certificate, and 1,233 on the profession of their faith. The whole number of members on the register of the church in good and regular standing at this present time is 1,162. This is probably the largest evangelical congregation in the city.

Printing Press for Frederick Douglass.—A letter from Scotland to the editor of the Liberator, says that they are making active exertions to raise £500 for the purpose of purchasing a steam printing press, and other materials suitable for establishing a newspaper for Frederick Douglass, he to be the editor of the paper, and all the other matters connected with it to be conducted by colored people alone—the press to be called the 'Cambria,' after the steamer of the same name, in consequence of the disgraceful treatment received by our colored brother from the agent of that vessel. Mr. Douglass, thinking that his plan of laboring in this country as a lecturer, will not admit of his becoming an editor, has recommended his English friends to abandon their project.

Editorial Change.—Rev. H. A. Graves, who has been for several years connected with the Christian Reflector as its principal editor, has recently resigned that post. His health has been feeble for a long time, on which account he has spent the last two winters at the south, maintaining his connection with the paper by correspondence. Under advice of physicians, he is about to take up his residence for a time in Jamaica, W. I., from which place he promises occasional letters. Rev. J. W. Olmstead will hereafter take the principal editorial charge of the Reflector.

The Youth's Cabinet for July is published. It contains one page of original music, and a large amount of interesting reading matter for the young. We learn that T. S. Arthur, Esq., has been engaged as a regular contributor. The present number is the first in the semi-yearly volume, indicating that now is a good time to subscribe. D. A. Woodworth, Publisher, Clinton Hall, N. Y.

Church History by a Baptist.—At the recent meeting of the Hudson River Baptist Association, a Committee was appointed to present to Rev. W. R. Williams, D. D., a resolution unanimously passed by the Association, requesting him to undertake the work of preparing a history of the Christian Church. Such a work, from a person favorable to Baptist views, has long been regarded as an important desideratum. Under a deliberate conviction that Mr. Williams ought to engage in the work, the Association have taken this step, and express a hope that he will venture upon the great undertaking.

The Missionary Judson.—A letter from Dr. Judson, dated at Rangoon, March 2, 1847, state that the house in Maulmain, in which his effects were left, had been set on fire and burned to ashes. His clothes and his wife's, all their American presents, and every article of value, were consumed. He is allowed to remain in Rangoon in the character of a minister of a foreign religion, but is strictly prohibited from making proselytes. The succession of the late King's son has produced no change for the better.

Place-Making and Place-Finding.—A correspondent of the Christian Watchman, who has recently settled in a distant State, uses the following language in relation to making and finding places for ministers:—

"I have come here, not 'to find a place,' but, under God, to make a place. It seems to me we need a few more place-makers when we have so many dear brethren who are only place-hunters or place-finders. We have some reason to fear we shall soon be all out of good places, unless place-making preachers become more numerous and efficient. Our fathers in the Christian ministry, and those they imitated, did not spend but little, if any, of their precious time in going from town to town, or church to church, making the inquiry, 'Can you tell me where I can find a good place to preach?' They, under God, made places; and their sons should imitate them as far as God gives them ability and opportunity."

Irish Gratitude.—The following letter from the Lord Mayor of Dublin to the Mayor of New York, though couched in rather strong language, may doubtless be regarded as a tolerably true expression of the feelings of the Irish people generally towards their benefactors in the United States:—

To the Right Worshipful Mayor of New York:

The Address of the Right Honorable the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Burgesses of Dublin, in Corporate Council assembled.

Right Worshipful: We, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Burgesses, of Dublin, have hailed with delight and gratitude the truly substantial tokens of sympathy of the enlightened and free People of America, in regard to their fellow beings in Ireland.

The feeling of man for suffering man has not in their estimation to be limited by States or Kingdoms; they heard that man was suffering in a distant land, and they felt that the godlike virtue of relieving distress, belonged not to clime or country; that it was an ordinance from the Most High, the giver of all, embracing all the children of Adam, and acting on that sacred impulse they, without hesitation, poured forth their abundance to raise up (to save for the Christian family) their stricken brothers of Ireland.

Permit us to request, that you, Sir, as the chief municipal officer of the first City in the United States, will convey the expression of the gratitude never to be forgotten, of the Irish People, to the Citizens of the vast Western Republic, for the zeal and liberality displayed by them, in attending to the calls of suffering humanity, in our forlorn country.

Lord Mayor of Dublin, May 7, 1847.

INCIDENT IN THE HISTORY OF A BIBLE.

The Missionary Herald gives an account of the discovery of a Bible in the hands of a Koordish Chief, by Messrs. Breath and Wright, missionaries of the American Board, in Western Asia. On their way from Ooroomiah to visit Bader Khan Bey, the murderer of the Nestorians, they stopped for several days with Noor Ali Khan, the Hakkary Chief, residing at Julamerk. While there the following incident occurred:—

"We were sitting with him one night, a large number of guests and most of the Hakkary nobility being present, when, having heard of a little pocket Bible of mine which he wished to see, he remarked that he had a splendid book, which he ordered to be brought for us to look at. It was brought in and ordered to be handed to us; and you may imagine our surprise, when, on opening the volume, the first thing that met our eyes, was the following, "Presented to Mar Shimon, Patriarch of the Nestorians, by the American Bible Society," signed by J. C. Brigham. It is a beautiful book, got up in the first style of art, and excites the admiration of all who see it. He said that he valued it very highly, and that he was taking lessons in it; the latter assertion being of course false, as he has no one near him who knows anything of the English language. He asked the price of it; and when we told him what we supposed it cost, he said he would not take that for the cover. It was not the time or place, of course, to inquire into the history of the sacred volume; but we were at no loss to know that it fell into the hands of the Koordish Chief in the sacking of Diss, and was by him transferred from the patriarchal mansion in that district to his castle in Julamerk. Blessed volume! How changed thy situation! Once loved and honored in Christian America for thy precious contents; but now a prisoner in a strong castle in the heart of Koordistan, and honored too, but mainly for the gilt and beauty of thy cover!"

General Intelligence.

WAR NEWS.

Plenty of rumors, but not much authentic information, for a week past. Gen. Scott has not started for the city of Mexico, and it is now said that the report of his intention to do so was set afloat to keep up the spirits of his men. Gen. Taylor is soon to join Gen. Scott. Santa Anna is still President of Mexico, his resignation having been withdrawn. There have been reports of a disposition on the part of Mexico to make peace; indeed it has been promised through some of the papers in less than twenty days. But no reliance can be placed upon these reports. It is said by a New Orleans paper that Gen. Taylor will ask leave of absence from the army for a short time in November, for the purpose of attending to his own business at home. A brother of the notorious Canales was recently taken and executed near Monterey.

News received by express from New Orleans, and published in New York on Monday morning, 5th, says that on the first of June all the natives of the United States were ordered to leave the city of Mexico for the States of Jalisco or Morelia, or they would be dealt with according to the laws of nations. Gen. Arista has been arrested and confined. Gen. Almonte was still in prison. The Mexican papers are filled with accounts of great feats performed by the guerrillas.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The steamship Caledonia arrived at Boston on Sunday last. She brings news of a slight improvement in the price of Cotton, and a decline in the price of breadstuffs. Flour had fallen three shillings, and Indian Meal four shillings, since the sailing of the previous steamer This is said to be owing to the extreme favorableness of the weather, and the promising appearance of the growing crops. The rumors about the reappearance of the potato disease are not confirmed. Heavy loss has occurred on flour and meal by leakage, which has rendered a large quantity unmerchantable. American Cheese is in good demand at full prices. Lard has advanced.

The fleet and forces of the Portuguese Junta, under the command of Easantas, consisting of 12 ships of war and 3,500 men, surrendered unconditionally to the British blockading squadron, off Oporto, on the 31st of May.

The American ship Herald, Captain Pullen, with emigrants from Ireland, went ashore in a dense fog on the 24th of May, and filled. The crew and passengers were landed without loss.

JUDICIAL CANVASS AND CLASSIFICATION.

The State Canvassers completed the canvass of the returns from the several counties of the votes for Judges of the Court of Appeals, Clerk of that Court, and Justices of the Supreme Court, and declared the result.

Results having been ascertained, the Secretary of State, in presence of the State Canvassers and several citizens of both parties, proceeded to classify the Appeal and Supreme Court Judges, by lot, as prescribed by the Constitution. The names of the four Appeal Judges elect were written on separate slips of paper, placed in a box, and drawn by the Secretary—the first name drawn being of the first class, and holding for two years; the second, of the second class, and holding for four years; the third, of the third class, holding for six years; and the fourth, of the fourth class, and holding for eight years. The same course was taken with the four Judges elect in each district—and the classification resulted thus:—

SUMMARY.

The Springfield Republican relates a very singular occurrence on the Mad River and Lake Railroad. A section of this road which passed over a small prairie between Bellefontaine and West Liberty, was graded and about to be delivered by the contractors, as finished, when it suddenly disappeared, and twelve feet of water was found in its place. The prairie thus proves to be a lake covered with a heavy sod. Thirty years ago, the grass was cut on this prairie, and hauled off on a heavy wagon. The railroad, it is believed, will have to go round the prairie to find terra firma.

The Ottawa Free Trader says that on Saturday Mr. Benjamin Burr, a son of one of our merchants, whilst taking a load of empty flour barrels to the Dayton mills, met with a fatal accident near that place, by the barrels falling off the wagon and thus frightening the horses; who in their flight violently precipitated the young man against a stone, so severely injuring him as to cause his death on Sunday last. The deceased was a promising young man aged about 17, and his melancholy fate and untimely death is deeply deplored by his afflicted parents and numerous friends.

The Government of Hayti have recently sent six young men to France, to be educated at the public expense. Six others are to join them in Paris, who are to be educated there at the expense of their parents. Among the latter is a nephew of General Soulougne, President of the Republic; a son of Senator Paul, Minister of War, and the brother-in-law of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, General Dubuy. The studies of these young men are to be principally devoted to scientific pursuits. Three are to devote themselves to medicine, and the others to those sciences most immediately connected with war and the navy.

The St. Joseph Gazette of the 11th, after stating that four hundred and thirty-three wagons had passed through Independence this Spring, with emigrants for Oregon and California, says that the number which have passed through that place will make the aggregate upward of thirteen hundred wagons—which, if they average five persons to each wagon, will swell the number of emigrants to six thousand five hundred, large and small. The emigrants, in small numbers, were still coming to St. Joseph.

According to a calculation made some few years since, there were in the United States some 34,000,000 of sheep. At a moderate and rational calculation the value of these may safely be estimated at $70,000,000, and the amount of wool annually produced, at $40,000,000. Of this vast flock, the state of New York owned at the time of making the above estimate, nearly one fifth. For the five years immediately preceding that time, the increase of sheep in the United States, averaged, 1,000,000, per year. Since then it has probably been much greater.

A young lady of Princeton, N. J., of highly respectable connections, has been sued for slander by a young gentleman, who is there at College. The case is just now delayed by the absence of counsel. The witnesses for the prosecution are of the most respectable class, and it will at the same time be a novel and interesting case. The counsel to be employed by the gentleman is Mr. Ogden Hoffman, of New York.

The Boston Transcript says that Tom Thumb, following other illustrious examples, has “wooed a little maid,” who has agreed to “wed, wed, wed,” and in a short time they are to be married. She is in her 16th year, weighs 19 1-2 pounds, and is thirty inches high. The united weight of the couple is fifty pounds.

Mr. Vaughan, the true-hearted South Carolinian, who edited the “True American” subsequently to Cassius M. Clay’s departure for Mexico, has met with such encouragement from the friends of a free press in Kentucky and elsewhere, that he has re-commenced the publication of the paper, at Louisville.

The Delaware license law has been decided by the court of errors and appeals to be unconstitutional, and consequently void. The five judges were unanimous in this opinion. The recent election held, upon the subject in New Castle county has been declared void.

The New Orleans Picayune contains the names of seventy-six American soldiers who died in the General Hospital at Vera Cruz, during the month of May. This is a fearful thinning out of the comparatively small force left to garrison Vera Cruz. At this rate the pestilence sweeps off nine hundred soldiers at one station during the year.

The freight train on the Camden and Amboy Railroad, from Philadelphia to New-York, on Friday night, ran off the track with a terrible crash, destroying two cars, killing three immigrant passengers on the spot, and very badly wounding two or three others. The remains of the three that were killed were decently interred at Amboy on Saturday.

Mr. William Reed, of Carlton, Orleans county, New York, born in Cummington, Hampshire county, Mass., was the 7th child of his parents, and born the 7th day of the week, the 7th day of June, in the year 1777, and was 70 years old the 7th day of June, 1847.

We learn from the Amherst Express that Hon. Samuel Williston, of Easthampton, has recently given $1000 to Amherst College, for purposes of instruction, in addition to the $20,000 which he had previously given to found a Professorship.

Plainfield money is selling at 40 cents on the dollar, and Lehigh 25 cents. There has been a large increase in the quantity of Plainfield money thrown into the street within a few days, and some curiosity is felt as to whence it comes.

A machine has been invented for pegging boots by water or steam power. It is the production of a shrewd yankee in Woburn in Mass. where one of them is in operation.

The officers and crew of the frigate United States, now on the West Coast of Africa, have contributed $653 for the relief of the poor of Ireland and Scotland.

The Postmaster General has instructed his deputies throughout the Union to forward in the mails, without prepaying, all newspapers coming from the office of publication.

The Supreme Court at New Orleans lately rendered its judgment in the case which involved the validity of the testament of the late Francois Zavier Martin. The judgment of the Second District Court of New Orleans is reversed in toto. The Court decides that the State is without capacity to contest the validity of wills made by its citizens, on the mere ground of informality or want of capacity to dispose of their property in a particular way; and that a blind man is capable of making an olographic will.

The Washington Monument project is again revived. The Common Council has conveyed a plot of ground 200 feet square, in the very center of Hamilton Square, between the Third and Fourth Avenues, between Sixty-fifth and Sixty-sixth streets, New York. It is contemplated to lay the corner stone of the work on the 18th of October next, the anniversary of the capitulation of Lord Cornwallis, at Yorktown.

Hon. Wm. H. Polk, Charge d’Affairs at Naples, was united in matrimonial bonds to Miss Mary L. Corse, daughter of the late Israel Corse, of this city. The marriage took place at the residence of Israel Corse, 521 Broadway, the brother of the bride. After the collation usual to such occasions, the happy couple left for Philadelphia on their way to the residence of the “handsome Ambassador,” Columbia, Tennessee. They will go to Naples early in the Autumn.

The editor of the Albany Evening Journal observes:—Good farmers assure us that they have seldom known the crops to look better than they now do. The weather has been the very best which could have been bestowed to bring forward every species of vegetation. Every thing indicates a bountiful harvest.

The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser says:—“The weather has been most prosperous, and from every portion of our country, with here and there an exception, come the most flattering reports. There can now be but little doubt that the coming harvest will be an abundant one.”

A Mr. Horst, of New Orleans, has invented a new description of chair, for which he has procured a patent under the name of the Æolian chair. All that the incumbent of such a glorious invention has to do, is to sit down and rock himself, when by the simplest machinery in the world, the toes perform the part of a pair of bellows, and no matter how sultry the atmosphere, the sitter is surrounded by the coolest air imaginable.

Prof. Schœnbein, it is announced, has made a discovery which is making a great sensation in Germany. This distinguished Professor, who invented gun-cotton, has just discovered a method for immediately cauterizing wounds. This invention, in connection with that of insensibility produced by ether, will effect a complete change in surgery.

A London church-builder provides wood and iron churches for transmission to the colonies. He offers a church, with stained-glass windows, bell, &c., capable of holding 800 persons, for 300 guineas. But if you cannot afford to buy a church, he will lend you one “on hire.”

A human body, embalmed by Genal, in Paris, in 1844, was recently exhumed at Père la Chaise, in the presence of several eminent physicians, and found to be in a state of perfect preservation, thus establishing the reputation of this recovery of a lost art.

Mr. Alfred Smee, who has all along attributed the potato disease to the aphis vastator, lately placed some of those insects on a healthy plant, which they destroyed, with symptoms precisely similar to those which affected the crop last year all over Europe.

Post-office stamps, for the convenience of pre-paying postage, are to be issued on the 1st of July. The stamp for ten cents will be of the head of Washington, colored black. The five cents’ stamp will be colored brown, and will represent the head of Franklin.

An aged and venerable member of the Society of Friends in England, who had been in the habit of paying religious visits to persons sentenced to death for the crime of murder, declares that he had found, upon inquiry, that 163 of the 180 criminals he had visted had been present at public executions.

We learn from the Boston Atlas that the Alms-House in Attleboro’ was destroyed by fire between twelve and one o’clock on Wednesday morning, and five of the inmates perished in the flames. The fire is supposed to have been caused by an incendiary.

The crop of pine apples in the Bahamas, this season, promises to be abundant and of immense size—some specimens have been exhibited weighing 4 lbs., and measuring 17 inches in circumference.

An exchange says that the sum of $8,000 has recently been raised, by subscription, in the city of Providence, R. I., for the purchase of forty-two pews, containing 206 sittings, in Grace church, to be forever free!

A machine has been invented, and is now in operation at New Haven, and also in this city, for dressing barrel staves. It will make 7,000 such staves, or 4,000 hogshead staves, in ten hours.

A writer in the Newark Advertiser estimates that 180,000 tons of railroad iron will be made in this country during the year ending 30th June, 1848.

The Dublin Horticultural Society has recently offered a premium of $10,000, and the Edinburgh Horticultural Society one of $5,000, for a blue dahlia.

The population of London and its vicinity is 2,100,000. The London City Mission employs 150 city missionaries. The police of London is 5,000 in number; one missionary is devoted to them, and another to the cab drivers.

The Legislature of Connecticut, at its recent session, passed a law to exempt from attachment for debt the poor man’s homestead to the value of $300.

The collections of the United States in favor of Ireland, amount thus far, it is estimated, to more than $400,000.

There were five hundred and fifty bushels of strawberries, by actual measurement, in the Cincinnati markets June 6.

The Editor of the Charleston News says that he has in his possession a gold ring, which was found on Monday in a large black-fish, while it was being prepared for the table of one of his subscribers. Upon it are cut two pretty looking doves in the attitude or position that the poet has been pleased to denominate “billing and cooing,” and also the words “forever constant.” How this “golden bait” came within the corporate limits of this voracious member of the finny tribe, our readers must conjecture for themselves. It may be that some one of them will recognize the ring as his or her own; if so, we will gladly restore it.

Every “merciful man” who works a horse during the hot months, can promote its comfort by the following simple shield against the teasing of flies. Take two or three handfulls of walnut leaves, upon which pour two or three quarts of cold water; let it infuse one night, and pour the whole, next morning, into a kettle, and boil for a quarter of an hour; when it is cold it is fit for use. Moisten a sponge with it, and before the horse goes out of the stable, let those parts which are most irritable be smeared over with the liquor. Try it.

After a trial of six days, a case between Herrick Aiken, of Franklin, N. H., vs. Stephen C. Bemis, of Springfield, Mass., for the infringement of a patent for an improvement in the saw-set, was brought to a close in the United States Circuit Court, by a verdict for the plaintiff, giving $2,000 damages. Judge Sprague presided. The evidence in relation to the rise and progress of the saw-set extended back to nearly half a century.

The Northern State Journal is authorized by the officers of the Bank of Watertown to state that they have perfected their arrangements with the Comptroller, and that the Bank is to go on with its legitimate business. Their bills continue to be redeemed at the Albany Exchange Bank, and are now redeemed at their own counter. This will be acceptable news to the bill-holders.

The annual sheep-shearing at Nantucket, which was formerly a great holiday season with the islanders, took place a few days since. The Inquirer says it was not what it used to be. There were not more than 5,000 sheep to be sheared—a falling off of 2,000 from last year. The number of lambs is about 1,200. In 1778 there were upwards of 10,000.

New Haven was put in telegraphic communication with Toronto, Upper Canada, recently, and messages were instantly exchanged between the two cities. The route is via New York, Albany, Rochester, Buffalo, and then crossing the Niagara river below the falls, passes round Lake Ontario to Toronto, the entire distance being nine hundred miles!

It is said that there is an amount of lead now lying on the wharves at Galena to the value of twelve millions of dollars. Fifty millions pounds of lead were registered in Galena last year, and it is supposed that if the mines in that district were well worked, they could produce the enormous amount of one hundred and fifty millions of pounds.

The St. Louis Reveille has received the bill of fare for a Chihuahua Sunday afternoon entertainment It consists of bull fights. Five different bulls to be brought into the arena. One bull was to be fought by Donna Guadulupe, “a handsome and accomplished young lady of that city.”

Rev. J. E. Cole, of Lockport, was last Sunday morning bitten by a dog, supposed to be mad, while at St. Luke’s Church in Buffalo. It is feared that he will not recover.

DIED,

In Lyndon, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., June 13th, 1847, LORINDA, only daughter of Nelson and Sophrona Metcalf, aged 6 years, 6 months, and 8 days. Her disease was of the most distressing nature, yet when the lamp of life was about to expire, she exultingly exclaimed, “I am going home.”

In the same place, on the 2d ult., a Mr. DROWN, after an illness of two days. In the same place, on the 4th, Mrs. DROWN, consort of the above, of the same disease. Mr. and Mrs. Drown were worthy members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. By this visitation from God, the church is deprived of an eminent class-leader, and a family of ten children of affectionate parents. H. P. B.

In Plainfield, Otsego Co., N. Y., June 28th, Mr. PATRICK MOLTON, in the 23d year of his age. Mr. M. formerly resided in Albany, but had for a number of years lived in the family of Mr. Asa Lamphear in Plainfield, where he died. His disease was pulmonary consumption, which he bore patiently, and died in hope of a blessed immortalily.

In Leonardsville, N. Y., June 9th, Miss ELIZABETH CLARKE, aged 17 years.

In DeRuyter, N. Y., on the 29th of May last, TACY, infant daughter of Henry C. and Temperance Babcock, aged two months.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH.

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

AMELIA R. CLARKE, Teacher of Instrumental Music

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First commencing Wednesday, Aug. 25, and ending Dec. 1
Second “ “ Dec. 15, “ March 22
Third “ “ April 5, “ July 12

TUITION, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
EXTRAS—for Drawing	1 00
“ Painting	2 00
“ Piano Music	8 00
“ Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold th reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, “The health, the morals, and the manners of our students.” To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; a number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

SAMUEL RUSSELL,
President of the Board of Trus.

ALFRED, June 23, 1846.

Miscellaneous.

THE CHILDREN'S APPEAL.

BY MARY HOWITT.

Beautiful, the children's faces!
 Spite of all that mars and scars:
To my inmost heart appealing;
Calling forth love's tenderest feeling;
 Steeping all my soul with tears.

Eloquent the children's faces—
 Poverty's lean look, which saith,
Save us! save us! wo surrounds us;
Little knowledge sore confounds us;
 Life is but a lingering death!

Give us light amid our darkness:
 Let us know the good from ill;
Hate us not for all our blindness;
Love us, lead us, show us kindness—
 You can make us what you will.

We are willing; we are ready;
 We would learn, if you would teach,
We have hearts that yearn towards duty;
We have minds alive to beauty;
 Souls that any heights can reach!

Raise us by your Christian knowledge,
 Consecrate to man our powers;
Let us take our proper station,
We the rising generation,
 Let us stamp the age as ours!

We shall be what you will make us.—
 Make us wise and make us good!
Make us strong for time of trial;
Teach us temperance, self-denial,
 Patience, kindness, fortitude!

Look into our childish faces:
 See you not our willing hearts?
Only love us—only lead us;
Only let us know you need us,
 And we all will do our parts.

We are thousands—many thousands!
 Every day our ranks increase;
Let us march beneath your banner,
We the legion of true honor,
 Combating for love and peace!

Train us! try us! days slide onward,
 They can ne'er be ours again:
Save us! save! from our undoing!
Save from ignorance and ruin;
 Make us worthy to be men!

Send us to our weeping mothers,
 Angel-stamped in heart and brow!
We may be our fathers' teachers;
We may be the Mightiest preachers,
 In the day that dawneth now!

Such the children's mute appealing,
 All my inmost soul was stirred;
And my heart was bowed with sadness,
When a cry, like summer's gladness,
 Said, "The children's prayer is heard!"

SOMETHING MORE WONDERFUL THAN THE MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH.

George and Thomas Bates had often expressed a desire to visit the Telegraph office. They had heard of the strange doings of this wonderful machine, and had often stood and looked at the wires stretched along from one high post to another, seeming like cobwebs in the air.

One day, as they were thus occupied, George asked Thomas how it could be that on those wires unseen messages were passing to and fro. "I don't know how it is," replied Thomas; "father says it is by means of electricity, and lightning is electricity, and that is the reason news travels so quickly by the Magnetic Telegraph."

One day, after school, these boys went into their father's store, which was just opposite the Telegraph office, and asked him if he would be so kind as to take them to see this wonderful invention.

Their father assented, always glad to gratify his children, and to add to their stock of useful information, and at once they were by the side of the agent, looking at the performance of the little instrument that noted down intelligence like a living thing.

The boys asked their father to send a message to their uncle in Washington, but the little machine was so busy that the agent could not gratify them for some time.

Tic, tic, tic, dot, dot, click click, click, went the little points. By and by it ceased for an instant, but just as the agent was going to put in his claim, it began again.

"That is B for Buffalo," said the agent, "we must wait till the message is finished." As soon as the sentence was written, there was an A U for Auburn, and then a U for Utica; and the boys were almost out of patience, as little boys are apt to be, when their wishes are not immediately gratified.

After a while their turn came. The agent hurried to put in a W for Washington, and "aye," "aye," was the reply, to let him know that his wish was attended to, and the message was sent.

Returning home, the boys could talk of nothing but the wonders of the Magnetic Telegraph. "Is it not the most wonderful thing you ever heard of, father?" said Thomas.

"No," replied his father, "I have heard of things more wonderful."

"But, father," said George, "you never heard of any message being sent so quickly as by this means, have you?"

"Yes, I have, my son."

"And receiving an answer as quickly?" added George.

"Yes, much sooner," replied his father.

"Are you in earnest, father?" said Thomas, looking eagerly in his face. "Is it possible you know of a more wonderful way of communication than by Telegraph?"

"I never was more in earnest, my son, than I am when I say 'yes' to your question."

"Well, father," said George, "do tell me what it is, and in what respect it is better than the Telegraph."

"In the first place," said his father, "you do not have to wait to send your message while others are attended to; for your message can go with thousands of others, without any interruption or hindrance."

"So that is an improvement," said George, "for we had to wait a long time, you know."

"And in the next place," continued his father, "there is no need of wires or electricity, or any machinery, to aid the mode of communication of which I speak; and what is more wonderful than all is the fact, that you need not even express the nature of your communication, as, before you do so, your answer may be returned, though it is quite necessary that you truly and sincerely desire a favorable reception for your request."

"Besides all this, the plan of communication of which I speak is superior to all others, from the fact, that you need not resort to any particular place to send your request. In the lonely desert—on the trackless ocean—in the crowded city—on the mountain top—by night or by day—in sickness and health, and especially in trouble and affliction, the way of communication is open to all. And the applicants can never be so numerous that the simplest desire of the feeblest child, properly presented, shall not meet with immediate attention."

"Is there any account published of this wonderful manner of communicating your wishes?" inquired Thomas.

"Yes, there is, my son; it is to be found in the Bible."

"In the Bible, father!" exclaimed both the boys.

"Certainly, my sons, and if you will both get your Bibles, I will tell you where to find the passages."

The children opened their Bibles, and found, as their father directed them, the 24th verse of the 65th chapter of Isaiah, which Thomas read as follows: "And it shall come to pass, that before they call, I WILL ANSWER; and while they are yet speaking, I WILL HEAR."

Next, George found and read the 9th verse of the 58th chapter of Isaiah: "Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall answer; thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am."

"Now turn," said their father, "to Daniel, 9th chapter, 20th, 21st, 22d, and 23d verses."

"And while I was speaking, and praying, and confessing my sin, and the sin of my people Israel, and presenting my supplication before the Lord my God;" "yea, while I was speaking in prayer, even the man Gabriel," "being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation. And he informed me, and talked with me, and said, O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. At the beginning of thy supplications, the commandment came forth, and I am come to show thee," &c.

"I see, father, from these passages," said Thomas, "that you refer to prayer."

"And I am sure that you will both agree with me, that this mode of communication with heaven is more wonderful than any other, for, by this means, our desire can be immediately known to our Heavenly Father, and we receive an answer." [Am. Messenger, abridged.

A CHINESE STEP-MOTHER.

In the reign of Sweng Vang, the guards of a castle found a man lying in a field, who appeared but recently to have been murdered. At a little distance they found two brothers whom they took into custody as the probable murderers. As however the deceased had but one wound, which consequently gave rise to the surmise of but one perpetrator, the question arose, which of the two had done the deed? Neither of the brothers would accuse the other, each of them declaring that he, and not his brother, was the assassin. The case was brought before the king.

"To grant life to both (said the king) would be to show mercy to one murderer—to have both executed, where one only can be guilty, would be cruel and against the law. Well, then, let the mother of these men be called, and let her opinion decide their fate—for she knows her children best."

So said, so done. The mother was informed of the king's command. And, said the poor woman, bursting into a flood of tears, "if I am compelled to choose, let the youngest live."

The king expressed great surprise that the mother should have chosen the youngest, for the youngest children are generally cherished the most by mothers.

"Yes," said she, "he whose life I now save, is not the offspring of my own body, but the son of my late husband by his first marriage. I have solemnly promised his father always to treat him as my own son, and until now, I have always kept my word. I should now break my promise were I, from fraternal tenderness, to save the life of my youngest son to the detriment of the other. I feel what this sacrifice costs my heart."

Cries and sobs here choked her utterance. The king pardoned them both.

GIVE YOUR BOYS A TRADE.

Franklin says, "He who has a trade has an estate," and never was a more true or a more useful maxim uttered even by that great man. Many were the rules of conduct laid down by him, and practiced, too, through his long life, which, if followed by men in all times and ages, would greatly improve the condition and circumstances of the multitude. The above saying is easily to be understood by all, and applicable to all professions or pursuits. A great day will it be for our country when youth shall be induced or compelled to adopt some calling, whether mercantile or what is really mechanical. And a greater day will it be when more of them shall choose the latter—to become respectable mechanics, rather than second-rate lawyers, or doctors, or divines.

The above remarks were suggested by a little anecdote we heard related lately. A young man, born heir of a large estate, was, at the age of fifteen, regularly apprenticed to a respectable and scientific mechanic, for the purpose of learning what is sometimes sneeringly called a trade. There was no necessity for such a step, but the father chose so to dispose of the education of his son, often repeating it to him, "He who has a trade has an estate." The young man became a master of his trade, and had the supreme happiness—(and earth can offer none more perfect)—of supporting his aged father by his skill and industry; for the great fortune to which he had been born heir was, by misfortunes, all lost. Moreover, while performing this sacred duty, his talents, industry, and integrity, finally won for him both frame and fortune.

PURE WATER.

The purest natural water is that obtained from melted snow, especially that which falls in uninhabited places, where the atmosphere is pure and unimpregnated with smoke and other extraneous substances, as is always the case in the immediate vicinity of cities and large towns.

"The characteristics of perfectly pure water," says a distinguished chemist, "are, that it is perfectly transparent and colorless, limpid, not sparkling, insipid, unpleasant, and sickly to the taste, and is lighter than common river or spring water. One hundred cubic inches of water weigh two hundred and fifty-two and a half grains; it is eight hundred and twenty-eight times heavier than air; and when expanded into steam, occupies seventeen hundred times its previous space."

Perfectly pure water, when required for the operations of the chemist, is obtained by the distillation of river water in glass vessels, that is, expanding it into steam by subjecting it to heat, and then condensing it by passing it through cold pipes. The decomposition of water is effected by passing it through pipes, previously heated to redness.

In this process, the oxygen it contains forms a union with the iron of the pipes, and the hydrogen escapes, and may be collected in the form of a gas. Water may be made, and this indeed is effected in every instance "in which a combustible body unites with the oxygen of the atmosphere."

POWER OF IMAGINATION.—The influence of the imagination on the nervous system has on some occasions produced effects bordering on insanity. The following is a case in point:—

"A few years since, Elijah Barnes, of Pennsylvania, killed a rattlesnake in his field, without any injury to himself, and immediately after put on his son's waistcoat, both being of the same color. He returned to his house, and on his attempting to button his waistcoat, he found to his astonishment that it was too small. His imagination was now wrought to a high pitch, and he instantly conceived the idea that he had been bitten imperceptibly by the snake, and was thus swollen from its poison; he grew suddenly very ill, and took to his bed. The family, in great alarm and confusion, summoned three physicians, and the usual remedies were prescribed and administered. The patient, however, grew worse and worse every minute, until at length his son came home with his father's waistcoat dangling about him. The mystery was instantly unfolded, and the patient being relieved from his imaginary apprehension, dismissed his physicians, and was restored to his health."

TERMINUS OF THE PATH OF GLORY.—The New Orleans Picayune thus sums up the amount of glory which has fallen to the share of the heroes of Monterey:

"Just one year ago there marched through our streets as noble and splendid a body of men as ever went forth to battle. They were about nine hundred strong. The men were in the vigor of youthful manhood; and as in perfect order and with military precision they paraded through our city, the admiration of our people broke forth in loud applause of the gallant array. This was the first Tennessee regiment, under the heroic veteran, Col. Campbell. They left our city, fresh from their own happy homes in the mountains and by the river sides in healthful Tennessee, full of hope, ambition, and patriotism; they departed in cheerful spirits and with impatient ardor for the scene of war.

* * * * * *

"On Friday last, the whole of this gallant regiment, whose history we have thus briefly sketched, arrived in our city. It numbers just three hundred and fifty—about one-third the force with which it left. And this loss it has sustained in a twelve months' campaign. It has averaged a loss of fifty men a month."

AN AFFECTING LESSON FROM ANCIENT HISTORY.—Who can fail to be saddened, and yet gratified, with an incident of peculiar interest, related by Herodotus, introduced by Rev. Dr. Baird, at the recent anniversary of the Peace Society?

'When Crœsus was taken captive by Cyrus, and placed on the funeral pile to be burned, the latter overheard the other saying, "O Solon! Solon!" Cyrus asked him what god he was calling upon. To which Crœsus answered, that he was not calling upon any god, but was calling to mind a saying of Solon, that no man ought to be called happy till after death. Upon which Cyrus directed him to come down from the funeral pile, and asked him, why he had made war upon him. To this Crœsus answered, that he would not have done so, but for what the god had said through the Delphic oracle; for he knew that peace was better than war; since in peace children bury their fathers, but in war fathers bury their children.'

STOCKINGS, WASHING THE FEET, &c.—Much more of comfort to the feet depends on the stockings than people are aware of; nothing can be worse than a stocking too large or too small. The more common case is its largeness, and when I see a cotton or thread stocking tucked under at the toe, and by the perspiration of the foot and the tread, become quite hard and compact, a hard ridge of a seam pressing on the toes, which show the marks produced by the pressure all over the surface, I wonder how persons can expect comfort.

The best stockings for general wear, are those made of lamb's wool, vigonia, and Shetland knit. The pedestrian well knows the difference on a long day's walk between a cotton or linen stocking and one of wool: he knows that the former soon becomes hard, damp and chilly, with the moisture of the foot, whereas the latter enables him to bear fatigue, defends his foot from the friction of the shoe, secures it from blisters, and in every way ministers to his comfort.

A MILK SELLER'S CONFESSION.—A German had made his fortune in Philadelphia, by selling milk. He started home with two bags of sovereigns. On shipboard he counted one bag of his treasure. A mischievous monkey was watching his operations. As soon as it was replaced and tied up, and the other bag emptied, Jacko snatched up the full one, and was soon on the mast-head. He opened the German's bag, and after eyeing the pretty gold proceeded to drop one piece upon the deck, and another in the water, until he had emptied the bag. When he finished, the German threw up his hands, exclaiming, "He must be the Dayvil, for what came from the water, he does give to the water, and what came from the milk, he gives to me!"

CLEANING KID GLOVES.—Fold a clean towel three or four times, and spread the gloves on it quite smooth; then dip a piece of clean flannel into some new milk, and rub on it plenty of brown soap; with this rub the gloves downwards, holding the top of the glove firmly with the left hand. When the gloves, if they be white, look of a dingy yellow, they are clean; or if colored, when they look dark and soiled, lay them to dry, and they will soon look almost equal to new. This recipe can be easily tried.

VARIETY.

The extraordinary fact of a black woman turning white has recently occurred at Cairo. The woman is married to a black soldier belonging to Ibrahim Pasha's guard, and, according to the evidence brought forward, it is during the last two years that her black skin peeled off by degrees, and without any inconvenience to herself, and has been replaced by a white skin. Her features distinctly belong to the Ethiopian race, and her flat nose, thick projecting lips, woolly hair, peculiar cheek bone, accent, and the shape of her feet, all denote her origin. Five European medical men at Cairo have certified to the above facts.

The London correspondent of the National Intelligencer, says that notwithstanding the immense exertions of the temperance societies in England, the consumption of brandy in 1846 was 500,000 gallons more than in 1845. The duty upon foreign spirits was reduced 7s. 6d. per gallon, in 1846; and, although the low duties have been in operation only eight months, yet the increased consumption of brandy and gin has, during that period, been such as to make the revenue from its importation greater than in 1845. The total increase of consumption of rum, brandy, gin and British made spirits in the last four years, is given at 3,680,375 gallons.

A remittance was received at the Suffolk Bank, from the Bank of Burlington, Vt. of $900. There were four bills of $100 each, and two of $50 each, of the Shoe and Leather Dealers' Bank, Boston, making five hundred dollars. Then there were eight bills of $50 each of the Massachusetts Bank, Boston. All of these bills had been altered from one dollar bills of the respective banks. The alterations are so well done, that 99 persons out of every hundred would not detect the cheat. The loss to the party who made the remittance, is $886.

Gen. Taylor from his earliest youth has been a warm admirer of Thomas Jefferson, and, on his marriage, vowed that if blessed with children, his first-born should be named after the sage of Monticello. He had children, but it happened, somewhat unfortunately, that his first-born was a girl. Determined, however, to execute his purpose, he called her Thomas Jefferson! She became the wife of Col. Jefferson Davis, commander of the 1st regiment of Mississippi infantry.

Two hundred emigrants arrived in Baltimore a few days since, said to be the van-guard of a colony of several thousand Hollanders, who are about to settle in Missouri. They are well clad, and fine looking people, and have an abundance of means to carry out their intentions. They fly from religious persecution under the King of Hanover.

A negro woman, a slave to a man named Whitehead, who resided eight or ten miles south of Lafayette' Ala. fearing a severe whipping, ran away, taking her four children with her. On coming to a creek, she attempted to drown them all, but succeeded in drowning only the three youngest; the eldest escaped and returned home. The mother has been committed to jail.

The Bangor Whig, a good authority, says that at least ten thousand trees, mostly fruit trees, and of the choicest varieties, have been set out in that city during the present season. We shall have a lovely city there by and by, and when these trees come into full bearing, the richness and variety of fruits will exceed those of any portion of the State.

CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE.

REV. J. T. HEADLEY, EDITOR.

THE CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE, formerly under the care of Rev. D. Mead, commences its fourth volume under the editorship of Rev. J. T. Headley, author of "Napoleon and his Marshals," "Sacred Mountains," "Letters from Italy," &c. We hazard nothing in saying that this Magazine, so deservedly popular hitherto, is destined to fill a large place in public estimation; that it will not only maintain its present enviable distinction, but earn to itself a far higher popularity, and become the companion of many a circle to which it is now a stranger, gladdening by its presence, while it exerts an influence pure, elevating, and healthful. The Editor will bend his energies to make this the most popular Magazine of the day, and while he avails himself of articles from the best writers, he will draw freely from his own exhaustless store.

It will continue to maintain its high moral tone, and nothing will be admitted into its columns which will minister to the corrupt passions and tendencies of youth, or which "the author dying would wish to blot."

The design of the Editor and Publisher is to present a Magazine containing all the facination and interest of the lighter Periodicals, while at the same time it moves in a different path, and is not exposed to the same objections. It is issued monthly, containing 32 pages of original matter, printed on fine paper, in handsome covers, with a splendid steel engraving, and a beautiful colored flower, and music, to each number, and got up in every respect in the best style of the art, making a yearly volume of 384 pages, full of choice illustrations, and forming a handsome ornament to the Parlor Table, or a rich and valuable present to a friend.

☞ Price, two dollars a year. Three copies for five dollars.

COMMENTARY FOR THE PEOPLE!

NOW PUBLISHING, THE ECLECTIC COMMENTARY ON THE BIBLE, from the works of Henry and about one hundred other writers. The work is printed on fine paper, and with large, clear type. It will be completed in twenty-four parts, of eighty pages each, imperial size, all of which is now stereotyped. It will be beautifully illustrated by accurate views of scriptural scenes, designed especially to embellish a Commentary, and executed by the most eminent artists. Tables and charts are likewise added, where necessary, for purposes of illustration; the whole comprising as valuable a series of illustrative engravings and embellishments as have ever been united in any similar work. It may be used with any edition of the Bible. Will be published semi-monthly. Price, 25 cents per part.

The design of the Committee of the London Tract Society, under whose supervision the English work was prepared, has been to cover that ground where all evangelical denominations meet, and to make a plain and practical exposition of religious truth and duty.

This work is based on the Commentaries of Henry and Scott, and more than one hundred other writers in the various departments of Biblical Literature; the most important observations of these eminent divines being quoted, constituting a digest of the most valuable results at which the learned men of all ages have arrived in their critical study of the Holy Scriptures. Reference has been had to the wants of Sunday School Teachers, and of families engaged in the systematic study of the Scriptures.

Perhaps there never was a juncture of time when true religion more greatly needed a safeguard against attacks which are both boldly and insidiously aimed at her vital principles; perhaps true religion was never in a more perilous position between open enemies and pretended friends, than at this particular crisis; and surely never was it more incumbent than now, on every true friend of her holy precepts, every conscientious master of a household, every anxious parent, guardian and protector, to be provided with antidotes to the poison which is so unscrupulously scattered abroad, or an argument against each dangerous fallacy which is propounded to the injury and detriment of that religion, which is the faithful oracle of the Divine Creator, and the best exponent of His will.

The object of the compilers has been to provide a Commentary compact in size, moderate in price, and suited to Christians of every station, rank, and denomination.

"The family into whose hands this work comes, have in their possession a store of biblical science and practical instruction, of more value than gold. The republication is a great undertaking, and we hope it will receive an adequate support."—New York Observer.

"This Commentary has enjoyed extraordinary popularity as a practical exposition of God's Word. It differs from any other, presenting the best exegetical, illustrative and practical comments which the editors were able to select from the best scholars, on each passage, in course. The text being omitted, it is enabled to present a vast amount of learning in a small space. The sources from which it is compiled afford a perfect guaranty of its soundness, both of doctrine and interpretation, while the advantage of having the opinion of different commentators, is apparent and very great."—N. Y. Evangelist.

"We regard the Eclectic Commentary, now in course of publication by Mr. Shannon, as especially deserving the patronage of Protestant Christians. Its cheapness, beautiful finish of mechanical workmanship, and its comprehensiveness, embracing, as it does, the cream of all the commentaries, all entitle it to very high consideration."—Christian Parlor Magazine.

We have received the most favorable notices from many distinguished clergymen of various denominations of this country, and also from the press, which cannot be inserted in a newspaper advertisement on account of their length; they will be found on the cover of each part.

☞ Our readers have already been informed of the favorable decision of what was called the "Jew Case," before the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio. Still they will be interested in reading the Argument of Counsel. We therefore copy it entire, as we find it in the "Occident and American Jewish Advocate." At a future day we hope to be able to give the Opinion of the Court upon the Case:—

SUNDAY LAWS IN OHIO.

JACOB RICE, ads. CITY OF CINCINNATI. } In Certiorari, to Common Pleas.

The Case.

JACOB RICE, the defendant in Certiorari, was fined by the Mayor of Cincinnati, for trading on Sunday.

The ordinance under which this fine was imposed, is contained in the 2d volume of the City Ordinances, page 58, and is in these words:

"Any person of the age of fifteen years and upwards, who shall be found on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, sporting, rioting, quarreling, hunting, fishing, shooting, bartering, or selling, or buying any goods, wares, or merchandise, or at any common labor, (works of necessity and charity excepted,) shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $20."

And the second section contains a provision, that—

"Nothing in the first (the foregoing) section of this ordinance, in relation to common labor, shall be construed to extend to those who conscientiously observe the seventh day of the week as a Sabbath."

The record of the Mayor's proceedings sets forth that the defendant offered to prove, and it was admitted by the plaintiff, that he conscientiously doth observe the seventh day of the week as a Sabbath.

Upon the hearing, on this state of the law and fact, the Court of Common Pleas reversed the judgment of the Mayor, and certiorari is now obtained from this Court for the purpose of reversing the judgment of the Common Pleas.

It would be enough to call the attention of the Court to the fact, that the transcript of proceedings before the Mayor does not set forth, that defendant is a person of fifteen years and upwards, nor does it negative the exception, in regard to works of necessity and mercy.

But we do not wish this case to go off upon any technical point. The defendant is one of a class of citizens who are somewhat numerous in this community, and who are peculiar in their faith and forms, and naturally sensitive in regard to whatever infringes upon them. This case is only one out of some forty, which rest upon the same principle;—and that principle is regarded by them as a question of religious freedom; as indeed it is. In that light mainly we shall regard it.

The Argument.

It is argued for the City, that the exemption only extends to common laborers, and not to common labor—and the defedant being a tradesman, is not exempted, although a conscientious Sabbatarian, &c.

We set out with the proposition, that the Court should endeavor so to construe this Ordinance as to make it harmonize with natural justice, and with the Constitution and laws of the State. Acts in pari materia are to be construed together, and in such a manner as, if possible, to give effect to each.—Dodge v. Gridley, 10 Ohio Rep. 176; Ib. 452; 2 Mass. Rep. 143; 9 Cowen, 437.

And the construction which we suggest, and upon which we respectfully insist, is that which distinguishes the acts specified into two classes —thus:

1. Pastimes and Offences.—Sporting, rioting, quarreling, hunting, fishing, and shooting.

2. Lawful Avocations.—Trading, bartering, selling, buying, &c., or any common labor.

That the phrase "any" has relation to trading, &c., and has the same signification as though the word other occurred directly after it. "Trading," &c., or any other common labor, &c.

That the words "trading, bartering," &c., are but so many specifications of kinds of common labor, and the words "or at any common labor" thrown in to save time, as it were, by grouping all under the generic phrase.

The exception in the second section is then as broad as the enacting clause, and is pertinent and sensible, and the law harmonizes with itself, and with the higher law of the Constitution and the State Legislature.

On the other hand, the construction for which the counsels for the City contends, as being that upon which the judgment of the Mayor undoubtedly was grounded, is that the acts enumerated should be classified into—

1st. Pastimes and Offences, and lawful avocations—thus, sporting, rioting, quarreling, hunting, fishing, shooting, trading, bartering, buying, or selling, &c.

2d. Common Labor. And that the latter alone is excepted by the proviso; and all of the former class indiscriminately swept within the operation of the penalty.

Before considering the objections to this view, we beg leave to quote another general rule, of the highest authority, as to the construction of statutes.

It is in the language of Chief Justice Marshall, in United States v. Fisher et al., 1 Cond. Sup. Ct. Reports, 425.

Where rights are infringed, where fundamental principles are overthrown, where the general system of the law is departed from, the "legislative intention must be expressed with irresistible clearness," to induce a court of justice to suppose a design to effect such objects.

There is not a word in this lucid passage, but is pregnant with meaning and force, in respect to the argument we are about to submit. If we can show that rights ARE infringed—that fundamental principles ARE overthrown—that the general principle of the law IS departed from, in the construction contended for on the opposite side, will not this Court, too, say, the legislative intention must be expressed with irresistible force, before we can suppose such an intention? And is it so expressed in the view they present? Place the emphasis upon the word any—"or at ANY common labor"—and the reading we insist upon is, in point of fact, the plain, natural, and common sense reading of the clause.

It is admitted by plaintiff's counsel, that the term "common labor," in the act of 1831, may embrace all sorts of employment; yet it cannot have that extensive signification in the Ordinance, because that enumerates bartering, trading," etc., before using the comprehensive phrase. If the greater includes the less, then the enumeration here spoken of is mere surplusage;—it is merged in the comprehensive phrase. On the other hand, if the enumeration is used with the intent to take it out of that phrase, then it is an infringement of rights—an infraction of fundamental principles—and a departure from the general system of the law—and, therefore, not only is the intention to be most clearly manifest, but the power so to legislate must be equally apparent.

As to the extent of this phrase, "common labor," let it, in the language of Lord Bacon, "be restrained unto the fitness of the matter and the person." The proposition of plaintiff's counsel, is, that "common labor" is that in which we may suppose the vast majority of mankind to be habitually engaged, as distinguished from mechanical or other labor, requiring the exercise of intellect or skill; and that such "common labor" is protected under the proviso. According to this arguments, a dozen wood-sawyers, or as many street-pavers, might pursue their avocations in the immediate vicinity of a place of worship, on the first day of the week; and if they had conscientiously observed the preceding day, they would be justified in so doing. Nay, farther, the defendant himself, and others of his persuasion, might do the same thing, although their usual avocations on other days of the week were widely different, and rest themselves with perfect security upon the saving clause of the city ordinance. Yet, if one of them, instead of this, pursues his ordinary avocation on that day, without infringing upon the rights or consciences of others, he becomes amenable to the penalty of the law. Now, to what result does this reasoning lead us? "Common" labor upon the first day of the week is protected. Why so? Because he who performs it, conscientiously observes the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, and the Constitution will not permit his right of conscience to be restrained. All very well. But the Israelite whose ordinary avocation is merchandizing, may not pursue it on the first day of the week. Why? Does he not conscientiously observe the seventh day? Certainly. Can you restrain his right of conscience? No. What then? Why, his ordinary avocation, in the eyes of the city Fathers, is not "common labor;" and though he have a conscientious right to saw wood, or pave streets on that day, he has no such right to pursue his ordinary avocation, if it be any other than such commou employment.

It is the character or kind of labor, therefore, that is protected, and not the conscientious scruples of him that performs it. The law enacting and the law administering powers may not restrain the rights of conscience—but either or both may divide men of the same faith into classes, according to their avocations, and may define what species of labor may be followed on a given day, consistent with the rights of conscience, and what may be proscribed. As between these classes of men, so made up, the law is to give the benefit of his conscientious views to one, and pay no kind of attention to the equally sincere faith of the other. The one is regarded with toleration—perhaps favor; whilst the other is put down in the same category with rioters and brawlers, and punished accordingly. And this, too, altogether without reason as to the matter of employment, which is indeed no business of the legislator; since if a man has a right to go about his lawful business or avocation on a particular day, he has it absolutely; and whether it be laboring or trading, the right is the same. It could never be allowed as a function of the lawgiver, or the province of the courts, so to discriminate among pursuits, and punish men, not on account of their offences, but their avocations.

The proposition we submit is, that the phrase "common labor," is to be construed in reference to the man himself; and that the "common labor" of every one is that which pertains to his ordinary avocation. The drayman, the mechanic, the farmer, the clerk, the merchant, the physician, the attorney, the judge, and the divine, all labor in their respective callings. It is all labor, and we are all laborers. Whether it be physical labor alone, or of the physical and intellectual powers combined, it is still labor; —still the result of the primeval sin and curse, "In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat thy bread." And it is all "common labor," because it is labor common to our respective pursuits in life. And this we contend is the correct construction of the phrase "common labor," as well in the Ordinance as in the Statute.

It is true plaintiff's counsel, by a note to page 4 of his argument, contends that this phrase in the Statute, by a rule of repugnance, cannot mean any man's ordinary occupation. Then by the statute, bartering, selling, etc., are not made punishable; for unless included in the phrase "common labor," they are not prohibited at all;—and yet, reverse the position of the City Solicitor, and he would contend with equal energy, and far more legal reason, that a merchant who should attempt to pursue his ordinary avocation on the Sabbath, without conscientiously observing the seventh day, ought to, and should be held to punishment under the statute.

The argument, which is based upon the relative provisions alike of the 1st and 2d sections of the Ordinance and the Statute, and a comparison between the keeper of a tavern or coffee-house, and a merchant or mechanic, following his usual occupation, is utterly unsound. The one is exercising a calling which the law has claimed and exercised the right and power to control, from the very organization of the State; one in which he has no rights save what he acquires from the law itself, and in which he may be restricted; the other is the enjoyment of a natural and indefeasible right. True, that in the exercise of it, he is subject to the well-settled and defined principles of law that govern the intercourse of men; but his calling cannot be singled out, and struck down, because it is not sufficiently "common" or menial in its character.

But it is asked what is the office of the word "common," prefixed to "labor," if it be not thus to distinguish between classes and grades of employment. The answer is, that as the Statute describes an offence, and affixes a punishment, it contemplates the existence of a motive to do evil in the transgressor. The man who observes the seventh day of the week, and quietly goes about his ordinary avocations on the first, is not in motive, or design, which is the language of the criminal law, a transgressor. And this, because he is engaged in that which is with him, "common labor." But if instead of that, he went about some other employment in which the rights of others were injured, or the peace of society endangered, it would indicate an evil and malicious disposition, and the law instead of protecting, would punish him. As for instance, if the defendant in this case, instead of opening his store, and disposing of his goods to such as came to purchase them, on the first day of the week, had engaged himself in driving a dray in the vicinity of places of public worship, or otherwise molesting others in the enjoyment of their rights, he would not then have been permitted to call that his "common labor," and so cloak an evil and malicious purpose. The very office of the word "common," is to confine those who observe the seventh and use the first day of the week, to their usual trade or occupation.

Again, the inquiry is made, why, if the city council intended to include the ordinary occupation of a citizen, in the words "common labor" used in the proviso, did they insert the prohibition against bartering, selling, etc., in the first section. We answer that the office of the whole Ordinance, taken together, is to prohibit all from either buying or selling who are not protected by the saving clause. Though under the statute and ordinance both, as we construe them, the Israelite is permitted, on account of his religious faith, to vend his wares on the first day of the week—and there is no power to prohibit him from so doing—yet it is perfectly competent to prohibit a traffic with him on that day, by any others than those who hold a like religious faith. His right to sell, if that be his usual occupation—his "common labor"—and the right of others holding to like faith and observances, to buy, are matters which cannot be restricted. The right of others to vend merchandise on that day, even as an ordinary occupation, is restrained by the statute, but the traffic of those not Israelites, and so amenable to the general laws in regard to the Sabbath, with such as are permitted to vend, is not restricted by the Statute, and the office of the prohibition is to remedy this omission, and nothing more. To this end it is competent; beyond this, it has no power.

The defendant is a merchant. He offered to prove, but it was admitted by the Mayor, from personal knowledge, that he closed his place of business on the seventh day of the week, and conscientiously observed that as the Sabbath. His offence consisted in opening his place of business on the first day, and offering his merchandise to those who were disposed to purchase. We claim that as this was his ordinary avocation, it was with him "common labor" and that he is within the proviso as well as of the Ordinance of the Statute. We submit that we have shown the unreasonableness of holding the phrase "common labor" to have relation to the nature of the employment;—that so construed it is inconsistent and absurd; and the law imperfect and ridiculous. But when construed with reference to the man, it has a perfect meaning and operation; while the phrase "common," distinguishes that labor which is customary and usual, from that which may be resorted to from caprice and wantonness, and in despite of good order, and thus furnishes a complete predicate for the effectual application of the law.

If we are correct in these positions, then there is an end of the case. But if the Court shall hold that the intention of the City Council is sufficiently manifest to exclude the avocation of the merchant from the protection granted to "common labor," and that it is not saved by the proviso, then it may be material to inquire as to the power of the council to depart from the policy of the statute, to draw a distinction which it does not recognize, and to create and punish an offence, in contravention of a general law.

The ground we assume as to the relative positions of the ordinance, and the statute, are not fully or fairly stated by plaintiff's counsel. We submit this proposition, and conceive it to be well-settled law: that where the act of a corporation, either by express words, or necessary implication, contravenes the letter or spirit of a statute of law of the State upon the same subject, is necessarily void.—Marietta v. Fearing, 4th Ohio Rep. 432.

We claim, and conceive we have demonstrated, that the phrase "common labor," in the statute, annexes itself to, and covers a man's ordinary occupation; and that it cannot, by any ingenuity, be construed to mean anything else. If the construction we claim for the ordinance be given to it, then it harmonizes with the statute;—but if that of plaintiff's counsel prevail, then there is a serious and fatal repugnance. In the latter case the ordinance is restrictive of the statute—and that, too, in a matter which refers to the organic law of the State. The City enactment undertakes to find that the Legislature has been too liberal in its construction of the Constitution;—too indulgent to the rights of conscience—too tolerant to the man who conscientiously observes the Sabbath of the faith in which he has been reared; and entirely foolish in supposing, that in this enlightened and polished age, "common labor" can embrace anything above paving streets, carrying a hod, or sawing wood.

The policy of this statute is to require a due observance of the first day of the week as a Sabbath. Yet it is marked by a great and distinctive principle; and that is, that its provisions shall not be operative upon those who conscientiously observe the seventh day instead.

For the purpose of argument let it be conceded, that within the policy of the law, a municipal corporation has the power, within its jurisdiction, to legislate upon the same subject; and in so doing, to increase the punishment, or embrace other offences against the Sabbath than those which are named; does it follow, by parity of reasoning, or correct legal conclusion, that such corporation has also a right to infringe the principle of the law, by substituting a saving clause widely different, and far more restrictive, than that which the statute contains? Most assuredly not. Such a doctrine is too absurd in theory to be maintained by the Courts, as it would be too dangerous in practice to be submitted to by the citizen.

The counsel for the City has labored to controvert this position, by a citation of authorities, all of which fall within the first, without impairing the latter point. In Rogers v. Jones, 1st Wendell, 260, it was held that the Legislature of New York having fixed a fine of $1 for servile labor on Sunday, the corporation of the city of New York might increase it to $5; and this is said to be a case in point. Not so. The increase was within the policy of the law—and we are not advised that any rights were impaired. In like manner, the ordinance now under consideration increases the maximum penalty of the statute from $5 to 20; but that is not adduced as a violation of the statute. So as to penalties for storing of gunpowder, cited in the same case. The principle is not shaken.

But the learned counsel lays stress upon the phraseology of the statute. "Nothing herein contained shall be construed," &c. "A simple exemption from the force of that statute, not from liability under any other statute, or any municipal ordinance." The technicality is a mere grasp at a straw; a quibble unworthy the case or the counsel. Is not the statute an existing law of the State? Does it not by its very exemption declare a great principle, and fix the rights of the citizen under it? And may a municipal corporation restrict the one, and infringe the other, because not prohibited, in express terms, from so doing? Most certainly not.

We submit, then, that if the construction which is claimed by the City, be put upon the ordinance, that it is in letter and spirit repugnant to, and contravenes the general law of the State; not because the corporation has legislated upon the same subject, but because in so doing, it has undertaken to restrict the proviso of the statute, and limit the rights of the citizen, which the Constitution has guarantied, and the statute confirmed unto him; and that insomuch as it does so, it is null and void.

We do not propose to continue this argument over the constitutional ground which was taken in the Court below. We apprehend this case will be decided before reaching this point. It may be, that we owe it in courtesy to counsel on the other side, to notice the only material argumeut which he urges in this connection.

The constitutional provision cited, is contained in Article 8, section 3. It guarantees all modes and forms of worship, and expressly declares "that no human authority can, in any case whatsoever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience," &c. We claim that to this provision of the Legislature, by its enactment, has given a clear and positive construction. It is contended on the other hand, that the city council of Cincinnati, having full power to do so, have affixed a different construction; and that it is justifiable upon the ground that the requirement upon the Israelites to observe the first day of the week) is no violation of his conscience; because it does not forbid him to observe the seventh, according to the teachings of his own faith. True it is that the Jew is not prohibited from the observance of his Sabbath; —but enforce this enactment, upon the reasoning advanced, and he will be forced to observe a day, which he conscientiously believes is not the Sabbath, and which he is actually forbidden to regard as such. He takes as his guide, in its literal meaning, the law as it was delivered by Jehovah Himself, "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." The command is not more imperitive to observe the one, than is the permission absolute to enjoy the remaining days of the week. The first of these it is admitted cannot be prohibited, but the latter it is asserted may be restrained. And upon what principle? Because such restriction will not violate his conscience, and will work but a slight inconvenience, in depriving him of one-sixth of the time which he is entitled to devote to worldly concerns. We have before said, that it does violate his conscience, by requiring him to observe a day which he does not regard as the Sabbath. But even if it were otherwise, by what right do you take from him one day out of six, which he believes he is authorized to devote to labor? The answer is given by counsel, because a large majority of the community hold opinions, upon the identity of the Sabbath, adversely to that of the Jewish sect. The reply is ready, and is unanswerable. The Bill of Rights is the bulwark of minorities. Majorities need no such protection. Their tendency is aggression;—and their numerical strength, the weapon of aggression, is the very thing against which the Bill of Rights is thrown up as a barrier. With this guarantee of the organic law on our side, are we, then, a minority? Nay, although this defendant stood alone; one man, among the one hundred thousand of the city and its environs, with this guarantee to lay hold upon, is the majority; since that which he bears in his hand assures to him the whole power of the State for his individual protection.

But the work is only begun when men are compelled by ordinance of the city council, to refrain from business or pleasure upon Sunday, without regard to their conscientious convictions.

It will be thought necessary to go farther—to provide for other religious observances—to enact how the Sabbath shall be observed—to compel attendance upon "Divine worship," and point out by law what form of worship, and impose penalties for non-compliance. And when the mild and merciful sanctions of fine and imprisonment in the county jail, for delinquent poverty, (see Ord. 2d vol. p. 37,) will no longer suffice, more enlarged powers must be called into play; more terrible sanctions denounced. The scourge—the thumb-screw—the rack—the faggot, and the scaffold must be invoked; we must go back upon the dial-plate of time; reënact the blue-laws of Connecticut, and superadd the sanctions of the Inquisition, and the fires of Smithfield! Let this not be scouted as mere rhapsody. We are not a whit better than the pilgrims of the Mayflower; and yet the men who dared the dangers of the ocean and the wilderness, to find freedom of worship upon the Rock of Plymouth, these men were they who forgot the "Golden Rule" in their zeal to do God service, and visited upon the peaceful sect of Quakers more terrible enormities than those of which themselves had been made the victims.

In concluding this argument we have only to observe, that we have no desire to weaken the force, or avert the application of existing laws, for the observance of that day which is designated as the Christian Sabbath. But as we who observe that day have rights, which we dearly cherish, so should we, as we value them, regard the rights of others. The difference among men, upon points such as these, will never be lessened by persecution; whilst every attempt to restrain a minority, however small, in the exercise of those great privileges which have been guarantied to them by the Constitution of the State, only serves to weaken the bonds of government, by diminishing the confidence of the people in its integrity.

RECOGNITIONS AT THE JUDGMENT.

All will be ineffably solemn. Many will be full of joy and others full of bitterness. Think of Cain, the first murderer and fratricide, meeting the martyred Abel. All murderers, and the victims of their cupidity or hatred. Heroes and despots meeting the millions who were slain in their battles, or on whose neck they fixed the yoke of oppression. Popes and inquisitors, confronting those whom they had murdered in the dark dungeon, on the rack, at the stake and elsewhere. Iron-hearted oppressors, standing by the side of the slaves on whom they had inflicted every injury that pride, anger, and lust could invent or perpetrate. Rumsellers, staring on their slaughtered victims and the long train of widows and orphans. Seducers and the victims of their falsehood, treachery, and crime. False teachers, and the souls they had led down to perdition. Ungodly parents and the children whom they ruined forever. Alas, what recognitions of woe will occur on that day.

But there will also be recognitions of gladness. The pious parent will meet with the redeemed child. The godly will there recognize her sainted husband. The emancipated from slavery, poverty, sorrows and sin, will there meet and bless those who prayed and labored in their behalf. The Sabbath school teacher, the tract visitor, the city missionary—the McDowalls, and Priors, and Howards, and Frys, the colporteur and many similar coadjutors, will meet with immortal gems which they, by God's blessing plucked from the mire of ignorance and crime. The missionary and the redeemed from paganism. The faithful pastor and the blood-washed flock. All the chosen ones of God, who have been instrumental in turning souls to righteousness, will there recognize those saved ones. But how soon will all eyes be turned away from each other, to look "without a glass between," on the adorable Judge and Saviour.

SINGULAR ANECDOTE.

Several years ago, a charity sermon was preached in a dissenting chapel in the west of England. When the preacher ascended the pulpit, he thus addressed his hearers:—"My brethern, before proceeding to the duties of this evening, allow me to relate a short anecdote. Many years have elapsed since I was last within the walls of this house. Upon that evening, among the hearers came three men, with the intention of not only scoffing at the minister, but with their pockets filled with stones for the purpose of assaulting him. After he had spoken a few sentences one said—"Let us be at him now;" but the second replied, "No: stop till we hear what he makes of this point." The minister went on, when the second said, "We have heard enough now, throw!" but the third interfered, saying, "He is not as foolish as I expected—let us hear him out." The preacher concluded without being interrupted. Now, mark me, my brethern—of these three men, one was executed for forgery; the second at this moment lies under sentence of death in this city for murder; the other, (continued the minister with great emotion,) the third, through the infinite goodness of God, is even now about to address you—listen to him!"

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, July 15, 1847.

THE "SABBATH DISCUSSION."

It has been to us a matter of surprise, that almost all dissertations on the Sabbath have failed to present the subject in one very important light, and that the most important of all. We refer now to the commemorative character of the Sabbath as a memorial of the work of creation. We do not mean that this character of the institution has been entirely overlooked; we admit, that there are few writers who do not occasionally refer to it. They refer to it, however, only incidentally, not seeming to be sensible that it possesses any great importance; while the other, and—as we conceive—rather subordinate ends of the institution, engage almost the whole of their attention. It is no matter of wonder, therefore, that so many rise from the perusal of their arguments with but very feeble convictions of the everlasting necessity of the Sabbath.

Among our first-day brethren, some very able advocates of the perpetuity and necessity of the Sabbath have appeared, although their mistaken notions about a transfer of the institution from the last to the first day of the week, always made them appear foolish before they had finished their argument. Their ability, however, has been displayed principally in giving importance to the subordinate ends of the institution. As a day of worship, and as a season of rest for the body, they have fought for it manfully. With great cogency they have shown, that, but for a Sabbath enjoined by divine authority, religion would soon cease out of the land; and that both man and beast, if doomed to unremitted toil, would sink under the premature exhaustion of their powers. But while upon these points they have expended their force, and given them every variety of illustration, as if they were the chief things designed by the weekly rest, they have made the commemorative character of the Sabbath such a secondary consideration, and thrown it so completely into the shade, that one can hardly help thinking that they did not see it at all. "Indagator" is evidently one of this class. Doubtless, out of the abundance of his heart his mouth speaketh, when he teaches, that the commemoration of God's rest-day was but an "incidental object" of the appointment of the institution.

Now we are free to confess, that, if the points which these writers insist on are the chief things had in view, we do not see what great difference it can make what day of the week is observed for the purpose. For mere bodily rest, the Sunday would serve our purpose just as well as the Saturday does; and for a mere season of worship, it is, for aught we can see, just as well adapted as any other day. Those, who look upon these as the only ends of the institution, are, therefore, very apt to indulge in a self-complacent pity for the weakness of Sabbatarians in punctiliously clinging to the seventh day. The first day contains as many hours and minutes, as does the seventh, so that the diligent consecration of it would give to Jehovah just as much time; while the sun shines as brightly, and nature wears as lovely an aspect on that day, as on any other day of the week. Sure enough! Why are Sabbatarians so foolishly rigid—so overmuch righteous? If no other important points are to be served by the sabbatic institution than the ones now referred to, we do not much wonder that "E. W. D." proposes to give the law such a construction, as "that 'the seventh' may be reckoned from any point." Nor do we much wonder that "Indagator" dispenses with the Sabbath entirely, since the arguments by which its necessity for the securing of these ends is established, do not possess the conclusiveness of demonstration, and his "Lord's Day," besides seeming to promise the same results, is freed from the inconsistency of an attempt to defend its claims by the fourth commandment. But if, as we believe, the main design of the Sabbath is to commemorate the creation, then we do insist upon it, that no other day than the Saturday will at all answer the purpose.

But what is the great importance of this view of the subject? What is its importance now, under the gospel? For though it enters into the dreamy speculations of Sunday-keepers, that it was once important to commemorate the work of creation,—incidentally, however, as "Indagator" teaches,—yet now that the work of Redemption has been developed, it is supposed to be no longer important. Let us see then if the commemorative character of the Sabbath is not still important. We are much mistaken, if the work of Redemption does not greatly magnify its importance, instead of diminishing it.

The great importance of the Sabbath, considered as a commemorative institution, is this, that it is a standing testimony against Atheism and Idolatry. Bearing witness, as it does, to the fact that Jehovah made all things in six days, and rested on the seventh, it proclaims in the most emphatic manner that the worlds did not spring into existence by chance, or by some fortuitous concurrence of atoms, as the Atheist teaches, but had a Former,—an all-wise and all-powerful First-cause. It also proclaims, just as emphatically, that Jehovah made all things himself, and called not to his aid any of the false gods of the heathen. Thus it testifies against Idolatry. And it is remarkable, that of all the positive institutions of the Bible there is not one, if we except the Sabbath, which carries the mind directly up to God as the Creator and great first-cause, and so bars up the way to infidelity and the abominations of heathenism;—not one, which attests to mankind the great fact, on which all true religion is based,—the fact, indeed, in which all moral law originates, and upon which, therefore, the whole system of divine revelation must finally rest. Judaism and Christianity have, each, their positive institutions commemorative of important facts which lie at the foundations of the systems respectively. Hence these positive institutions become to us the evidences of the truth of these systems, provided we are first made certain of the truth of that system which is anterior to both, and upon which they are both dependent. That system is the Moral Law—a system which has its origin in those relations which God established by the work of creation.

Now let it be remembered, that the transgression of the Moral Law is sin, (1 John 3: 4,) and that Christianity cannot connive at such transgression—no, not in a single point, (Jas. 2: 10,) but must on the contrary forbid it. The work of Redemption, therefore, which is the central point and soul of Christianity, so far from throwing into the shade, as unworthy of notice, a fact, in which the whole Moral Law originates, magnifies that fact, and exalts its importance; for only by so doing can it exalt its own importance. And if it exalts the importance of the fact itself, the necessity of commemorating it must be just as urgent now as it ever was, and even more so. What folly, therefore—what worse than folly—what sheer absurdity, to say, as many do, that Redemption is a work so much more glorious than that of Creation, that the importance of commemorating the latter has ceased! We are ashamed of such theology, and consider it a disgrace to religion and a curse to the world. That Redemption, however vast and important, should set aside the necessity of perpetuating the remembrance of a fact, which is the starting point of all religion—the groundwork of the whole—without which even Redemption itself can have no beginning—is an absurdity not distinguishable from downright wickedness, except in view of the intentions and motives of those who advocate the sentiment. On the contrary, we think that Redemption urges the commemoration of the fact more devoutly. Nay, more;—any system of theology, which blots out an institution that bears so striking a testimony against Atheism as the Sabbath does, appears to us like a system that strikes hands with infidelity. And as the institution also bears testimony against Idolatry, any system which blots it out appears to us like a concession to heathenism.

We wish that our limits would allow us to illustrate this point still more fully. It is the grand stand-point, from which the Sabbath may be seen in all its glory. It has not been sufficiently appreciated by writers generally. It was evidently the principal thing contemplated, when the institution was given to the Jews. "It is a sign between me and you throughout your generations, that ye may know that I am Jehovah that doth sanctify you." "It is a sign between me and the children of Israel forever; for in six days Jehovah made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day he rested, and was refreshed." Ex. 31: 13—17. Thus it was by the observance of this institution, that the Israelites were to be distinguished as acknowledging a God different from any of those worshipped by the heathen—as acknowledging the true God, the one that made heaven and earth. And is it not important, that Christians should be distinguished and known as worshiping the same God? "Is he the God of the Jew only? Is he not of the Gentiles also?"

The parties of the "Sabbath Discussion" might have spared themselves much unnecessary debate, if they had both seen distinctly that feature of the weekly rest, which we have made the theme of this article, and had appreciated its importance. We therefore invite "Indagator" to review his theology once more, assured that he can hardly help seeing that the Sabbath, although it may be a "positive institution," does now, under the gospel, possess an importance, which cannot be predicated of any abrogated or Mosaic ordinance. And farther; as the Sabbath cannot, with any fitness, be a memorial of creation, unless observed on the last day of the week, we invite "E. W. D." to review his theology. Surely he cannot fail to see the absurdity of the position he has taken. We may have more to say about the "Discussion" in another number. *

Christian Patriot.—Under this head a Southern paper announces that "our venerable brother, Cave Johnson, draws a pension of $40 annually, which he is in the habit of applying to benevolent purposes. We received a power of attorney from him a few days ago, in a letter, directing us to draw his pension, and divide it equally between the Indian Mission, China Mission, General Association, and Bible Society, (ten dollars to each,) which has been done accordingly."

The New Hymn Book.—A Prospectus of the new Hymn Book will be found in another column. We hope the pastors of the several churches will at once take measures to bring the subject before their people, and secure the appointment of one or more persons in each church to obtain a list of those who desire copies of the book. By doing so, it is believed that they will serve not only the publishers, but themselves and the people.

Idolatry supported by the British Government.—The Committee of the General Baptist Missionary Society in England, at a meeting held at Nottingham, on the 6th of May last, voted to present a memorial to the British government, against the annual grant to support the worship of the idol Juggernaut. The evil that they complain of is, that "36,000 rupees per annum are granted directly from the British treasury to the support of the idol!" Of the character of the system of heathenism thus supported and fostered by British money, they say, "The missionaries, while pursuing their benevolent labors, have frequently visited this popular shrine of Hindoo idolatry, and witnessed scenes of infamy, misery, and death, which no pen can fully describe, or thought conceive; scenes of lewdness and obscenity far too gross to be ever described, are annually beheld; while the more impure the songs, the greater is the applause, not of men only, but of scores and thousands of females, debased by delight in such obscenity."

THE PENNSYLVANIA CASE.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The day after I dispatched my last note, a week ago, I received a letter from one of the Attorneys in the Snowhill Case, which explained the delay in receiving information respecting the proceedings before the Supreme Court. They had written to me, immediately, from the spot, but, by mistake, directed the letter to Burlington, instead of Bordentown.

Our attorneys found, on arriving at Harrisburg, on the 9th ult., that but two and a half days were allotted for the argument of all the cases, (thirteen in number,) from Bedford and Franklin counties, and that the appeal from Snowhill was the last but one on the list; consequently there would be no time to argue the case fully under that arrangement; which, in connection of the bench not being full (Judge Rodgers being absent on a trip to Europe,) it was deemed advisable to continue the case until next sessions.

Our attorneys did all they could under the circumstances. One prepared a brief, and the other an argument at some length, which they proposed to submit to the Court in print, (which is often done in cases of intricate law points.) This the Court declined—one of the Judges remarking, that it was a very grave and important question, and that he would prefer to hear it argued at length, and be decided by a full bench. Our Counsel, upon this suggestion, continued the case, and I think wisely; for we shall certainly have a better chance, with a full Bench; and from what transpired our Attorneys are greatly encouraged to hope, that they will be crowned with success. Yours,

W. M. Fahnestock.

P. S. It is a rare thing for me to notice any typographical errors, which may occur in my articles, but in my short note of week before last, your compositor perpetrated two, which make my letter read rather awkwardly. For reaffirm or reverse, it was made to read revise—they may revise without reversing. And, again, cordial coöperation, was printed candid—they may be very candid without being at all cordial.

EXHIBITION OF ALFRED ACADEMY.

Alfred, July 2, 1847.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Yesterday, July 1st, was an intensely interesting day with us in Alfred. It was the closing day of another academic year of our flourishing school. At an early hour, a vast and interesting assemblage of people from the surrounding country, mostly young, were upon the ground, where extensive and suitable preparations for their accommodation had been made. Between the hours of nine and ten, the Professors, Teachers, and members of the school, together with citizens and friends, were, under the direction of Marshals, marched to the grove, where, after the preliminaries were duly arranged, the exhibition commenced, which consisted of declamations, compositions, &c., usual on such occasions. From time to time through the day we had singing from the choir belonging to the school, and music from the Andover Brass Band. The whole day was thus employed; and the anticipations of the public of an intellectual feast were fully realized, for a more orderly, attentive and delighted auditory I never saw. So far as I heard, the expression was one of universal satisfaction.

The past year has been one of great prosperity with this school. Nothing has occurred in anywise to retard its progress, save that for a time during the spring the measles prevailed to some extent.

When I think of the blessings in promise to our denomination, the country around them, and even to the heathen world, by the Alfred Academy and DeRuyter Institute, I am filled with joy and hope, and I do invoke the blessing of the God of wisdom and mercy upon them, their conductors, supporters, and students.

Fraternally yours, N. V. HULL.

P. S. The examination previous to the close reflected honor equally upon the teachers and students. Upon the last day of examination, the several Literary Societies were addressed by A. P. Lanning, Esq., of Rushford; and for truly excellent sentiment, chasteness of style, and happy delivery, the address was second to none ever before delivered in this place.

N. V. H.

Legalized Ignorance and Oppression.—A law in relation to the instruction of negroes, passed by the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, went into operation on the 1st day of July. It forbids all persons to keep school to teach any negro, whether free or slave, or mulatto, to read or write, in that State—forbids any assemblage of negroes or mulattoes for religious worship, where the services are performed by negroes, unless a sheriff, marshal, or Justice of the Peace, be present, to prevent seditious speeches—forbids all free negroes or mulattoes from emigrating, under any pretext, into Missouri, from any other State. Penalty for violation of the provisions of the above act, $500 fine, and six months imprisonment.

Progress.—Some persons are forever grumbling about the evils of the present age in comparison with those of the past. To them every thing ancient is sacred, while the wickedness of to-day is seen in all its enormity. It would do such persons good to read a sermon by Rev. Mr. Parker, of Boston, bearing more or less upon this subject. Here is a short extract from it, showing that there were some things done in old time, which would scarcely be tolerated at the present day:—

"It is but little more than two hundred years, since a man was put to death in the most enlightened country of Europe for eating meat on Friday! Not two hundred years since men and women were hanged in Massachusetts for a crime now reckoned impossible! It is not a hundred years since two negro slaves were judicially burned alive in this very city! These facts make us shudder, but hope also."

Long Sermons and Prayers.—Our modern complainers will be more reconciled to their destiny when they are informed of the experience of those who went before them. When Essex left London to march against King Charles, then at Oxford, he requested the Assembly of Divines, usually known as the "Westminster Assembly," to keep a day of fasting for his success. The manner in which it was observed is thus stated by Baillie:

"We spent from nine to five graciously. After Dr. Twiss had began with a brief prayer, Mr. Marshall prayed large two hours, most divinely confessing the sins of the members of the Assembly in a wonderful pathetic and prudent way. After, Mr. Arrowsmith preached an hour; then a psalm; thereafter Mr. Vines prayed near two hours, and Mr. Palmer preached an hour, and Mr. Leaman prayed near two hours; then a psalm. After, Mr. Henderson brought them to a sweet conference of the heat confessed in the Assembly and other seen faults to be remedied, and the conveniency to preach against all sects, especially Anabaptists and Antinominans. Dr. Twiss closed with a short prayer and blessing. God was so evidently in all this exercise, that we expect certainly a blessing."

Perseverance and System.—Little do many who read a daily newspaper know of the toils, pains, anxieties and privations which its persevering conductors may have felt and suffered while struggling to establish its reputation with the public. Mr. Chandler, the deservedly successful editor of the United States Gazette, which he has recently sold for $45,000, thus describes his earlier exertions, some 25 years since:—

"When I entered upon the duties of editor of this paper, in 1822, its existence as a daily paper seemed scarcely to be known. A few, a very few, of the old Federal party continued to pay for it, but with the multitude it was obsolete—it was among the things lost. Evidences of resuscitation were soon marked, and from a few hundreds the subscription list rose to nearly a thousand, when I became joint proprietor. How I toiled at the editorial columns, and how the constant companion of my labors (G. H. Hart, Esq.) toiled in his department, I can scarcely explain; but month after month, year after year, did I attend personally to a school of more than a hundred scholars, during seven hours of the day, and then write editorials, collect and select the news, do all the reporting, and much of the correspondence of the daily paper, retiring, with the companion of my labors, at two and three o'clock in the morning from the office, to renew labors after three or four hours' attempt to sleep. Ruinous as all this was to the constitution, it was continued, and the paper slowly, but constantly, gained patronage."

Baptism of a Dead Body.—It is hard to believe the following story. And yet it is told by a correspondent of the Paris Archives of Christianity, who vouches for its truth:—

"An English blacksmith in Derrin (department of the North) died on the 16th of March last, after several months' illness, and was baptized on the 18th, about two hours before being interred.

"I have inquired into the matter, says the writer, and find as follows: The man was a Protestant, and never, so far as is known, showed the least intention to become a Catholic; but his relatives, being more attached to pomps and shows than to evangelical faith, made as an excuse their remoteness from a minister of their own religion, and applied to the curate of the parish to obtain admittance for the corpse into his church, and that it might be buried according to Catholic rites. The curate did not refuse so good an opportunity, knowing his pay would be according to his services, and that he would in this case make more money from the body than from the soul. But first he would resort to a pious stratagem! As he had not been able to make the deceased a believer nor an obedient member of the Romish church during his life, he found it easier to make him one after his death. Accordingly, two hours before carrying him from his dwelling, and twenty-four hours after he had breathed his last, he was baptized, and then buried with due pomp, as being a Protestant, converted to Catholicism."

THE MIGHTY FALLEN.

Elihu Burritt, in his "Over-sea Omnibus" for the Christian Citizen, says:—The great and good Dr. Chalmers is dead, and the like of him the world will scarcely see again. He arrived in Edinburgh, from London, on Saturday, the 30th of May, where he had preached to an audience of the first personages in the Kingdom, among whom was Lord John Russell, Lord Brougham and others. He retired on Sunday evening in his usual health, and was expected to address the General Assembly of the Free Church on Monday; but, alas! he was found dead in his bed at eight o'clock in the morning. Thus the great and good men of the fatherland are falling, or rather ascending, like stars withdrawn from the firmament of the present age, to go from glory to glory in their upward career. But their works and the light of their lives will follow them, a bright and endless posterity, to bless the world they have left. Truly many fathers in the English Israel have fallen asleep during the past year. First, the venerable philanthropist, Thomas Clarkson, went to his reward. Then the good, pure, princely Joseph John Gurney was called from his labors of Christian love into the joy of his Lord. Then fell O'Connell, whose giant strength of purpose and of intellect was felt throughout Christendom. Lastly, Dr. Chalmers has been summoned to his rest, leaving a memory, a speaking life behind, mighty thoughts of eloquent teaching, for the young generations of coming time. These are gone, and many more the world is loth to spare will go; but there will be no gap, no chasm in human progress. The sea of time will close over the greatest of its coffined dead, and the days of mourning will soon be ended even for them.

VILLAGE FEUDS OF THE CHINESE.

The following extract from a letter of Mr. Pohlman, at Amoy, China, published in the Missionary Herald, will give some idea of the village feuds which frequently occur in China. It is evident from this account, as well as from others which are frequently published, that the Chinese Government extends over too large a territory to be in all cases efficiently administered:—

"In several of the villages which we visited the second day, we found none but old men, women and children. All the young men who were able to bear arms, had gone out to battle; and ever and anon the report of guns and the shouts of the victors apprised us that the work of death and destruction was going forward. A civil war had just broken out, and the whole region was in a high state of excitement. Two of the most powerful surnames of the island combined against all the other surnames scattered abroad in every place. This caused villages in close proximity to be raised against each other; and a man's nearest neighbors became his bitterest foes. This outbreak has occurred at a most unfavorable period. It is the time of the latter harvest, when all able-bodied men are required for gathering in the products of the soil. We saw many in the fields, spending all their strength in collecting potatoes and ground nuts, while others were keeping guard, and protecting them from the depredations of their enemies. While talking to a few persons at one village, three slugs fell near me; and presently intelligence was brought that one of the combatants had been mortally wounded. The aged father of the young man ran about in great distress, crying out, with tears, "What is to be done? What is to be done?" The expense of the war is paid by subscription, and all the money that can possibly be raised, is required for powder and balls, and also for sacrifices to the gods, whose aid and protection are implored by special oblations and unusual rites. In several places we observed the people engaged in religious ceremonies and idolatrous worship; while crowds of old men and boys collected together to enjoy the sport and feast on the offerings. This state of hostility is of long standing, it having originated in an old quarrel about the right to a well.

"These village wars are of frequent occurrence in Fuh-kein province, and are suffered to go on without much interference on the part of the proper authorities. It is said that measures have been taken to stop the present conflict, but have proved ineffectual. The truth is, the government of China is the most inefficient in the world. It may be said that no country is more governed, and yet less governed than this same celestial empire.

"We frequently found ourselves in the midst of a battle, and made it a point to see and exhort both hostile parties to desist. They acknowledged the truth of our reasoning and the wickedness of their course, but they said that matters had now become so involved and intricate that the only way of settlement was by brute force. The state of feeling is such that, although the mandarins should succeed in putting a stop to the present combat, the smallest provocation, on either side, would be taken as a call to renewed war and bloodshed. Such is the condition of the country."

Dr. D'Aubigne.—John Henry Merle D'Aubigné, author of the History of the Reformation, was born in Geneva in 1794, being now fifty-three years old. His ancestors were refugees from religious oppression in France and Italy. His grandfather, Francis Merle, married Elizabeth D'Aubigné, and by a custom in Switzerland, the maternal name being sometimes added to the paternal, the historian has both. Hence, in his own country, he is often called Merle, or Merle D'Aubigné. He studied for the ministry in a Socinian Institution, in Geneva; but about the time he was completing his education there, the celebrated Mr. Haldane, a Baptist, of Scotland, though unable to speak French, attempted, through an interpreter, to teach these Socinian students "the glorious gospel." God blessed his efforts to the salvation of some ten or twelve, among whom were Merle D'Aubigné, Gaussen, and Felix Neff.

D'Aubigné was settled for a time over an evangelical French congregation in Brussels, from which he was driven by the revolution of 1830. He returned to Geneva, and was placed at the head of the new Theological School, of which his friend Gaussen is a Professor, and which has now forty students in the preparatory and theological departments.

General Intelligence.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The French Mail Steamer Union arrived at New York since our last, bringing news from Europe three days later, but not important. The prospect of good crops all over Europe, seemed to improve rather than otherwise.

A letter has been received in Cork from a very intimate friend of the O'Connell family, which states that the remains of the "Liberator" are not expected to reach London before the middle of July. The cause of this delay the writer attributes to the succession of obsequies which are expected to take place in every town through which the body of the illustrious dead will pass. Having reached London, the letter farther states, the funeral procession will proceed through Birmingham and Liverpool, at which place a special steamer will be in waiting to convey the "Great Tribune's" remains to the metropolis of Ireland, which they are not expected to reach before the end of July.

The number of letters that pass through the Post Office annually, for London and its environs alone, is 75,000,000. They average four inches in length and three inches wide. If this immense number of letters were laid down in a horizontal position, lengthways, they would reach to the extent of 5,534 miles; if laid so as to form square feet, the whole would cover 142 acres of land. They average in weight one-third of an ounce. The whole would weigh 697 tons. The postage of these, at one penny each, amounts to £312,500.

One piece of intelligence, which we have seen in two or three Irish papers, is very lamentable; we mean the death of clergymen's wives, fever-stricken while ministering to the sick among their husbands' flocks. Such women realize the character which Dr. Johnson described as the noblest in the world—that of "the Christian gentlewoman."

A general meeting of teachers, from all parts of Scotland, was to be held at Edinburgh, on the 19th inst., for the purpose of instituting an educational association, which, after it has been incorporated, will grant educational degrees, and otherwise organize the scholastic body.

A great meeting was held in London in honor of William Caxton, the earliest English printer. Lord Morpeth was in the chair, and the American Minister, Mr. Bancroft, was present. The site selected for Caxton's monument is Westminster Abbey. Lord Morpeth paid the United States a great compliment in his speech.

Randall's Island.—Randall's Island lies about six miles from the city of New York, in the East River, and contains 160 acres, including some marshy lands. It was purchased by the city for $25,000. When taken possession of by the city it was comparatively without buildings, and the project of making it profitable by pauper labor deemed impossible. At first, thirty were introduced, and the number has been increased until there are now one hundred. Some half-dozen buildings have been erected for the use of the paupers, altogether by pauper labor, beside fine out houses, and a snug residence for the Superintendent. It is now in contemplation to erect a nursery building soon. During the last year, the island has not only supported 100 paupers, with but one hired overseer, and paid the expense of management, but has added $2,000 to the City Treasury. Upward of 100 tons of hay were cut last season, and will be this—and it has 15 acres of fine corn, and 10 acres of potatoes, beside an abundance of vegetables, now growing. Fifty cows are kept on the Island, and 500 quarts of milk daily supplied to Blackwell's Island beside what is used at home. The Island promises in a short time to maintain a larger number of paupers, and return still greater interest to the city.

A Fourth of July Accident.—The most painful accident connected with the Fourth was the death of Mr. James A. Brown, the oldest son of James Brown, Esq., principal partner in the commercial houses of Brown, Brothers & Co., Brown, Shipley & Co., &c., in New York, Baltimore, New Orleans, and Liverpool. This event took place at Flushing, L. I., on Saturday afternoon. Mr. Brown had just arrived from the City, and while in the lawn in company with his young bride, amusing themselves at a swing, some careless boys in the vicinity fired a small cannon, a ball from which entered his heart, killing him almost instantly. He fell at the feet of his lady, whom he had that moment taken out of the swing. The boys supposed that the gun was loaded only with powder, but a judicial investigation can only determine whether the dreadful occurrence was the result of wanton mischief, or carelessness. The deceased was only twenty-four years of age, and had recently married the daughter of G. G. Howland, Esq., at whose country-seat the fatal accident took place.

Statistics of Providence, R. I.—Among the manufactures of this enterprising city, says the Journal, are calico and calandering works, bleaching 108 tons of cotton cloth, and printing 390,000 yards of calico. weekly; cotton mills of 34,000 spindles—woolen mills, which weave 375,000 yards of jeans and satinets yearly—these employ 1,800 hands. There are also two wood-screw factories, using annually 700 tons of iron; 14 furnaces, using 5,000 tons of pig-iron for machinery, and also making 5,000 plows and 14,000 stoves; 3 steam engine building shops; a rolling mill, making 10,000 tons of railroad iron and wire each year; 3 India rubber shoe factories; 1 shoe-tie and stay-lacing do.; 1 edge-tool do., and eight engraving shops. These employ 1,647 hands. Cotton and woolen machinery-making shops employ 1,200 men. $100,000 are paid yearly for labor alone, in manufacturing jewelry.

Fair of the American Institute.—The Twentieth Annual Fair of this excellent establishment will be held this year, not at Niblo's, but at Castle Garden, one of the largest ampitheatres in America. It will open to the public on Tuesday, October 5, and continue open upward of a fortnight. Models, machinery, and choice fabrics of skill and ingenuity from American workshops will be received for exhibition and competition during October 2d, 3d, and 4th. Cattle shows, Agricultural and Horticultural exhibitions, Plowing and Spading Matches, and the National Convention of Gardeners, Farmers, &c., will occupy part of the time—and gold and silver medals, diplomas, cups, books, &c., be bestowed on merit, under the inspection and on the award of the most careful and competent judges.

She would be a Sailor.—The Boston Traveler says that a young and rather good-looking girl, named Julia Bickford, not more than 20 years of age, was brought up in the Police Court upon a complaint, preferred at her own request, of being a common vagabond. She was sent to the House of Correction for three months. She makes the following statements in regard to herself, and they appear to be corroborated by her general appearance and conversation:—She says that, several years since, she accompanied her uncle on a sea voyage, in her woman's apparel; that taking a liking to the sea, upon her return she went to a fitting-out store and got trusted for a suit of male apparel, for which she honestly paid on her return. Thus accoutred, she managed to get a berth as cook, and in this and other capacities she had made voyages to the East and West Indies and to the South. Finally, getting into bad company, she had the moral courage to go voluntarily to the House of Correction, and thus endeavor to break off the bad connections which had been a consequence of her sea voyages.

Important Trial.—An important case has been before the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in which Mr. Webster and Mr. Choate were employed. The case, in brief, is this:—One Oliver Smith, a bachelor, the son of a farmer, with but small original means, lived, in a neighboring town, to the age of 80. Always saving and economical, and loving money, he became in later life shrewd and expert in the management of large sums; and, from dealing in country bonds and mortgages, turned his attention to operations in stocks. He was successful, and amassed a fortune of $300,000. In 1844 he made his will, and gave the bulk of his property to various charities. He died in December, '45. The will is contested on one single ground—viz. that Theophilus Pearsons Phelps, one of the witnesses, was not a competent witness, to the will, being, as was alledged, at the time an insane person. The Court sustained the will.

Chinese Junk.—The Chinese Junk, an account of which was received some months since, arrived at New York last week, after a passage of 212 days from Canton, having touched at St. Helena on the 23d of April last, where she was an object of great curiosity, and was overrun with visiters during her stay of seven days. She is built throughout of teak wood, is nearly new, and was bought by Capt. Kellett for $17,000. She is shaped like a whale boat, is one hundred and fifty feet long, twenty-five feet beam, and twelve feet deep in the hold. She was originally a war vessel, and still retains some of the peculiarities of that character. Externally she is painted white, with a black waist as far as the foremast, then red to the stern. On each side of her bow is painted an immense Eye, while a spread Eagle flourishes on her stern. Her bow is flat, like that of a scow, with no bow-sprit, but in the place usually occupied by the bow-sprit is an opening about as wide as a barn-yard gate, after the fashion of a Brooklyn ferry-boat, to give a chance for working the anchors, which are also made of teak wood and hung by cables of twisted bamboo. At the bow are also fastened two large cables, which run the whole length of the ship, and form the only hanging of the rudder, a delicate affair of teak wood, weighing some dozen tons, when fully immersed being twenty-three feet in the water, and when hoisted up twelve. To manage this contrivance it takes some thirty men and a stout windlass. The main cabin is thirty feet long, ten and a half high and twenty-three wide, and is adorned with a great variety of figures in fresco, among which are dragons, eagles and tigers as large as life and twice as ferocious. In this cabin are many pieces of beautiful Chinese furniture, which might well be copied by our cabinet makers, together with other curiosities, among which the most prominent was a great idol or "Josh," carved from a single block of wood, and gilded. This divinity has eighteen arms and four eyes, and was brought on board the ship with the greatest reverence by its Chinese bearers. Above, in a little recess on the poop, stands the regular "Josh" of the ship, before which a light is kept constantly burning, and to which the Chinamen have religiously resorted when the junk was threatened by bad weather. This Junk was brought to the country by a Speculator, who intends to exhibit her in the principal seaports, and then sell the curiosities she contains. [Tribune.

Elihu Burritt says that Ireland is slowly recovering from the desolation of destitution and disease. Corn food is cheaper and more abundaut, which, with an increase of early vegetables and milk, has contributed much to the comfort of of the people. Fever has abated in malignity, though sill widely prevalent. It is admitted that the crops are the most luxuriant that ever appeared in the country. The potato bids fair to survive the rumor which consigned it to destruction. A larger extent of other root crops has been cultivated this year than in the last five years taken together. So there is hope for poor Ireland yet.

A feasible and obvious application of Harvey's grand discovery of the use of valves in raising the blood through the veins, has been suggested by a correspondent of the (London) Mechanics' Magazine; namely, the raising of water from the sea, by the lash of the waves, through valved tubes, into reservoirs on a high level—for the acquisition, of course, of an unlimited supply of water-power, to be turned to any requisite purpose. The inventor proposes to test the practicability of this kind of Water-Ram on South-sea Beach, England.

A gentleman in Oxford, N. Y., has a mode of furnishing light-houses with the Drummond light, to be supported by gases produced by magneto-electrical machines, which are to be kept in operation by the power of water descending from an elevated reservoir, which reservoir is to be occasionally replenished by pumps operated by a wind-mill mounted above the lantern.

SUMMARY.

Just as the frigate Macedonian was leaving our shores for Ireland, with her relief cargo, we received the news that the officers and crew of the United States, the frigate that captured her, had taken up a subscription on the coast of Africa, for the same cause, amounting to $653; and Commodore Reed states, that it would have been still larger, but for the necessity of limiting the generosity of his noble tars. Thus these ships, once engaged in a desperate conflict with each other, have now joined in the same work of mercy.

Among a number of emigrants arrived in Philadelphia the other day, was an old man in the fifty-eighth year of his age, who had with him ten sons, four daughters, five daughters-in-law, three sons-in-law, twenty-eight grand-children, and two great grand-children. He was smoking his pipe quite leisurely, and seemed happy. They intend to locate themselves in the western country, and till the soil.

Gen. Jackson, in his will, directed that the pistols which were presented by Washington to Lafayette, at the commencement of the War of the Revolution, and which were subsequently presented to General Jackson by the Washington family, be presented to the son of Lafayette, in Paris. This has been done through Mr. J. L. Martin, United States Charge d'Affaires in France; and their receipt is acknowledged in a letter from Lafayette.

The Warsaw (Illinois) Visiter says: Some three weeks since Mr. John Wadeof Henry Co. was killed by his brother Washington Wade. The deceased was whipping his daughter, when the other interfered—this leading to altercation, Washington drew a pistol and shot, the ball entering the arm and left breast. He died several hours after the wound. The daughter rushed upon him with a stick to complete the awful work.

The committee of the Jackson Monument Association invite proposals to deliver in the centre of Lafayette Square, Washington City, "a solid rude rock of granite, or other durable stone, of between 600 and 1,000 tons in weight—as near as may be of the latter weight." It is designed as the pedestal of said monument, and must be on the ground by the 1st day of March next.

It is said by some of the scientific French Journals, that a company in that country, have, after a variety of experiments, succeeded in extracting oil from a species of rock. The company possesses, in Autunnois, inexhaustible beds of the material from which this oil is extracted, as well as several other productions, as paraffine, mineral tar, a new kind of manure, invaluable for exhausted land, and many others.

We learn from the Milwaukie Gazette, that the entries of Public Lands at the office in that city since January 1, 1847, exceed one hundred thousand acres, and that the receipts are upwards of one hundred and thirty thousand dollars. The quantity of land remaining unsold on the Milwaukie District is between 350 and 400,000 acres.

At a dinner given by the municipal authorities of Boston to the President, at Revere-Hall, no wine or intoxicating liquors were admitted. Mr. Mayor Quincy, with that appetite for Reform which distinguishes his name, refused to preside on the occasion, unless the absence of pernicious drinks was secured.

With respect to the distribution and growth of the vine, it requires, according to Meyen, at least five months of a mean heat of 59 degrees Farenheit to produce good wine. If September and October, the season when the grape fully ripens, have not this degree of heat, the wine is sour; and a country where this is the case is therefore unsuitable to the culture of the vine.

The flavor of coffee may be improved by adding forty to fifty grains of carbonate of soda to each pound of roasted coffee. In addition to improving the flavor, the soda makes the coffee more healthy, as it neutralizes the acid contained in the infusion.

The Cincinnati Herald states that Professor Mitchell has discovered a new cluster of stars, one thousand in number, to which he has given the name of Becchoide. Their appearance is singular. They are of a blue tinge, and emit an unsteady light. They seem to revolve in a spiral orbit.

The insurance offices will have to pay £47,000, the amount of the policies effected on the life of Mr. O,Connel; but little of this large sum goes to his family, the insurances having been principally effected by third parties.

Brooklyn is not called the city of churches without good cause. The Daily Advertiser says that there have been 46 churches built in that city since the year 1823. We doubt whether there is another city in the world with 50 churches and not one theatre.

Mr. Astor has in his will left near half a million of dollars for the establishment of a free library in this city. He made this legacy, not expecting from his great age to survive long.

The Waterville Union calculates the number of logs that have gone over Titonic Falls, in the Kennebec River, at 7,200 a day, 360,000 in fifty days. It would be a low estimate to prize the logs at $3 each, making their value $1,080,000.

The Wesleyan Conference in England has been recently united with the Canadian Conference, constituting a united body in Western Canada of 178 regular ministers and more than 900 congregations.

Haying and harvesting will soon be ready for the scythe and the cradle, and in a cloudy morning it is a matter of importance to the farmer to know whether it will be sunshine or showers in the afternoon. If the ants have cleared their holes out nicely and piled the dirt up high, it seldom fails to bring a good day for the farmer, even if it should be cloudy till 10 or 11 o'clock in the forenoon. Spider-webs will be very numerous about the tops of the grass and grain some cloudy mornings, and fifty years' observation has shown the writer of this that these little weather-guessers seldom fail in their prediction of a fair day.

The Scientific American says that a gentleman in Brooklyn has discovered a plan by which the temperature inside of a dwelling may be reduced to twenty or thirty degrees below that of the air outside. He proposes to construct barracks upon this plan for the U. S. Army at Vera Cruz; and by having the soldiers live in a temperature below that in which the yellow fever and other tropical diseases become contagious, he hopes to save hundreds of valuable lives. From his successful experiments, made during the warmest day this season, we are favorably impressed with its utility.

Fare through $2 50.

As some boys were bathing in the Miami Canal, recently, one of them got his foot into a nest of silver and other kinds of watches. Several of them had been valuable, and one contained a diamond, though most of them had been stripped of their cases. One boy got twenty-one watches, another eighteen, and none less than a watch apiece. The canal has not been wholly drawn off for about a year, on this level, and the watches must have been dropped in within that time.

Jesse Hutchinson, one of the famous "Hutchinson Family" of singers, has recently built a beautiful stone cottage, in Lynn, Mass., called High Rock Cottage, which has been described as an elegant specimen of architecture, situated on a picturesque hill, commanding a magnificent view of the ocean, and one of the finest landscapes in the world.

DIED,

In Scioto, Ohio, on the 25th of June, of an affection of the brain, Mrs. Eliza Saxton, wife of Frederick Saxton, aged 37 years. Sister Saxton became decidedly pious in early life, but did not make a public profession until 1842, at which time she became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Scioto, of which she remained a worthy member until she was removed to fairer climes. She has left an affectionate husband and seven children to mourn their loss.

In life and conversation most truly did she shine,
Forbearing to speak evil, affectionate and kind;
Endeared to all acquaintance, her light will still illume,
Her fair and lovely example has left a sweet perfume. c. c.

THE NEW HYMN BOOK.

At the last meeting of the General Conference, a Committee, consisting of Thomas B. Brown, Lucius Crandall, Wm. B. Maxson, Eli S. Bailey, Nathan V. Hull, and Sherman S. Griswold, was appointed to prepare and secure the publication of a Hymn Book suited to the wants of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Subsequently Mr. Brown, Chairman of the Committee, suggested a plan for the work, which received the unanimous and hearty approval of the other members of the Committee, and which he was requested by them to carry out. We are happy to state, that he has completed the duty assigned to him, and has prepared for the press a book which is believed by good judges to be equal in point of merit to any thing of the kind now extant. The copy is already in the hands of the printer, and the work will be published and ready for distribution on the 10th day of September next. It will contain above one thousand hymns, covering nearly six hundred pages of the size of the medium edition of "The Psalmist," now in use among the Baptists. It will be printed on fine paper, and upon stereotype plates prepared from entirely new type. In style of workmanship, it is intended that the book shall be inferior to none. To secure for it as general a circulation as possible, the price, in common leather binding, has been fixed at 75 cents per copy, or $9 per dozen. Copies will be put up in extra binding, with gilt edges, &c., to suit every variety of taste, at prices corresponding to the style.

The Publishers of the Book are desirous of learning what number of copies will be at once demanded, in order that they may regulate the size of the first edition by the demand. They request, therefore, that those in want of the work will give them as early notice as possible of the number they desire. Probably the best way to do the business will be for each society or church to appoint some person to ascertain how many will be wanted within its own bounds, and send on the order accordingly. The books will be ready for delivery, as before stated, on the 10th day of September, in time to supply at the Anniversary of the Missionary and Tract Societies in DeRuyter, all who may wish to obtain them in that way. To save uneasiness, no money will be required until the books are delivered; and to save loss, no books will be delivered except for the money or its equivalent. Orders for the books are now solicited, and should in all cases be accompanied with explicit information as to the way in which they may be sent. Those who wish to be sure of copies of the first edition, should send their orders as early as the 1st day of September. Address, "Utter & Champlin, No. 9 Spruce-st., New-York."

THE DAILY NATIONAL WHIG is published in the city of Washington, every day, at three o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted, and served to subscribers in the City, at the Navy Yard, in Georgetown, in Alexandria, and in Baltimore, the same evening, at six and a quarter cents a week, payable to the sole agent of the Whig, G. L. Gillchrist, Esq., or his order. It is also mailed to any part of the United States for $4 per annum, or $2 for six months, payable in advance. Advertisements of ten lines or less inserted one time for 50 cents, two times for 75 cents, three times for $1, one week for $1 75, two weeks for $2 75, one month for $4, two months for $7, three months for $10, six months for $16, one year for $20, payable always in advance.

The "National Whig" is what its name indicates. It speaks the sentiments of the Whig party of the Union on every question of public policy. It advocates the election to the Presidency of Zachary Taylor, subject to the decision of a Whig National Convention. It makes war to the knife upon all the measures and acts of the Administration deemed to be adverse to the interests of the country, and exposes without fear or favor the corruptions of the party in power. Its columns are open to every man in the country, for the discussion of political or any other questions.

In addition to politics, a large space in the National Whig will be devoted to publications upon Agriculture, Mechanics, and other useful arts, Science in general, Law, Medicine, Statistics, &c. Choice specimens of American and Foreign Literature will also be given, including Reviews, &c. A weekly list of the Patents issued by the Patent Office will likewise be published—the whole forming a complete family newspaper.

The "Weekly National Whig," one of the largest newspapers in the United States, is made up from the columns of the Daily National Whig, and is published every Saturday, for the low price of $2 per annum, payable in advance. A double sheet of eight pages will be given whenever the psess of matter shall justify it.

The Memoirs of General Taylor, written expressly for the National Whig, are in course of publication. They commenced with the second number, a large number of copies of which have been printed, to supply calls for back numbers.

CHAS. W. FENTON,
Proprietor of the National Whig.

P. S. All daily, weekly, and semi-weekly papers in the United States are requested to insert this advertisement once a week for six months, noticing the price for publishing the same at the bottom of the advertisement, and send the paper containing it to the National Whig office, and the amount will be duly remitted. Our editorial brethren are also requested to notice the National Whig in their reading columns.

CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE.

REV. J. T. HEADLEY, EDITOR.

THE CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE, formerly under the care of Rev. D. Mead, commences its fourth volume under the editorship of Rev. J. T. Headley, author of "Napoleon and his Marshals," "Sacred Mountains," "Letters from Italy," &c. We hazard nothing in saying that this Magazine, so deservedly popular hitherto, is destined to fill a large place in public estimation; that it will not only maintain its present enviable distinction, but earn to itself a far higher popularity, and become the companion of many a circle to which it is now a stranger, gladdening by its presence, while it exerts an influence pure, elevating, and healthful. The Editor will bend his energies to make this the most popular Magazine of the day, and while he avails himself of articles from the best writers, he will draw freely from his own exhaustless store.

It will continue to maintain its high moral tone, and nothing will be admitted into its columns which will minister to the corrupt passions and tendencies of youth, or which "the author dying would wish to blot."

☞ Price, two dollars a year. Three copies for five dollars.

A few good, responsible agents wanted to circulate this work; to whom the best inducements will be offered.

Miscellaneous.

WHEN IS THE TIME TO DIE.

I asked a glad and happy child,
Whose hands were filled with flowers,
Whose silvery laugh rang free and wild
Among the vine-wreathed bowers;
I crossed her sunny path and cried,
When is the time to die?
Not yet! not yet; the child replied,
And swiftly bounded by.

I asked a maiden: back she threw
The tresses of her hair;
Grief's tresses o'er her cheeks I knew,
Like pearls that glistened there:
A flush passed o'er her lily brow,
I heard her spirit sigh;
Not now she cried; Oh no; not now;
Youth is no time to die.

I asked a mother as she pressed
Her first-born in her arms,
As gently on her tender breast
She laid those infant charms;
In quivering tones her accents came—
Her eyes were dim with tears;
My boy his mother's life must claim
For many years, many years.

I questioned one in manhood's prime,
Of proud and fearless air;
His brow was furrowed not by time,
Or dimmed by woe or care.
In angry accents he replied,
And flashed with scorn his eye;
Talk not to ME of death, he cried,
For only age should die.

I questioned age; for him the tomb
Had long been all prepared;
But death who withers youth and bloom,
This man of years had spared.
Once more his nature's dying fire
Flashed high, and thus he cried:
Life, only life is my desire!
Then gasped, and groaned, and died.

I asked a Christian,—Answer thou—
When is the hour of death?
A holy calm was on his brow,
And peaceful was his breath;
And sweetly o'er his features stole,
A smile, a light divine;
He spake the language of his soul,
My Maker's time is mine.

TWO NEIGHBORS AND THE HENS.

BY H. C. WRIGHT.

A man in New Jersey told me the following circumstances respecting himself and one of his neighbors:

"I once owned a large flock of hens. I generally kept them shut up; but, one spring, I concluded to let them run in my yard, after I had clipped their wings, so that they could not fly. One day, when I came home to dinner, I learned that one of my neighbors had been there, full of wrath, to let me know my hens had been in his garden, and that he had killed several of them, and thrown them over into my yard. I was greatly enraged that he had killed my beautiful hens, that I valued so much. I determined, at once, to be revenged,—to sue him, or in some way get redress. I sat down and ate my dinner, however, as calmly as I could. By the time I had finished my meal, I became more cool, and thought that perhaps it was not best to fight with my neighbor about hens, and thereby make him my bitter, lasting enemy. I concluded to try another way, being sure that it would be better.

"After dinner I went over to my neighbor's. He was in his garden. I went out, and found him in pursuit of one of my hens with a club, trying to kill it. I accosted him. He turned upon me, his face inflamed with wrath, and broke out in a great fury—

"'You have abused me. I will kill all your hens, if I can get at them. I never was so abused. My garden is ruined.'

"'I am very sorry for it,' said I. 'I did not wish to injure you, and I now see that I have made a great mistake in letting out my hens. I ask your forgiveness, and am willing to pay you six times the damage.'

"The man seemed confounded. He did not know what to make of it. He looked up at the sky—then down at the earth—then at his neighbor—then at his club—and then at the poor hen he had been pursuing, and said nothing.

"'Tell me now,' said I, 'what is the damage, and I will pay you six-fold; and my hens shall trouble you no more. I will leave it entirely with you to say what I shall do. I cannot afford to lose the love and good will of my neighbors, and quarrel with them, for hens, or anything else.'

"'I am a great fool,' said the neighbor. 'The damage is not worth talking about; and I have more need to compensate you than you me, and to ask your forgiveness than you mine.'"

A HAPPY FAMILY.

Among the novel sights which throng the city of London, for the cheap entertainment of the children, nothing that I have seen has made a more pleasant impression on my mind than this family circle of different animals and birds, whose deportment is truly an admirable illustration of the reign of peace. The proprietor of this novel menagerie calls it very appropriately "The Happy Family." A cage would be too harsh a name for their place of residence, which is almost simple enough to be of their own construction. It is rather a large, square hen coop on a low hand-cart, which the man draws about from one street to another, and gets a few pennies a day from those who stop to look at the domestic felicity of his happy family circle. Perhaps the first thing that strikes the eye is a large cat "washing her face," with a dozen large rats nestling under her like kittens, while others are clambering up her back and playing with her whiskers. In another corner of the room a dove and hawk are "billing and cooing" on the head of a dog, which is resting across the neck of a rabbit. The floor is covered with the oddest social circles imaginable. Here weazels and guinea pigs and little peeping, funny chickens are putting their noses together caressingly. The slats above are covered with birds whose natural antipathies have been subdued into mutual affection by the law of kindness. Here for instance, was a grave old owl sitting bolt upright and meditating in the sun, with a twittering, keen-sighted sparrow perched between his cat-ears and trying to open the eyes of the old sage with its sharp bill. I never pass this establishment without stopping to look at the scene it presents. Its teachings are very eloquent—more so than a hundred lectures on Peace and Universal Brotherhood. I love to see the children stop to look at it, for I know they will carry away a lesson that will do them good; they will think of it on their way to school, and at home, too, I hope, when something crosses their will in the family circle or play ground. I could not but wish that this "Happy Family" might be exhibited to all the unhappy human families in the land, every morning, [Elihu Burritt.

THE UNTIDY GIRL.

The untidy girl leaves her things scattered about her room. She never has a place for any thing; or if she has, she does not keep any thing in its place. She leaves a thing where she happens to be using it. Her room, of course, is all confusion. If she wants any thing, she never knows where it is, but must hunt till she finds it; and thus much precious time is wasted. If she goes into another's room whatever article she lays her hands upon is misplaced. She never thinks of putting it where she found it, but either throws it carelessly down, or puts it in the wrong place. If she goes into the library and takes down a book, she either puts it up in a different place, and thus disarranges the shelves, or she lays it down on the shelf in front of the other books, for her father or mother to arrange; or if she puts it in the right place, it is turned the wrong end up, or the back is put inward. Her school books are torn and dirty, disfigured with pencil marks, blots of ink, grease spots, finger prints, and dog's ears; and if she borrows a book from the library, or of a friend, it is returned with some of these her marks upon it.

If she goes into the kitchen she will be sure to put the tidy housekeeper in a passion; for whatever she lays her hands upon is out of place. Nor does her own person appear to any better advantage. Her dress is adjusted in bad taste. It seems to hang out of shape. You would say her garments are flung upon her, and you feel an involuntary anxiety lest they should fall off. You do not perceive precisely what is the matter, but there is an evident want of neatness and taste. Her hair wears the same air of negligence, her face often discovers the lack of soap, and her finger nails and her teeth want attention.

These are only a few of the effects of untidy habits. The habit once formed, will run through every thing. And the untidy girl will make an untidy woman; the untidy woman will make an untidy house; and an untidy house will spoil a good husband. A man of taste can not enjoy himself where every thing is out of order; and he will seek that pleasure abroad which he finds not at home. [A Gift for my Daughter.

THE PROMPT GIRL.

The prompt girl rises with the lark in the morning when the gray dawn steals in at her window, she springs from her bed, and in a few minutes she is dressed, and prepared to make her appearance in the family to assist her mother, if necessary; or if not needed there, to go to her devotions and her study. She has done, perhaps in fifteen or twenty minutes, what the dilatory girl would be an hour and a half doing, and done it equally as well. She is always in time. Her promptness enables her to be punctual. She never keeps the table waiting for her, and never comes after blessing. She is never late at prayers; never late at school; and never late at church. And yet she is never in a hurry. She redeems so much time by her promptness, that she has as much as she needs, to do every thing well and in time. She saves all the time that the dilatory girl spends in sauntering, in considering what to do next, in reading frivolous matters out of the proper time for reading, and gazing idly at vacancy.

This good habit, our readers will perceive, must be of great advantage to the one who possesses it, as long as she lives. It is, however, within the reach of all. Only carry out the idea we have given of promptness one day, and then repeat it every day, and in a little time the habit is astablished.

EXHAUSTION OF TALK.

How long the lamp of conversation holds out to burn, between two persons only, is curiously set down in the following passage from Count Gonfallonier's account of his imprisonment;

"I am an old man now; yet by fifteen years my soul is younger than my body! Fifteen years I existed, for I did not live—it was not life—in the self-same dungeon, ten feet square! During six years I had a companion; during nine I was alone! I never could rightly distinguish the face of him who shared my captivity in the eternal twilight of our cell. The first year we talked incessantly together! we related our past lives, our joys forever gone, over and over again. The next year we communicated to each other our thoughts and ideas on all subjects. The third year, we had no ideas to communicate; we were beginning to lose the power of reflection. The fourth, at the interval of a month or so, we would open our lips to ask each other if it were indeed possible that the world went on as gay and bustling as when we formed a portion of mankind. The fifth we were silent. The sixth, he was taken away, I never knew where, to execution or liberty; but I was glad when he was gone; even solitude was better than the dim vision of that pale face. After that I was alone, only one event broke in upon nine years' vacancy. One day, it must have been a year or two after my companion left me, the dungeon door was opened, and a voice—whence proceeding I knew not—uttered these words: 'By orders of his imperial majesty, I intimate to you that your wife died a year ago.' Then the door was shut, and I heard no more; they had but flung this great agony upon me and left me alone with it again."

Forgetfulness.—"Henry, did you bring that book down?"

"No, sir, I forgot it."

"Forgot it! This is the third time. You are indeed a heedless boy, and if I had time I would preach you a homily on forgetfulness. When a person begins to forget, there's no knowing where he will end. Why, you need not forget—and there's a better way to remember than to tie a string around your finger, or put a piece of paper in your hat. Place it upon your mind, my boy, and there's no danger. Do you ever forget to eat? Never! When you are promised an excursion of pleasure, do you ever forget it? Never! You engrave it on your mind. So it should be with everything you wish to recall. Be determined to do what you are told, and you will never come to me with the excuse, 'I forgot it.' I dislike those words. Remember, my boy, what I tell you, and be not heedless in future."

INDIVIDUAL ECCENTRICITIES.

It is related of Swift, that he was a rigid disciplinarian as well as an effectual tantalizer. A specimen of both these attributes of character is presented to the mind in a familiar anecdote. There was one annoyance which affected him sensibly—the leaving open of doors. He always insisted upon their being shut on entering and leaving a room where he was, though the visitant should intend to remain only through the rapidly passing interval of one second. One day, a favorite maid servant of Swift's asked permission to go to a sister's wedding, about ten miles from Dublin. Her master not only consented, but said he would lend her one of his own horses, with a servant to ride before her, and gave directions accordingly. The maid, in her joy for this favor, forgot to shut the door when she left the room. In about a quarter of an hour after she was gone, the dean ordered a servant to saddle another horse and make all speed he could to overtake them, and oblige them to return back immediately. They had not got more than half way, when he came up to them, and told them the dean's positive commands; with which, however reluctantly, the poor girl was obliged to comply. She came into his presence with the most mortified countenance, and begged to know his honor's commands. "Only to shut the door after you," was the reply.

This reminds us of an anecdote of that well-known wit, but very eccentric character, the Rev. Dr. Byles, who, during the Revolutionary struggle, being dismissed from his church, and having no income from his estate, was obliged to contend with the ills of poverty. His amiable daughters, whom some of our readers will remember as the Misses Mary and Catharine Byles, (long residents in a dilapidated house in Common street,) supported their father by their needle, and in the cold season were in the habit of retiring to bed at an early hour, to save fuel, first seeing that their venerable parent was made comfortable for the night. He slept in an apartment under that of his daughters, and, when they were seated in bed, with a small cricket before them to hold the light, in order to finish the job of needlework upon which the bread of the ensuing day depended, they would often be roused from this snug position by a loud knocking against the wall of their father's room. Dutifully minding the knocking, one of them would repair to his apartment to inquire what was wanted, when the answer from the tantalizing sire would be, "Nothing, my daughter; I merely wanted to ask whether you were comfortable!"

The doctor, also, when his daughters were attired for a party, had drawn on their delicate gloves, and looked in upon him to bid adieu for the evening, would not unfrequently desire them to go into the cellar and bring up an armful of wood for his study, purposely waiting for a malapropos time to try their patience.

STACKING HAY.

Hay in England is scarcely ever put in barns. It keeps well in stacks, made up as they are in the neatest manner, and carefully thatched with straw. Nothing can be more beautiful and workmanlike than the manner in which they are made up; and for hay, the long stacks are decidedly preferable to those of a round form, as it is cut down for use, in such case, to more advantage. The formation of a stack, which is often done by women, is a work of much skill, which is the fruit only of practise; the thatching of a stack in the best manner, requires both art and experience, and there are men who make it a profession. When well executed, the hay is for years impervious to wet. During the formation of the stack, which, when intended to be large, must sometimes wait for several days the progress of hay making, the most careful farmers have a large tarpaulin or canvas covering to suspend upon poles over the stack, in order to protect it from rain. I refer to these minute circumstances, to illustrate the extreme carefulness with which many of the operations of husbandry are here conducted. When the hay is to be used, a whole stack is never removed to the stables at once, but is carefully cut down as a loaf of bread might be cut, and always done up and bound in trusses, intended to be of fifty-six pounds each, and in that way carried to be distributed to the animals. This requires some extra labor; but the farmers find their account in it.

Twenty-Eight Miles of Pores.—Douglas Jerrold considers no education complete without a certain acquaintance with medical science. All, no doubt, know that the skin is the perspiratory organ, but few probably are aware of the magnitude of the part, which, in virtue of its function, it performs in the animal economy. With reference, therefore, to this point, he cites the following statement of Surgeon Wilson, F. R. S., the celebrated English anatomist;

"To obtain an estimate of the length of tube of the perspiratory system of the whole surface of the body, I think that 2,800 might be taken as a fair average of the number of pores in the square inch, and 700, consequently, of the number of inches in length. Now, the number of square inches of surface in a man of ordinary height and bulk is 2,500; the number of pores, therefore, 7,000,000, and the number of inches of perspiratory tube 1,750,000, that is, 145,833 feet, or 48,600 yards, or nearly twenty-eight miles."

Acquire Information.—The amount of valuable information, on all kinds of subjects, with which many individuals have in their power to store their minds, and which by incidental circumstances may be brought to bear on some useful object, merely by attending to things apparently trifling—by considering no source of information too low, provided it be an honorable one—is altogether astonishing. The time that some people are consuming in indolence, or with a total disregard to the minutiæ of general occupation, others who are aware of the value of knowledge, are assiduously picking it up wherever it may be found, and carefully applying it wherever it is useful. By this means a man becomes impregnable on all points; he is able to say something on all subjects; he obtains the reputation of a man of intelligence, which leads him to offices of distinction and respectability in the community.

There is this difference between happiness and wisdom—he that thinks himself the happiest man is really so; but he that thinks himself the wisest is generally the greatest fool.

VARIETY.

Over the pulpit, in the chapel at West Point, as some of our readers may perhaps have remarked, stands a fine allegorical picture from the true-to-life pencil of Weir. A part of it represents Peace, as a female figure, holding an olive-branch in her hand. During the performance of divine service, one or two Sundays ago, a small bird flew into the church, and made several attempts to alight on the branch! A better criticism upon the fidelity of the artist's representation of air and foliage could scarce be imagined. The same compliment, was paid by a bird to Apelles, some three thousand years ago.

A writer in the Georgia Farmer gives directions for making a cheap barometer, to aid in fortelling the weather. He takes a stick three long, and attaches to the butt end a phial, full of air, of course, and corked tight. The stick is then suspended in a horizontal position on a thread tied near its centre. When the storm is coming on, the air outside is lighter than that within the phial; of course the phial sinks, and indicates a change in the atmosphere. Such a barometer may be made in ten minutes, and some of our philosophic farmers will incline to have barometers of their own manufacture.

The following is the receipt for making the famous Blackberry Syrup. No family should be without it; all who try it will find it a sovereign remedy for the bowel complaint:—"To two quarts of blackberry juice, add half an ounce each of powdered nutmeg, cinnamon and allspice, and a quarter of an ounce of powdered cloves. Boil these together to get the strength of the spices, and to preserve the berry juice. While hot add a pint of fourth proof pure French Brandy, and sweeten with loaf sugar. Give a child two teaspoonsful three times a day, and if the disorder is not checked, add to the quantity.

A young Irish servant girl, coming from Albany recently in one of the night steamers, had the bad luck to lose the "recommend" which had been given her on leaving her last place. She brought, however, the accompanying rather dubious "ticket" which she presented to a neighbor of ours:—"This is to say, that Kathleen O'Hazen had a good character when she left Albany, but she lost it on board the steamboat coming down from Albany. Tim Murphy, Cherry street."

Soon after Doctor Johnson issued his celebrated "Rasselas," a literary society of ladies appointed some of their members to wait on him and express their approbation of his work. They accordingly waited on him, and one of their number addressed him in a long speech, of fulsome praise. He calmly sat waiting the conclusion of the speech, and then turning his face to the committee, expressed his acknowledgment by saying—"Fiddle-de-dee, my dears!"

A young minister dining at the house of a gentleman who had recently paid a visit to the metropolis, expressed his sorrow that his host should have heard him preach after having heard so many great guns in London. This reply was very promptly made: "It is," said he, "sometimes a relief to hear a pop-gun after so many great guns." The angler for compliment was silent.

Printing is now in great honor among the Turks. There is in Constantinople an imperial establishment containing a large number of printers. Presses are found also in all the principal towns of the empire. In a few years, according to present appearances, Turkey will have, comparatively, more newspapers and periodicals than Russia, Spain, or Portugal.

When Mr. Wilberforce was a candidate for Hull, his sister, an amiable and witty young lady, offered the compliment of a new gown to the wives of the freemen who voted for her brother; on which she was saluted with the cry of "Miss Wilberforce forever," when she pleasantly observed, "I thank you, gentlemen, but I cannot agree with you, for really I do not wish to be Miss Wilberforce FOREVER!"

Geo. W. Fulton, of Baltimore, has invented and taken out a patent for a steamboat of a novel construction, intended principally as a war ship. It is upon the plan proposed by Rumsey, viz: by means of the reaction of water drawn in at the bow and expelled at the stern. It is made so that water can be taken in either fore or aft.

The number of letters that pass through the post office, annually, for London and its environs alone, is 75,000,000. They average four inches in length, and three inches wide. If this immense number of letters were laid in a horizontal position, lengthways, they would reach to the extent of 4,734 miles.

Franklin was an observing and sensible man, and his conclusion seldom incorrect. He said, 'A Bible and a newspaper in every house; a good school in every district—all studied and appreciated as they merit—are the principal support of virtue, morality and civil liberty.'

Grey hair is now all the rage in Paris. Probably some antiquated spinster among the nobility had become too lazy to attend to the adjustment of her wig, and so set the fashion by returning at once to natnre.

By foreign papers we learn that a Mr. Staple of St. Enoder's parish, England, has invented a new thrashing machine, which can thrash and make perfectly clean 1,200 bundles of wheat in an hour, or about 2,000 bushels per day, with two horses going at a very moderate pace.

A blind man, led by a dog, while wandering in the streets of Paris, had his dog seized by some one passing. Instantly opening his eyes, he gave chase and overtaking the thief, cudgeled him severely, after which, he closed his eyes and fell to begging again.

The English Mint has 8 presses, which strike 60 blows per minute and produce 3,900 coins per hour. Good steel dies supply 300,000 or 400,000 impressions. The mint was established in the 13th year of the reign of Edward II.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First commencing Wednesday,	Aug. 25,	and ending	Dec. 1
Second " "	Dec. 15,	"	March 22
Third " "	April 5,	"	July 12

Tuition, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
Extras—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold th reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant andeconomical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; a number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

☞ The following article appeared in a recent number of the Christian Chronicle, and we publish it for the purpose of giving our readers the benefit of all the light which can be shed upon this increasingly important subject. Whether the editor of the Chronicle will show a similar disposition toward his readers, by copying the articles we are publishing in relation to the "Sabbath Discussion," remains to be seen. We did not doubt, several weeks ago, that he would do so, particularly as he had expressed not a little anxiety to see our review of the discussion. Nor dare we even now allow ourselves to question that he will give his readers both sides. If he does, he will honor his station by doing justice to all. If he does not, he will disappoint the reasonable expectations of many of his readers. In the latter case, we shall have a few words to say upon the subject, and may accompany them with pretty liberal extracts from the Chronicle, to show how much easier it is to preach than to practice. SABBATH DISCUSSION.

Mr. Editor :—When I consented to reply to your respected correspondent, "Indagator," on the Sabbath question, I did it reluctantly. Pressed by other engagements and cares, I was unable to enter into points; and likely failed to satisfy, in many things, the minds of your readers. But my views were clear and settled—my convictions firm; and I supposed myself able te express them intelligibly. In this, it seems, I judged incorrectly. You inform your readers that "'E. W. D.' regards the fourth cammandment as binding Christians to the observance of a seventh day." You certainly never read my articles. Such language, I never penned. I discard the idea altogether. The day that follows the sixth is the seventh. The expression a seventh day, in this connection, conveys no intelligible idea. When time is divided into portions of seven days each, there can be but one seventh day in each portion. The proper, and only intelligible designation for it, is the seventh day; whether you call it Wednesday, or Saturday, or Sunday. God has appointed the seventh day, in distinction from the sixth, or eighth; not Saturday, in opposition to Sunday. I oppose the appointment of God to the tradition of men. Some of your correspondents have gone into learned discussions concerning Hebrew particles, to show that Moses meant a particular day—the seventh day. The labor was quite useless. I admit it all. "Six days shalt thou labor"—"and the seventh"—the day that follows—"is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." After all your correspondents have said, I am compelled to think that they have not studied, with due care, the terms and provisions of the sabbatic law. Their interpretation makes the observance of the law, under some circumstances, an impossibility. I wish some one of your correspondents would explain how Saturday comes to be exclusively the seventh day.

Again, your statement, Mr. Editor, contains another error. I do not rest the sabbatic institution solely on the fourth commandment. This your language evidently implies. I rested it partially on a moral basis—its essential utility. This was a principal point in the discussion. "Indagator" denied; I affirmed. This he has, in his last communication, fully conceded, and woven out of it a sort of apology for the observance of a day of worship.

Your correspondents, again, have affirmed the sabbatic institution to be exclusively a civil provision intended for the Jews. I affirmed, in opposition to this, that it existed before the Jew, and was made for man. It was designed, in part, certainly, to be commemorative of the rest of God. "In six days God made the world; and rested on the seventh day; wherefore, the Lord blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it." Before any specific law was given to the Jew on the subject, he, in common with the rest of mankind, was required to keep the seventh day. Has this nothing to do in determining the nature of the institution? When the institution is enforced specifically on the Jews, the ground of it is expressly referred to. How, in view of all this, it can be called a purely civil institution of the Jews, I am unable to see. The Jews had their peculiar Sabbaths. Your correspondents confound "the Sabbath of the Lord our God" with these. Their opinions are supported by quotations from commentators. Something different is needed. I dissent, for reasons already named. Their logic is lame. I deny that those passages cited by them from the New Testament are in point. The word day, and even Sabbath days, has no necessary reference to "The Sabbath of the Lord our God." The Sabbath was made for man. Its mellow light shone on his fair Eden home; and remains to cheer him in his wanderings—an emblem of peace on earth; of rest in heaven. The law of Moses enjoins the observance of the Sabbath on the Jews, for two obvious reasons: 1. Because they were men. The Sabbath was made for man. The same reason that determined the institution originally, is assigned as the ground of this particular enactment. 2. It was committed to the Jews, as a part of the "Oracles of God"—to be preserved for man.

Again, finding this old ordinance in the moral code of Moses; and being itself moral, as much so as any other law in the code, so far as I can discover—my convictions of its permanency are confirmed. The awful and peculiar manner in which that law was given, and the position assigned it—although these things make no impression on the minds of your correspondents—have weight, I confess, with me. I believe God does not act without a reason. This code, so sanctioned and distinguished, is referred to repeatedly by Christ and his Apostles, as permanently and universally binding. It is adopted, as a whole, in both its tables. Nay, more; the Apostles and early Christians, according to "Indagator's" own clear showing, retained the institution; and gave to it all the weight of their example. They modify, as they might do, but do not change. Even "Indagator" himself asserts the necessity of a weekly season of something very like the sabbatic institution. A weekly season of worship is the seventh-day season of worship. How all this accords with the oft repeated affirmation that the Sabbath was purely a civil arrangement pertaining to the Jewish nation, I shall not explain. These, Mr. Editor, are, in brief, the grounds on which I rest the permanency of "the seventh-day Sabbath of the Lord our God." I have no idea that you intended to represent my views unfairly; but I could not allow your statement to pass uncorrected. I regard the day to be observed both by Jews and Christians, to be the seventh day—definite and fixed.

In regard to the last communication of "Indagator," you will allow me to submit a few remarks. I cannot sympathize with your apparent complacency in the views therein presented. I object on the following grounds:

1. They are destructive of a properly sanctioned day of worship. The old sabbatic institution is abolished. There is no subsequent enactment on the subject. Where is your divinely authenticated day of worship? "Where there is no law, there is no transgression." Apostolic example, even conceding its existence, is not law. It can have force only as a sanction of something previously existing. If the Sabbath is abolished, it exists no more; and there is no day of worship. God has commanded none. All time, says "Indagator," is alike holy. Now time can be holy only in a legal or ceremonial sense—as set apart for some sacred purpose. If all time is alike holy, then we have no special day of worship. Where, Mr. Editor, your zealous apology notwithstanding, is your divinely sanctioned day of worship? For ought appears in the opinion and reasoning of "Indagator," we may observe the sixth or the tenth; or a portion of the seventh day, as, in our judgment, the purposes of devotion may require. There is no law, above that of mere convenience, or human discretion.

2. I object to the theory of "Indagator," because it is entirely hypothetical. The first link in this chain of reasoning, "seems to him highly probable." To others, it might seem as highly improbable. It all depends on the theory you adopt. Of the second, he has "little doubt." I have very much doubt of it. It will be apparent to any one, who will attentively consider the subject, that the entire fabric is manufactured out of opinions and conjectures. These may be true; but to build a Christian institution upon such a foundation, is obviously absurd. If "Indagator's" theory is true, we have no divinely authenticated day of worship. It may be well to have a stated season of worship, regularly occurring. This is a different thing. Could the neglect of a mere conventional rule, be a matter of discipline?

In my opinion, God set apart, in the beginning, by an exercise of his own high authority, the seventh day, for the sacred purposes of rest and worship. This law, enforced, by express precept on the Jews, God's only nominal people, is sanctioned by Apostolic example. Here is law recognized; not theory, built on doubtful conjectures. Permit me to say here, that it is highly problematical, upon the supposition that the old institution is abolished, whether the Apostles ever kept the first day of the week, as it is called, as a day of worship. It is no where so stated. It is no where necessarily so implied. The Bible and the writings of early Christians are alike, and wholly silent on the subject. So unsubstantial are the materials out of which the theory of a day of worship is wrought by your esteemed correspondents. They must review their opinions.

3.—"Indagator" substitutes for the ancient Sabbath, a day of worship. I solemnly ask, Is there any such thing as a day of worship, named once in the New Testament? The Sabbath is often mentioned. Worship is instanced. A day of worship, unless it be in continuance of an already existing institution, is the merest fiction imaginable. Where do we find, in the New Testament, any thing about "a day of fraternal communion with the Saints." That primitive Christians had seventh-day seasons of worship and communion is a fact, distinctly marked; if this is in continuation of the seventh-day Sabbath, the inference is legitimate that they observed the day. This was the law. Upon the supposition that the Sabbath is abolished, the inference is not legitimate. We have no warrant for a day of worship, unless it was fixed upon before Christ came. I confess, I like the word Sabbath; because I like the thing it represents—the calm quiet of the soul, communing with its Maker. A primary, elemental idea, entering into my Sabbath, is abstinence from secular employment. "Indagator," with true paternal partiality, thinks his theory, if adopted, capable of working miracles of good to Zion and the world. Truth, I know, possesses magical power. Germany, however, does practice it now—and the English hierarchy did, in the days of Laud. It has had, then, something like a trial. Its wonders are not recorded. I have no little dread of them. In no other country, has the sanctity of the Sabbath been so guarded as in our own; and in no other country has Christianity appeared so well, or done so much.

I have been longer, Mr. Editor, in my communication, than I intended. Pardon my freedom. With respect and affection to yourself and correspondents, I am, E. W. D.

THE SABBATH.

God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it. On that day he rested; the heavens and the earth, and all therein having been finished. He thus appointed the Sabbath for man to keep to his Maker's glory and honor,—a day which reminds us that we are God's creatures, dependent upon him for life, health and support; which admonishes us that we are not our own, but belong to another; which warns us of our duty to our heavenly Father, and is an emblem of the eternal Sabbath in Heaven; a period when God draws near in an especial manner to us, his sinful and faithless children; when he delights to pour down by his Spirit the rich blessings of wisdom, love, peace and joy on the hearts of all who meet to worship him in truth and sincerity; when God, in answer to the Christian's prayer, converts, by the power of his Holy Spirit, through the instrumentality of his Holy Word, the souls of sinful and ungrateful men. It is a time when the intercourse of our minds with our Saviour is unreserved; when our prayers should be most fervent, and our thoughts most upon God. This day, that God has sanctified, is not for man to pollute. The day for prayer, and meditation on our Father's mercy, and intercourse with him, the day to learn his holy will, was not granted nor appointed for us to pass in the pleasures of worldly amusements—was not given to man to spend in visiting his neighbor, the cultivation of his farm, or the selling of his merchandise. This day, which God hath blessed, man shall venerate. He who remembers not to keep the Sabbath day holy can never possess the favor nor enjoy the blessing of God; for he hath declared, I will love them who love me, and cherish them who reverence and obey my commandments.

PRESENCE OF GOD.

FROM THE GERMAN.

God near me!—and near me ever!
On the land and on the sea;
Thus the Word that erreth never,
Thus my life assureth me;
Ask ye, therefore, "Who is nigh thee?"
God is present—God is by me!

Death's dark valley, depths of ocean,
Prison walls, hide not from God;
He observes my every motion,
While at home and while abroad:
Let me sit, recline or stand,
Everywhere is God at hand.

God for me!—my consolation,
All my soul's desire is God;
Faint I'll not in tribulation,
Under crosses and the rod;
Ask ye, "What consoleth thee?"
Listen—God upholdeth me. [N. E. Puritan.

OUR JOHN JOHNSON;

OR, THE MAN WITH EXTENSIVE CONNECTIONS.

We are not, dear reader, about to inflict upon you a long biography of the distinguished personage whose name is so conspicuously paraded at the head of this article; for, to own the truth, our personal acquaintance with the individual has been next to nothing. Indeed, we are not quite sure that we have his name right, as it stands recorded in the old family Bible; for a sense of duty to all the world constrains us to confess, that we quote from recollection—not having seen, for several years, the family record of the very reputable generations of the Johnsons. The name itself signifies, as any body may know, that the hero of our story was neither more nor less than John's son.

When we first heard of him, John Johnson lived in Charleston, S. C., and was a member of an orthodox church, in good standing. Suffering his own garden to be overrun with weeds, he spent much time in weeding the gardens of his brethren. He was so pure and godly (in his own estimation) that all others were, in his sight, amazingly deficient as regarded all essential qualities and qualifications for the kingdom of God. But his chief business was, to keep his minister in the straight and narrow path of duty. By virtue of his admirable skill in fault-finding, he could detect in an instant, defects in a sermon, or a prayer, which other people had not the wit nor the wisdom to discover. As he was always in the right, and his brethren always in the wrong, he was always, from moral necessity, opposed to whatever the majority were in favor of; and as he was of course always in the minority, because "broad is the road that leads to death, and thousands walk together there; while wisdom shows a narrow path with here and there a traveler"—he was compelled to resort to intrigue, and mischief-making, in order to carry his point, and secure his end. This kept the church to which he belonged in a continual turmoil, and rendered the life of his poor minister a life of continued anxiety and wretchedness. The Rev. Mr. Psalter, for such we must call him, worn out with the labors and trials, and tormented by the vexatious intrusions and importunities of brother John Johnson, asked and obtained leave of absence for a few months, for the purpose of taking a long breath; being determined to obtain a situation, if possible, where he could enjoy exemption from the evil which had well nigh worn out his patience, and rendered life a burthen. Keeping his determination to himself, not daring to tell his wife and children of it, lest John Johnson should get hold of it and prevent his going, he started on his journey, and arrived safe and sound in the good city of Philadelphia. Intent upon the object he had in view, he lost no time in calling upon a ministering brother, to whom he related his troubles. What was his surprise to learn that the good brother to whom he had gone for sympathy, was in a like predicament: "Alas," he exclaimed, "you have come to the wrong place for relief; for in my society I have a man, one of the most officious communicants, who exactly answers to the description of your Mr. John Johnson, and he keeps the church in such an uproar all the while, that I have been praying for a call." Losing no time by delay, Mr. Psalter took passage for New York, and made the acquaintance of several of the brethren there. Great was his grief on finding that each one had a John Johnson in his parish. He went to Boston, and diligently inquired into the state of things there, thinking that in the metropolis of New England he would find at least one religious society that had no John Johnson in it. In this he was disappointed; and making all convenient haste, he went to Salem, hoping that the race of the Johnsons had been exterminated when the Puritans drove off the Baptists and Quakers, and hung the witches. Calling on the venerable Dr. Worcester, then alive, and preaching there Mr. Psalter told his pitiful story, and repeated his earnest inquiry for a religious society without a John Johnson in it. "Go back," said the Doctor, "and make the best you can of the evils of your condition; for, in all my long experience, I have never known a parish without one of the Johnson family in it!" [Western Evangelist.

EGYPT.

One impression has taken me by surprise. I used to wonder, and always did till now, at the stupidity of the Israelites which so angered their leader—their pining after Egypt, after finding it impossible to live there. It was inconceivable how they could long to go back to a place of such cruel oppression, for the sake of any thing it could give. I now wonder no longer, having seen and felt the Desert, and knowing the charms of the valley of the Nile. One evening lately, just at sunset, the scene struck upon my heart, oppressing it with the sense of beauty. A village was beside an extensive grove of palms, which sprang from out of the thickest and richest clover to the height of eighty feet. Their tops waved gently in the soft breeze which ruffled the surface of a blue pond lying among grassy shores. There were golden lights and sharp shadows among the banks where a stream had lately made its way. The yellow sand-hills of the Desert just showed themselves between the stems of the more scattered palms. Within view were some carefully-tilled fields, with strong wheat, lupins, and purple bean blossoms; and some melon and cucumber patches were not far off. Cattle were tethered near the houses; and on a bank near sat an old woman and a boy and a girl, basking in the last rays of the sun, with evident enjoyment, though the magical coloring given by an Egyptian atmosphere could not be so striking as to English eyes. But what must it have been in the memory of the Israelites, wandering in the Desert where there is no color except at sunrise and sunset, but only glare—parched rocks and choking dust or sand? I will not attempt now, for no one has ever succeeded in such an attempt, to convey any impression of the appalling dreariness of the depths of the Desert. I can only say that when it rose up before me in contrast with that nook of a valley at sunset, I at last understood the surrender of heart and reason on the part of the Israelites; and could sympathize in their forgetfulness of their past woes—in their pining for verdure and streams, for shade and good food, and for a perpetual sight of the adored river, instead of the hateful sands which hemmed them in whichever way they turned. [Miss Martineau.

FAMILY WORSHIP.

A pious tradesman, conversing with a minister on family worship, related the following instructive circumstances:—

When I began business for myself, I was determined, through grace, to be particularly conscientious with respect to family prayer. Accordingly I persevered for many years in the delightful practice of domestic worship. Morning and evening every individual of my family was present; nor would I allow my apprentices to be absent on any account. In a few years the advantages of these engagements manifestly appeared; the blessings of the upper and nether springs followed me; health and happiness attended my family, and prosperity my business. At length such was the rapid increase of my trade and the importance of devoting every possible moment to my customers, that I began to think whether family prayer did not occupy too much of our time in the morning. Pious scruples arose respecting my intentions of relinquishing this part of my duty; but at length worldly interests prevailed so far as to excuse the attendance of my apprentices, and not long after it was deemed advisable, for the more eager prosecution of business, to make the prayer with my wife, when we arose in the morning, suffice for the day.

Notwithstanding the repeated checks of conscience that followed this base omission, the calls of a flourishing concern and the prospects of an increasing family appeared so imperious and commanding that I found an easy excuse for this fatal evil, especially as I did not omit prayer altogether. My conscience was now almost seared with a hot iron, when it pleased the Lord to awaken me by a singular providence.

One day I received a letter from a young man who had formerly been my apprentice, previous to my omitting family prayer. Not doubting but I continued domestic worship, his letter was chiefly on this subject; it was couched in the most affectionate and respectful terms; but judge of my surprise and confusion when I read these words, "O, my dear master, never, never shall I be able sufficiently to thank you for the precious privilege with which you indulged me in your family devotions! O, sir, eternity will be too short to praise my God for what I learned there. It was there I first beheld my lost and wretched state as a sinner; it was there that I first knew the way of salvation; and there that I first experienced the preciousness of 'Christ in me, the hope of glory.' O, sir, permit me to say, never, never neglect those precious engagements; you have yet a family and more apprentices; may your house be the birth-place of their souls!" I could read no farther; every line flashed condemnation in my face. I trembled, I shuddered, I was alarmed, lest the blood of my children and apprentices should be demanded at my soul-murdering hands.

Filled with confusion and bathed in tears, I fled for refuge in secret. I spread the letter before God. I agonized, and—but you can better conceive than I can describe my feelings; suffice it to say, that light broke in upon my disconsolate soul, and a sense of blood-bought pardon was obtained. I immediately flew to my family, presented them before the Lord, and from that day to the present, I have performed this duty, and am determined, through grace, that whenever my business becomes so large as to interrupt family prayer, I will give up the superfluous part of my business and retain my devotion; better to lose a few shillings than become the deliberate murderer of my own family, and the instrument of ruin to my own soul.

AMBITION REBUKED—AN EASTERN LEGEND.

When Alexander the Great had conquered the world, and penetrated into the remotest regions of India, he heard of Paradise, and determined to subdue that also. He was told that the river Hithebel led to it, and immediately ordered a fleet to be equipped to carry his troops thither; but previously dispatched a few vessels to procure information.

When they had reached the garden of Paradise, his people found the gate shut, and before it an aged keeper of singular appearance, and with an extraordinary beard, whom they commanded to open the gate instantly for their master, as he was not far behind them.

The hoary keeper smiled, and said he durst not admit him unless he could find means to weigh down a feather, which he herewith sent, when placed in the balance.

The messenger was astonished, for he could not conceive how a small feather—since it was only a light and downy feather—could have weight, and concluded that the old man was jeering him. He nevertheless went and delivered the message.

Alexander directed a balance to be brought, it soon appeared that all the wood and stone, and silver and gold that could be laid in the scale, was not sufficient to counterpoise this little feather, which made every thing that was brought fly quickly up, as though the greatest weight had been put down.

Alexander, astonished at this magical effect, sent once more to inquire what was the meaning of it. The man gravely answered that the feather signified Alexander's cupidity and ambition, which were light as down, and yet so heavy that nothing could counterbalance them; but he would tell him how the feather might be outweighed.

"Let," said he, "a handful of earth be laid upon it, and it will at once lose its extraordinary power." Alexander perceived the meaning and was deeply dejected. Soon afterwards he died in Babylon, without having seen Paradise.

THE FLOWERS AND THE COFFIN.

Last week I was at a funeral. Two rooms were filled with friends, who had come to attend the burial of a little girl. Her body lay in a coffin, on a marble table, in the middle of the parlor. Her sweet lips were closed, and her pale hands, folded over her bosom, were as cold as the marble.

By the side of the coffin was a silver cup such as children use, and in it was a bunch of fresh flowers. I dare say it was Emily's cup. Whenever her father and mother look at it, they will always think of their child who used to drink out of it.

It made me feel sorrowful to see these sweet flowers by the side of a corpse. They were beautiful, but they were sad. Emily was like these flowers. She grew up and was as promising and as lovely as they. Now she is cut down and withered.

In a few hours the flowers will be dead also. But here is the difference. The flowers will never bloom again. They are gone forever. But Emily is not gone forever. That little body will live again. Christ takes care of it in the grave. I saw it put into the deep, dark, cold vault. Christ was buried in the same way in the sepulchre. But he rose again, and that is a sign that Emily will rise again, too. As surely as Jesus rose, so surely will he raise this dear little one.

When these flowers die, all is over with them. All their gay colors, all their sweet perfumes, are lost. But all is not over with Emily. Her soul is not lost. It is with christ. It is better to be with him than to be with us. The soul shall be joined to the body at the resurrection. Then soul and body will be happy to all eternity. This is what I thought on looking at the silver cup and flowers beside the coffin. [Youth's Penny Gazette.

Beautiful Answer.—What wonderful questions children often ask, and what equally wonderful answers do they sometimes give. What can be more touching than the following anecdote which we find in the New York Organ:—

"A friend of ours, while dressing a very young child a few days ago, said—in rather an impatient tone—'You are such a lump of a child, it is impossible to make any thing fit you!' The lips of the child quivered, and looking up, it said in a deprecating tone—'God made me.' Our friend was rebuked; and the little lump was kissed a dozen times."

"God made me!" Had the wise men of the world pondered on a fitting answer to such a careless remark for a century, they could not have found a better than flowed naturally and spontaneously from the wounded heart of the child. "God made me, mother; it is not my fault that I am what you thus seem not to like—such a little lump." Blessings on thy innocent heart, sweet child—"of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Fanny Hawkes.—"Let me see," said Fanny Hawkes, talking to herself in the lane, "which of the spring flowers shall I be like? The daisy is pretty, and the daffodil is very fine; but the violet that hides itself in the hedge is the sweetest of them all; O, I will be a violet."

"And if you are a violet, and hide yourself in the hedge," cried her sister Sarah, who heard her, "then I will come and find you." As the two sisters walked home, laughing, it was quite settled that Fanny was in future to be a violet to render home pleasant, and herself agreeable to everybody.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, July 22, 1847.

THE SABBATH AMONG THE JEWS.

It is an encouraging circumstance connected with the condition of the Jews, that they are just now giving more than usual attention to the claims of the Sabbath, and the policy of strictly observing it. Several times within a year past, the "Occident and American Jewish Advocate," the only regular periodical of that people in this country, has published articles pointedly condemning all civil enactments to compel the observance of the first day of the week, and urging the Jews to be more careful and consistent in observing the Sabbath divinely commanded. In the July number of that work we find a long article upon the subject, which contains so many suggestions worthy of general application, that we feel constrained to give our readers some account of it.

The writer sets out with the position, that the sabbatic institution is of the gravest importance to the Israelite—not so much because a day of rest is necessary to his well-being, (though this is undoubtedly true,) as because the seventh day was instituted as one of the tokens of the covenant between the God of heaven and earth and his chosen people, by the observance of which they would prove their allegiance to the author of their religion. This position, so manifestly just, and withal so wholesome in its influence, seems to be strangely overlooked by the more strenuous advocates of a Sabbath among Christians, many of whom have endeavored to establish the claims of the institution more by arguments drawn from its utility, than by references to the command and authority of God. In such circumstances, it is encouraging to see the position distinctly stated by one who stands as a representative of the people with whom the Sabbath has been in a peculiar manner identified.

The notion that the sabbatic law only requires a rest-day, and may therefore be fulfilled by keeping the Sunday with their gentile neighbors, finds no favor with this writer. He contends that such an interpretation of the law, "exchanges what God has taught for what he never contemplated." The Sabbath is a weekly testimony borne to the sacredness of their faith; but how can this be accomplished by resting on a day which has in it no significance? In order that the Sabbath may be properly kept, it must be kept from a religious motive; but this cannot be done, it is contended, if any other day is substituted for the seventh. In opposition to this view, reference is sometimes made to the manner in which the Sunday is observed among Christians. But he judges, that to many Christians, this day is "anything but a period of sanctification." Excepting in "the United States and England, and their dependencies, the first day of the week is, despite its statute-hedged character, one of dissipation and simple merry-making far beyond the other days."

The effect of relaxing the rest of the Sabbath, to work in the Jew an abrogation of moral sentiment, is clearly presented. The Sabbath is spoken of as one of the institutions of the Ten Commandments, resting upon the same basis with the commands, "Thou shalt honor thy father and thy mother," and "Thou shalt not steal." In view of this, the writer very justly remarks, "Surely the two last are eternal in their nature; and we see not how a Jew, even the unbeliever, can acknowledge otherwise than an equal obligation, so far as the Decalogue is concerned, for all the duties therein enumerated."

But it is when he comes to speak of the absolute gain to a Jew, in dollars and cents, of abandoning the Sabbath, that the writer's remarks are most practical. He contends that no one ever enriched himself, either in America or elsewhere, by working on the seventh day. There is no blessing attendant upon work thus and then done; and he appeals to those who have habitually violated the Sabbath, to say if they are any richer, or at least more contented and happier, than those who have abstained from Sabbath labor, and been satisfied to exert themselves on the days and periods allowed in the law. "In former years, when no Jew transgressed the Sabbath, they were as wealthy in proportion as they now are, and this in countries where their industry was circumscribed by a multitude of restrictions." Indeed, he maintains that "truth demands of every one to acknowledge, that those who violate the Sabbath are not the most prosperous merchants and mechanics; and many who had accumulated fortunes, as they thought, and then forgot the pious course they pursued when poor, have found to their sorrow that they had sowed to the wind and reaped the storm."

Such sentiments, pointedly and frequently urged upon the Jews, cannot fail to produce good effects. Indeed, we are assured that in this country there is already apparent a growing disposition among them to conform outwardly, if in no other respect, to the requirements of the fourth commandment. Several circumstances, aside from the instruction and exhortation which has been given, have combined to bring about this result. The efforts to impose fines upon them for attending to business on Sunday, have undoubtedly made them feel to some extent the importance of consistency in keeping the Sabbath. The failure of those efforts has served to increase their self-respect, and make it easier to conform to what their consciences might prompt. In such circumstances, there seems to us reason to hope for very great improvement in respect to the manner of keeping the Sabbath among the Jews in this country. In this we rejoice; and the more so, perhaps, because some of those who bear the name of Jews have recently shown, by abandoning the Sabbath, how little they care for an institution which has always been peculiarly sacred in the estimation of real Jews.

RELIGION IN THE SOUTH.

The American Messenger for June contains an article upon this subject, which embodies much valuable information. The Southern States embrace a territory of more than 300,000 square miles, with a population of about 4,500,000. Not more than one-third of the population regularly attend public worship, when they have the opportunity, and only a few places enjoy it oftener than once in two or four weeks. There is much intelligence among the more wealthy farmers, especially in worldly matters; but among the poorer classes, who are the large majority, much ignorance prevails. But few places have Sunday Schools, for want of competent teachers; and the Sunday is desecrated to an alarming extent, even among those who profess religion. During the past year forty-five colporteurs of the American Tract Society have visited more than twenty-one thousand scattered families in the Southern States, of whom more than one-fifth were destitute of all religious books except the Bible, and about three thousand families were destitute of the Scriptures. One hundred additional colporteurs are needed at the South, and the Society is encouraged to hope that they will be adequately sustained, from the fact that one individual in a southern city has partially engaged to make a donation equal to the salary of twenty colporteurs for four years at least. The following paragraph is cheering, and deserves to be copied:—

> "It is a fact worthy of remark, that the circulation of books has been proportionably larger at the South than in any other portion of the country. The access to the population is almost unrestricted by sect, color, or locality. The inability to read is almost the only barrier among whites or blacks, and this does not preclude the communication of oral instruction. Planters often assemble their servants, and request the colporteur to address them, and supply them with books and tracts, so far as they are able to read. In two or three instances, colporteurs, on retiring from their service, have become permanent missonaries among the slaves. The supply of religious publications to the families of planters furnishes facilities, and is often the occasion of imparting instruction to the colored people through some member of the families."

Baptist Missionary Intelligence.—The "Macedonian" for July contains much information relative to the missions of the Baptist Union. Two young men of the senior theological class in Madison University have recently been appointed as missionaries; one to Assam, and the other to Nowgong—both to sail in the course of the coming autumn. The Executive Committee have felt constrained to afford some relief to the sufferers by the burning of Mr. Stevens' house, and have accordingly appropriated to Mr. Stevens $500, and a proportionate amouut to Dr. Judson, and Mr. Bullard. But the principal loss, which was manuscripts, the result of years of labor, cannot be made up. Mr. Burpe, a missionary of the Baptists of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, has entered a promising field opened to him at Mergui, leaving the Kemmees without a missionary. An "Association" has been formed among the Karens, which embraces 29 churches, with 3,240 members, and 1,427 candidates for baptism. This shows the average number of church members to be about 112, and the average number of candidates for baptism nearly fifty.

Missionary Statistics of Theological Seminaries.—A missionary association in the Aubnrn Theological Seminary has been engaged in collecting statistics relative to missionary labor performed by graduates of the Presbyterian Seminaries in this country. It seems that from 1838 to 1846, there were 1,885 graduates, of whom 97 became missionaries, being one in 19, or about five per cent. Of these 97 missionaries, 66 were from Seminaries east of the Allegany Mountains, and 31 west, showing that the west has done double what the east has. About 900,000,000 of the world's population are objects of missionary effort. Our own country numbers 20,000,000 inhabitants, and receives ninety-five one-hundredths of the ministerial labor, and ninety-nine one-hundredths of the money given to religious purposes.

The Way to do Good.—From a paragraph in the Christian Watchman, we learn that Dr. Baird stated, in a sermon, recently, that there is a Christian gentleman in Boston, a man of wealth, who is engaged in the duties of a tract distributor. He has in his district twenty Roman Catholic families. For many months he had visited them, giving them tracts and Bibles, always careful to say nothing reproachful of their religion, and to give them no tract or book which speaks in harsh or denunciatory terms of the errors of Popery. And what is the effect of truth and kindness? Already ten of these families attend the worship of God in Protestant churches.

COMMON SCHOOL CELEBRATION IN ALFRED.

In this age of improvement, we hail with peculiar pleasure every indication of advancement coming from the foundation of our social compact—the common school. Among those indications, none has been more soul-cheering than the celebration at Alfred on the fifth of July. There was no roar of cannon—no fumes of rum—to indicate a nation's shame. The sun looked brightly from the east, but not more lovely than the hundreds of smiling faces which greeted his early rising. From every direction joyous bands assembled, each designated by modest banners, bearing inscriptions indicative of their noble purpose. Each light-hearted band led by its teacher, with heart beating high with hope that all her toil might not be unavailing. The anxious parent too was there—come to witness the development of intellect, and lend the encouraging countenance to an association so full of interest. A procession was soon formed, which wound its way to the grove near the academic buildings.

After a few appropriate introductory remarks by the Town Superintendent, (Mr. J. Allen,) prayer was offered by Rev. James H. Cochran; followed by an instructive address from Dr. Hartshorn, designed to impress the injunction, "Know thyself," and setting forth in an able manner the importance of the study of Physiology in our common schools. Then came the examination of schools by their respective teachers. This indeed afforded a field full of rich flowers. From the lisping child to the youth of sixteen, each face was radiant with smiles, which shone with double luster when seconded by the approving smiles of their teachers, all indicating that love was the tie that bound their hallowed association. None seemed daunted, but all conscious of their own ability to acquit themselves honorably; and truly they did. Nothing of the dry, unmeaning, mechanical repetition of former times, characterized their recitations. Every subject was simplified and brought within the capacity of their juvenile minds. The elements of Orthography, Reading, Geography, Arithmetic, and by some schools Physiology and Grammar, seemed to be thoroughly understood. Composition and Declamation were, as they should be, well attended to. General intelligence was not wanting. A practical knowledge of the Bible had been imparted. No lover of his race could have witnessed that scene without emotions of thankfulness to God for the advantages afforded the rising generation. Here is the hope of our country—here the miniature of the future. Interesting remarks were made by Prof. Kenyon, contrasting the present quiet, happy scene, with the roaring cannon and bachanalian shout which characterized other assemblies met to commemorate our nation's birth-day. He urged with peculiar energy the importance of procuring for each school-house suitable apparatus to illustrate the various branches taught. In conclusion, Mr. Allen congratulated parents and guardians on the happiness which that day's exercise could not fail to impart; alluded to the school-children as a better national safeguard than booming cannon and floating navies, and urgently appealed to parents to second these noble efforts of teachers and scholars, by removing the embarrassments they now suffer in consequence of inconvenient, dilapidated school-rooms, and a poor supply of books. Every person must have left that crowd impressed with the importance of common schools. There was but one thing to regret. If the exercises had been enlivened by vocal music by the scholars, all would have been complete. It is hoped that this delightful exercise will form a part of the instruction imparted hereafter.

Our schools are indeed our safe-guards—but only as they are made to exert an influence which shall battle the foes of our country and our race; not with sword and spear, but with the more potent weapons of truth and righteousness. There the spirit of freedom should be inhaled, and uncompromising opposition to slavery and intemperance should be taught with the first lessons. But perhaps more than one teacher has been intimidated by the threat of excommunication, on the part of some bloated advocate of rum and servitude, who has not yet learned that the spirit of the age will soon annihilate him if he clings to his idols. If such a teacher there be, then he should know, that moral courage to meet the frowns of tyrants, is an indispensable qualification for a teacher in this age of corruption. No teacher should refuse advice, but should ever count it as a rich boon from those qualified to advise. But he should look with pity and contempt on the oft-repeated threat, that if he utters his sentiments on certain subjects, (hateful only to tyrants,) he shall have no more patronage. He is undeserving of patronage if he dares not battle openly and manfully the errors of the times, which he can do without alluding to sectarian prejudices and party distinctions. In the school-room we are to look for future Statesmen, Ministers, Lawyers, Physicians, and Teachers. How important then that they be early trained in the stern principles of truthfulness, of virtue, and morality, which alone can secure success in any profession. How important too that they should there learn the character of our republican institutions, in order that they may assume the reins of government understadingly when it shall devolve on them.

Anti-Slavery Church.—The New-School Presbyterian Church has been divided upon the subject of Slavery. Immediately after the recent annual meeting of the General Assembly, measures were taken to form a new organization, which adopted the imposing title of "The Presbyterian Church of America." As soon as the new body had taken its name, adopted the old "Confession of Faith," and "Book of Discipline," they proceeded to vote "that the following declaration of human rights be prefixed to the Form of Government of this body:"

I. God has made of one blood all nations of men; consequently, all human beings, endowed with rationality, have an equal right to freedom.

II. The holding of human beings as property, is destructive of all the ends for which man was created and endowed with rational powers, and, consequently, one of the greatest evils that can be inflicted upon human nature, highly immoral, entirely inconsistent with Christian character and profession.

III. No person, holding slaves, or advocating the rightfulness of slaveholding, can be a member of this body.

IV. That no Church, Presbytery, or Synod, tolerating slaveholders, or the advocates of slaveholding, in its communion, can be a constituent part of this body.

COLORED TRAVELERS.

One of the most wicked and disgraceful forms in which prejudice against color manifests itself at the North, is in refusing ordinary traveling accommodations to colored passengers. On board one of the magnificent steamers of Long Island Sound, a few days since, we met a colored clergyman of the Episcopal Church, who assured us that he had been indebted to the compassion of a black waiter for a miserable night's rest on a berth temporarily fitted up—the rules of the boat not allowing colored men to enjoy the privileges of the cabin. The editor of the National Watchman, a colored man, speaks of this custom in the following language:—

> "For meanness and absolute villainy, the steamboat proprietors and railroad conductors on the route from New York to Boston, via Stonington and Providence certainly stand preëminent. With the sailor, we ask, 'If the devil does not get these men, what use can there be of a devil?'
>
> "On the route, via Stonington, we last fall took passage from New York to Boston. Unable on any consideration to get passage in the cabin, we were compelled to remain on deck, and though somewhat secured from the inclemency of the weather, our situation was anything else than desirable. In company with us was a clergyman of New York city. This friend ordered supper, and accordingly, between ten and eleven o'clock at night, he was directed into the kitchen!—his supper served up on a shelf, and to this he had to stand like a horse to his fodder! On arriving at Stonington, we were shown into our appropriate places—the second class cars; and here, amid every variety of ruffianism, vulgarism, and loaferism, we sat it out till we reached the city of Providence.
>
> "Within the last week or so we took passage, via Norwich, from Boston to New York; and although we had procured a cabin ticket in Boston, when we arrived on board the steamboat, the clerk was desirous of paying us back a dollar, and compelling us to take the deck. Our talk at the office having attracted the attention of many, the man became finally so ashamed that we at last went down into the cabin, no one offering hindrance. We cherish hopes of this man. Shame is at least one step in the ladder of true reform."

VARIETY OF THE BIBLE.

When the celebrated Dr. Samuel Johnson was asked why so many literary men were infidels, his reply was, "Because they are ignorant of the Bible." If the question be asked why the lovers of general reading so often fail to acquaint themselves with the sacred volume, one reason that may be assigned, doubtless is, they are not aware of its interesting variety. This feature of the Bible is well illustrated by Mrs. Ellis, in the following eloquent extract from her recent work, entitled the "Poetry of Life."

> "With our established ideas of beauty, grace, pathos and sublimity, either concentrated in the minutest point, or extended to the widest range, we can derive from the Scriptures a fund of gratification not to be found in any other memorial of the past or present time. From the worm that grovels in the dust beneath our feet, to the track of the leviathan in the foaming deep; from the moth that corrupts the secret treasure, to the eagle that soars above his eyry in the clouds; from the wild ass in the desert to the lamb within the shepherd's fold; from the consuming locust, to the cattle upon a thousand hills; from the rose of Sharon, to the cedar of Lebanon; from the crystal stream, gushing forth out of the flinty rock, to the wide waters of the deluge; from the barren waste to the fruitful vineyard and the land flowing with milk and honey; from the lonely path of the wanderer, to the gathering of a mighty multitude; from the tear that falls in secret, to the din of battle and the shout of a triumphant host; from the solitary in the wilderness, to the satrap on the throne; from the mourner clad in sackcloth to the prince in his purple robes; from the gnawings of the worm that dieth not, to the seraphic visions of the blessed; from the still small voice, to the thunders of Omnipotence; from the depths of hell, to the regions of eternal glory; there is no degree of beauty or deformity, no tendency to good or evil, no shade of darkness or gleam of light, which does not come within the cognizance of the holy Scriptures; and there is no expression or conception of the mind that may not find a corresponding picture; no thirst for excellence that may not meet with its full supply; and no condition of humanity necessarily excluded from the unlimited scope of adoption and of sympathy, comprehended in the language and the spirit of the Bible."

Decrease of the Methodist Church.—One of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, stated in a recent address, that there had been a falling off of two thousand members in the "New York Conference" in one year; and in the "whole connexion" a falling off of fifty thousand within the same period.

Liberal Donation.—Mr. Judah Touro, of New Orleans, has presented a church to the Hebrew congregation of that city, valued at $40,000, to be fitted up at his own expense as a synagogue. Mr. Touro is rather remarkable in this line of bequest, and is not in the least exclusive. He some years since purchased a church in New Orleans, and presented the Rev. Mr. Clapp, a distinguished Unitarian clergyman, with its annual revenue, which he is to enjoy during his lifetime.

Slave Auction at the Capital.—The editor of the National Era says that at the corner of Seventh street and Pennsylvania Avenue, the great thoroughfare of Washington, is a vacant spot overlooking the principal market, in the very center of our city life, conspicuous, commanding, at which public auction is held on certain days of the week. A short time since, a slave woman, in the open day, while a throng of men and women was passing along the avenue, was put up for sale. The owner said that he had bought her as sound, had been deceived, and now would have her sold for what she would bring! The attendants on the sale were called upon to examine her. We did not see the transaction—scarcely any inducement could persuade us to witness such an exhibition. It is the first thing of the kind at that spot, of which we have been apprized since our residence here.

THE TROUBLES IN CHINA.

In our foreign news, allusion is made to the troubles in China. The following full report of the matter will be interesting to all:—

The overland Mail from India has brought the intelligence of two serious conflicts in the Chinese Seas—the one between the English and the Chinese; the other between the French squadron and the Cochin-Chinese in the Bay of Touran. Sir John Davis, governor of Hong Kong, having ineffectually endeavored to procure redress for the piratical acts of the Chinese, and for numerous insults offered to the English residents in China, and having failed in procuring the fulfillment of the treaty of Nankin, which stipulated for the admission of foreigners into the City of Canton, resolved to strike some blow which should compel the Chinese authorities to listen to reason. Accordingly, having made his arrangements, Sir John Davis, accompanied by General D'Aquilar, with about 1000 men of all arms, embarked on board the ships Vulture and Espiegle, the E. I. Co. steamer Pluto, and the Corsair, with one or two small vessels for the conveyance of artillery and troops,—the naval forces being under the command of Capt. Macdougall. Sir John entered the Bocca Tigris on the 2d of April, surprised the Anunghoy forts, as well as those on the Islands of North and South Wantong, and carried them on both sides of the river in a few minutes. The guns, amounting to 450, were spiked, and all the arms and ammunition collected instantly destroyed. The expedition reached Whampoa in the afternoon. All the troops were transferred on board such vessels as could proceed up the river. The forts at Whampoa and Wookingtap fired round-shot and grape at the division under Col. Brereton, but he avoided their effects, and being supported by the guns of the Pluto, took possession of those forts, spiked the guns, amounting to 200, and destroyed all the ammunition and magazines. The river being now cleared, the expedition advanced up to Canton, and here the strong fort called French Folly was eventually demolished like those lower down the river, and the guns spiked—making a total of 870 guns disabled since the preceding morning. These proceedings reduced Keying to reason. Keying was compelled to wait upon the Governor, who received him at the British Consulate. On the 6th, orders were issued to commence the attack on the City of Canton, but between eight and nine o'clock, it was notified that Keying had yielded to the terms of Sir John. A Government notification was immediately issued, of which the following are briefly the heads:—

"1. At the fixed period of two years from this day, the 6th of April, the City of Canton shall be opened to British subjects.

"2. Her Majesty's subjects shall be at liberty to roam for exercise or amusement in the neighboring country without molestation, returning the same day, as at Shanghai, and any person molesting them shall be severely punished.

"3. The aggressors on the two seamen in October last, and on Colonel Chesney and others at Fuhshan on the 12th March, shall be made examples of."

The populace at Canton appeared still highly exasperated against the English. The main body of the troops were removed down the river on the 8th, a company of the 18th and a few Sappers being left at Canton until the improvements are carried out, and to keep the populace in check. Great alarm prevailed in Canton at the last accounts, and the merchants were removing their property under the apprehension of violence from the Chinese.

The French missionaries in Cochin-China, having for many years past excited perpetually recurring disputes with the nation, the Government at length interfered, threw the missionaries into prison, and upon releasing them sent them to Singapore. The French ships of war La Glouire and La Victorieuse sailed into the bay of Touran to obtain redress, and laid an embargo on five corvettes. War junks were seen working into the bay, and the French ships opened their fire, which was returned by the forts, the five corvettes, and the war junks. The artillery of the natives effected little damage, but in seventy minutes, one of the corvettes was burned, and the Chinese ship blown up, two abandoned and then burnt, and the Cochin Chinese Admiral's ship taken and burnt also.

General Intelligence.

WAR NEWS.

The New Orleans Picayune of July 8, brings the latest news from the seat of war.

Gen. Scott had not then been able to leave Puebla. He was awaiting the reinforcements under Gen. Cadwalader, and Gen. Pillow, who had not then arrived.

The news from the City of Mexico is very indefinite. Gen. Scott is said to have communicated to the Government that Mr. Trist was with him, and authorized to negotiate for a peace. Santa Anna had been in vain endeavoring to procure a quorum of Congress to lay Gen. Scott's communication before it.

The censorship of the press existing in Mexico prevents knowing what measures to defend the City will be taken. Santa Anna was to leave the Capital on the 30th ult., intending to pass three days in the country for the benefit of his health. It is said that every avenue of entrance into the city is fortified; but a writer in Mexico, upon whom we very much rely, thinks the American Army will easily overcome all such obstacles—that the defense of their fortifications will only embarrass the Mexicans.

A good story is told of a party of Guerrilleros who stopped some Mexicans who were driving hogs into Puebla. They first compelled the drivers to pay the usual city tax on their swine for entering the city, and then drove the swine off in another direction.

We have the result of Com. Perry's second expedition against Tobasco. This time he was entirely successful.

TWO WEEKS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Britannia arrived at Boston since our last, bringing foreign news to Sunday, July 4.

The financial affairs of England have greatly improved.

The price of cotton has advanced 3-8d per pound.

A signal depression has taken place in the corn market since the departure of the last steamer, attributable to many causes, but more particularly to the prevalence of fine weather and the growing steadiness of the money market. Prices have become unprecedently low.

The rumors of the potato disease are exceedingly conflicting, and not reliable, and the growing crops are in a state of the utmost forwardness. The weather could scarcely be more favorable than it is.

The Bogue ports in the China seas were captured, and completely destroyed by the British land and naval forces, on the 26th of April. 876 pieces of artillery were seized and spiked in thirty-six hours.

Father Matthew has received a pension of £300 a year from the crown. Rumor states that the Pope has declined to make him Bishop of Cork. Mr. O'Connell's remains are expected to arrive at Southampton on the 17th.

Fever is dreadfully prevalent; in Liverpool it has made the most destructive havoc amongst the Catholic clergy, eight having been swept away in two months; the distemper was in every instance contracted by them while visiting the sick.

Private correspondence from Constantinople of the 17th ult., states, that unpleasant accounts had reached that capital from Kurdistan, where it was said that the Turks had lost between 3,000 and 4,000 men, in an engagement with the mountaineers. Bederkan Bey, the chief of the rebels, was said to be at Van, and that he was determiaed to defend that fortress to the last extremity.

A farmer, named Murphy, living at Carignaver, near Cork, while in conversation with his wife, leaned his arm on the muzzle of a fowling-piece, and while in this position his child touched the trigger; the gun went off and killed him on the spot.

Some sheep died the other day near Coventry, and seven lambs, which had been left without their parents, were placed under the care of a bitch which had her whelps drowned. She has adopted her new charge, and suckles and nurses them with the greatest fondness.

A working man residing in Hinck's-square, Stamford-st., Liecester, has in his possession a cat which is suckling six young wild rabbits, all of which are in a healthy state, and attended to with the greatest attention and fondness by their adopted mother.

There are now upward of two millions nine hundred thousand persons, or more than one-third of the entire population, receiving rations at the public expense, under the Temporary Relief Act, in Ireland.

The Liverpool Mercury, of July 3, gives a heart-rending account of a fatal explosion in Kirkless-Hall Colliery, on the banks of the Leeds and Liverpool canal, near Wigan, by which eight lives were lost, twelve men severely burnt, and six injured. Of the eight killed, six had been got out of the pit. Another explosion, likely to be fatal to two men, took place at the Arlay mine.

Polynesia.—The Polynesian is the Royal Gazette of His Most Sacred Majesty, King Kame-ha-me-ha III., the integrity of whose throne is guaranteed by Louis Phillippe and Queen Victoria, and whose Prime Minister, like our excellent Governor, glories in the name of John Young. The number of the 2d of January, contains the heads of the laws adopted "by the Nobles and Representatives of the Hawaian Islands, in Legislative Council assembled;" and the paper of the 9th is full of curious statistics.

The native population number 10,000, and have an inferior Court, the Judges of which are Halali and Kaaukai, Honokauper, Wadlani, and Kuhia. In 1846, they punished 126 men and 127 women for adultery, fornication, &c.; 43 men and but 3 women for theft; 12 men and only 2 women (mark that—only 2 women) for using bad language; 30 men and 8 women for working on Sunday; 4 for heathenish practices; 4 women for street walking; 6 men and no women, for drunkenness; 1 man for slander; 35 men and 3 women for gambling; and 3 wives for deserting their loving and heart-broken husbands. A list of the foreigners is given, say 600, of whom 146 are naturalized, half of these being Yankees, with all the rights of natives, and their share of offices and patronage. There are 6 schools and 5 markets in the City of Honolulu—of 1,337 houses, 875 are of grass—there are three burying-grounds, four churches, a palace, and a fort, with 63 cannon; three hospitals, as many printing offices, nine foreign commercial agents, an Odd-Fellows' lodge, and a Freemasons', a temperance society, 682 soldiers, and a foreigners' Court, of which Lorin Andrews is President. Message of the Governor of Oregon Territory.—This state paper was dated Dec. 1., and anticipates that officers from the U. S. Government would speedily take formal possession of Oregon, and extend over its people the protection they desired, and that ere long the Territory would be an additional star in the brilliant constellation of the Union. The rates of postage had been fixed too high, insomuch that they prohibited intercourse. The P. M. G. of Oregon had stopped, and Gov. Abernethy advised a reduction of rates to 5 cents a letter, and a cent per newspaper. They are a temperance community, and the Governor advises that the law expelling ardent spirits from their land may be strictly enforced, as to it their prosperity, peace, and harmony, are in a great measure to be ascribed. If ardent spirits are kept at bay, his Excellency has no doubt of the continued prosperity of Oregon.

The Governor recommends that a physician be employed to import or manufacture all the spirits required for medical purposes, and to keep a record of all he might dispose of, stating the uses it was to be put to—in short, he advises that every possible precaution may be taken to keep all ardent liquors, as a drink, out of the Territory. He also asks, very significantly, what the results might be, if ardent spirits were generally given out to the adjoining tribes of Indians.

His Excellency is of opinion that the infant settlement will rise to the position of a commercial nation, and advises the licensing of Pilots, and that laws be passed making it penal to encourage seamen to desert. He considers that a vessel lightly manned would run a great risk in working out of the harbor of Columbia River; that without proper regulations, vessels would avoid the ports of Oregon, and without trade the farmer cannot sell his produce. The Law Courts, he says, have not answered public expectations, and the jail had been burned by an incendiary. A small one, he thinks, will answer for many years, if ardent spirits can be kept out of the Territory. [N. Y. Tribune.

Connecticut Homestead Law.—The following is a copy of the Homestead Exemption Law lately enacted in Connecticut:—

Sec. 1. So much of a homestead or domicil, being the property of any one person having a family, as does not exceed in value the sum of three hundred dollars, and as will reasonably and conveniently accommodate only such person and family and such live stock as is now exempt by law, from warrant and execution, shall be, and hereby is, exempt from being taken by any warrant or execution for any debt whatever.

Sec. 2. That whatever structure, apartment, tenement, addition or repair, made from time to time in reference to said homestead or domicil, as shall only be reasonably necessary to accommodate as aforesaid (though said homestead or domicil may thereby, in some slight measure, become enhanced in value,) shall in like manner be exempt from any warrant or execution for debt: Provided, That all structures, apartments, tenements, additions or repairs not reasonably necessary for the accommodations aforesaid, may be liable to be taken and disposed of for debt, duty or tax, in the same manner as if this act had not passed: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall extend only to the exemption as aforesaid of said homestead or domicil and to such structures, apartments, tenements, additions or repairs, as are acquired or made from and after the passage of this act; and provided, also, that all existing laws exempting property from execution or warrant for debt or taxes shall not be affected by the provisions of this act.

Sec. 3. That all acts or parts of acts, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby repealed.

SUMMARY.

R. P. G. Wright died at New York on the 29th of May. The funeral took place at Schenectady, and was numerously attended by all classes of citizens. Mr. Wright was noble in his personal carriage, gentlemanly and kind in his entire deportment, though a very black man. His simple, sincere Christian character, was such as to win for him the cordial respect and confidence of the community in which he lived forty years. He came from Massachusetts to Schenectady when a young man. He has left behind him no truer friend of the best interests of his injured people. His death took place two months only after that of his son, the late lamented Theodore S. Wright of New York. They were most tenderly attached to each other in life, and were not long sundered by death!

The Cherokee Advocate, printed at Tahlequah, Cherokee Nation, on the 24th ult., contains an interesting account of the ceremonies practiced at laying the foundation stone of the Female Seminary, three days previous. Rev. Samuel A. Worcester dwelt upon the importance of a religious education, and expressed the ardent hope that the institution which was about being erected might stand to the remotest posterity, to bless and enlighten and christianize the descendants of the Cherokee people, whether those descendants should continue to maintain their complexion, or be merged in the white race which surrounds them.

J. Newhall has destroyed the worms, that have for a number of years rendered worthless his apples on a russet tree, by strewing salt on the earth under the tree in the fall of the year. His fruit last fall was free from worms, and his russet tree comes out this season with new life, and seems to relish the salt on its roots. Three or four quarts were applied.

A telegraphic dispatch from the Troy Daily Post communicates the following astounding information: During the thunder shower on Sunday a grocery store at Fort Edward, Washington County, was struck by lightning, instantly killing five men, and severely injuring three others, names unknown. The building was literally torn to pieces.

The aggregate of breadstuff shipments from the United States to Great Britain is enormous, and the exports still continue. The quantity of Indian Corn is 15,000,0000 bushels, and of Wheat 2,500,000 bbls. Reduced to grain the whole exports are equal to thirty-three millions of bushels, worth probably as many dollars. This amount was sent to Great Britain and Ireland alone. We have also supplied large quantities of breadstuffs to other countries, and such is the fertility of our land, that we have yet immense supplies for shipment, as soon as our inland means of transportation can bring them to the seaboard.

Messrs. Hoe & Co., are making two huge Printing Presses for the New York Sun. The types are placed upon a cylinder 4 feet in diameter, and the inking apparatus is of a novel description. All the motion is rotary, and it is calculated that in the saving of friction, and wear and tear by such means, the great amount of from five to twenty thousand dollars expense per annum will be avoided. It is calculated that these presses will be able to throw off 30,000 copies per hour. Their cost will be twenty thousand dollars.

According to statements made at St. Johns, N. B., it appears that between the 2d and 9th instant, 1378 passengers arrived at that port. Of these, 55 died on board the vessels which brought them. Among the vessels was the Seraph, which arrived at Boston from Cork, but the captain being unable to bond his passengers, proceeded to St. Johns. There were 144 deaths at the quarantine hospital of the latter city between the 2d of May and the 7th of July, besides which, 194 are reported to have died at sea, and 40 before they were landed and taken to the hospital.

According to the new Directory just published, the number of Churches of each religious denomination in this City is as follows: Protestant Episcopal, 41; Presbyterian, 33; Methodist Episcopal, 31; Baptist, 26; Catholic, 17; Dutch Reformed, 15; Jewish, 9; Congregational, 7; Unitarian, 4; Universalist, 4; Friends, 4; Lutheran, 3; Associate Presbyterian, 3; Associate Reformed Presbyterian, 2; Reformed Presbyterian, 13; Welsh, 2; Methodist Protestant, 1; Miscellaneous, 12; Total, 117.

An English gentleman resident in Rome thus writes to a friend in London: "Mr. Newman is regarded by the Romans as mad. He complains that neither Pope nor Cardinals do their duty, and insists that the Inquisition must be restored. The only sermon he preached here was in so violent a tone against the Protestant Church, that even the Romans were disgusted, and the Pope in consequence has forbidden his preaching again.

The Liverpool Times says there are 100,000 female servants in London alone, and over a million in England and Wales! The number of male servants is as great. The pressure of the times in England has operated very oppressively on servants. The London paper estimates the number of servants out of employ, at 300,000 and adds: 'A large portion of them are preparing to leave for Canada and the United States, where it is understood that they can get good places and high wages.'

William H. Hays, (son of Michael Hays of Burlington, N. J.,) having recently studied law in the office of the Hon. Garrett D. Wall, was married on the 8th of June to a young lady of Burlington, and, with his youthful bride, set out on a wedding tour to Niagara, Montreal, &c. Having returned as far as Saratoga Springs, he was seized with billious fever, and on Wednesday morning (just three weeks from the time he was married, at the same hour of the day) expired. His parents and sisters arrived just in time to see him die, at the early age of twenty-six.

The statute of the fifth of May last provides, that the electors of any town in the State of New York, which has no town-house for the transaction of the public business, may meet, after due notice, and vote a sum of money for the site of, and for building, a town-house, not exceeding in dollars twice the number of electors. The Board of Supervisors may either cause the money to be collected, or the question to be once more submitted to the townspeople. Said town-houses are to be in charge of the Supervisor, Town Clerk, and nearest Justice.

Mr. John M. Brown, a native of Petersburg, (Va.,) lost his life in Richmond on the 4th through the culpable carelessness of one of the members of a volunteer corps of that city, whilst the military were firing a national salute. A musket of one of the Richmond Greys was loaded with a ball cartridge, and the deceased, who was among the spectators, was shot through the head. The unfortunate man was standing at the time conversing with a friend, a young child being between them, and each having the child by the hand.

At a recent sacrament at the Seceder Church in Cadis, Ohio, while the members were at the table, some six or eight persons were attacked with a violent fever so suddenly that they were compelled to leave the church for home and a sick bed. The disease spread rapidly through the congregation, and upwards of one hundred members have since been taken ill—whole families have been prostrated, and a considerable number have since died.

Letters from Frankfort say that a radical reform in the system of postage will be speedily effected in the German states. The following are the basis of the new system: 1. The free passage of the mails from state to state, without obstruction or delay. 2. A daily mail everywhere. 3. Mails to follow the shortest route as far as possible. 4. A uniform rate of postage, and as low as possible.

A French paper states that Mr. Ratier, a farmer near Poictiers, has completely succeeded in preserving his potato crop by placing common salt on each portion of the seed. The same experement has been made by M. Willien, a chemist in the department of the Upper Rhine, with marked success. In the latter case, potatoes planted in the usual manner, in the same field, were destroyed by the disease.

James N. Buffum, of Lynn, a well-known Abolitionist, happening to live in a street through which Mr. Polk and suite were to pass in making their entreé into that place, caused a flag, on which was inscribed in large letters, "No union with Slaveholders," to be attached to his chimney, stretched across the street and fastened to the opposite house.

The Traveler says there were probably twenty thousand persons who left Boston on Monday night after the fireworks in the railroad trains. So carefully and discreetly were these crowded trains managed, however, that, as far as we have been able to learn, not an accident occurred, which may be considered as incident to these extraordinary arrangements.

Much astonishment has been lately created among the Venetian populace by the circumstance that the water of an Artesian well, which was lately sunk at Venice, burns brilliantly when brought into contact with a flame. This seemingly wonderful combustion is caused by the carburetted hydrogen gas which the water contains.

The Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun says: "It has been decided, to-day, at the Navy Department, to construct the four new war steamers at Gosport, New York, Philadelphia and Kittery Navy Yards. The models and other matters are all approved, and the orders will issue to-morrow."

The Sea Serpent was seen at Nahant on Sunday, by six persons who were upon the rocks. His appearance was much the same as before described. He raised his head apparently ten feet above the level of the water, and then gradually sunk and disappeared. So says the Boston Advertiser.

A large colony of Swedes is forming in Henry county, Illinois. They are generally intelligent and moral, and possess considerable property. It is stated that they have purchased the largest portion of Henry county, and now number over a thousand persons.

The grain crops in France are said to be magnificent. The vines are overloaded with grapes. The pears, plums, and apples, are much injured by small worms, which appear to be the larvæ of flies.

The Mining Journal shows that, last year, on ten mines in Cornwall a profit of $550,000 had been divided among the share-holders, although the outlay was only $170,000. Other 18 mines, now abandoned, had, during the time they were worked, yielded a profit of $15,000,000.

Messrs. Fairbanks & Co., of New York, patentees of the platform scales, have purchased South Hadley Falls, Mass. They intend to invest immediately two millions in improvements.

The Chemung Democrat says, that a man residing at Millport, sawed from one log, this spring, 2694 feet of lumber, which he sold for $69 22.

The Pope, with the great benevolence and wisdom that characterizes his movements, is making efforts to elevate the Jews in Rome, and meliorate their condition.

Gen. Geo. McDuffie, formerly Governor of S. C. and late a U. S. Senator from that State, is at this time very low with a nervous affection, and doubts are entertained of his recovery.

Edward Briggs, 27 years of age, was drowned on Saturday at Port Richmond, while bathing. On Saturday morning a man named Grant was drowned at a wharf in Philadelphia, who had gone in to bathe.

A Cincinnati paper states that 1200 bushels of strawberries were brought to their market in one day. A New York paper says 80,000 baskets of this fruit were brought into that city on the Erie railroad in one day.

The Republican Herald says:—Wonders will never cease! One of our subscribers has migrated to Texas, and left a small balance on our books due him!

Last week 250 emmigrants died in the wretched sheds at Montreal, and other 56 in private houses in the city.

MARRIED,

In Brookfield, N. Y., on the 8th inst., by Rev. S. B. Crandall, Mr. Charles P. Maxson, and Miss Roxana Hibbard.

DIED,

In Fulton, Rock Co., Ill., March 15, 1847, of scarlet fever, Hannah Pierce, daughter of Daniel and Catharine Pierce, aged 15 years, 3 months, and 23 days. Although her friends are called to mourn the loss of her company here, yet they mourn not as those without hope. They feel to say, with the poet—

> "Though Heaven afflicts, I'll not repine;
> Each heartfelt comfort yet is mine—
> Comfort that shall o'er death prevail,
> And journey with me through the vale."

Notice.—We are occasionally requested to discontinue papers where arrearages are not paid up. This is contrary to our rules, and cannot be done except in extraordinary cases. When we erase the name of a subscriber from our list, we have no longer any trace of him, or chance to collect our account against him. Hence the necessity of some such rule as we have adopted in common with most other newspapers. If subscribers wish to have their papers discontinued, it is very easy to do so, by paying up, and ordering them stopped. But to expect us to discontinue papers, while accounts remain unsettled, is in a high degree unreasonable.

THE NEW HYMN BOOK.

At the last meeting of the General Conference, a Committee, consisting of Thomas B. Brown, Lucius Crandall, Wm. B. Maxson, Eli S. Bailey, Nathan V. Hull, and Sherman S. Griswold, was appointed to prepare and secure the publication of a Hymn Book suited to the wants of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Subsequently Mr. Brown, Chairman of the Committee, suggested a plan for the work, which received the unanimous and hearty approval of the other members of the Committee, and which he was requested by them to carry out. We are happy to state, that he has completed the duty assigned to him, and has prepared for the press a book which is believed by good judges to be equal in point of merit to any thing of the kind now extant. The copy is already in the hands of the printer, and the work will be published and ready for distribution on the 10th day of September next. It will contain above one thousand hymns, covering nearly six hundred pages of the size of the medium edition of "The Psalmist," now in use among the Baptists. It will be printed on fine paper, and upon stereotype plates prepared from entirely new type. In style of workmanship, it is intended that the book shall be inferior to none. To secure for it as general a circulation as possible, the price, in common leather binding, has been fixed at 75 cents per copy, or $9 per dozen. Copies will be put up in extra binding, with gilt edges, &c., to suit every variety of taste, at prices corresponding to the style.

The Publishers of the Book are desirous of learning what number of copies will be at once demanded, in order that they may regulate the size of the first edition by the demand. They request, therefore, that those in want of the work will give them as early notice as possible of the number they desire. Probably the best way to do the business will be for each society or church to appoint some person to ascertain how many will be wanted within its own bounds, and send on the order accordingly. The books will be ready for delivery, as before stated, on the 10th day of September, in time to supply at the Anniversary of the Missionary and Tract Societies in DeRuyter, all who may wish to obtain them in that way. To save uneasiness, no money will be required until the books are delivered; and to save loss, no books will be delivered except for the money or its equivalent. Orders for the books are now solicited, and should in all cases be accompanied with explicit information as to the way in which they may be sent. Those who wish to be sure of copies of the first edition, should send their orders as early as the 1st day of September. Address, "Utter & Champlin, No. 9 Spruce-st, New-York."

The Academic Year for 1847-8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First commencing Wednesday,	Aug. 25,	and ending	Dec. 1
Second " "	Dec. 15,	"	March 22
Third " "	April 5,	"	July 12

Tuition, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
Extras—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE.

REV. J. T. HEADLEY, EDITOR.

The CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE, formerly under the care of Rev. D. Mead, commences its fourth volume under the editorship of Rev. J. T. Headley, author of "Napoleon and his Marshals," "Sacred Mountains," "Letters from Italy," &c. We hazard nothing in saying that this Magazine, so deservedly popular hitherto, is destined to fill a large place in public estimation; that it will not only maintain its present enviable distinction, but earn to itself a far higher popularity, and become the companion of many a circle to which it is now a stranger, gladdening by its presence, while it exerts an influence pure, elevating, and healthful. The Editor will bend his energies to make this the most popular Magazine of the day, and while he avails himself of articles from the best writers, he will draw freely from his own exhaustless store.

The design of the Editor and Publisher is to present a Magazine containing all the facination and interest of the lighter Periodicals, while at the same time it moves in a different path, and is not exposed to the same objections. It is issued monthly, containing 32 pages of original matter, printed on fine paper, in handsome covers, with a splendid steel engraving, and a beautiful colored flower, and music, to each number, and got up in every respect in the best style of the art, making a yearly volume of 384 pages, full of choice illustrations, and forming a handsome ornament to the Parlor Table, or a rich and valuable present to a friend.

☞ Price, two dollars a year. Three copies for five dollars. A few good, responsible agents wanted to circulate this work; to whom the best inducements will be offered.

FORGIVENESS.

My heart was heavy, for its trust had been Abused, its kindness answered with foul wrong;
So, turning gloomily from my fellow men,
One summer Sabbath day, I strolled among
The green mounds of the village burial place;
Where, pondering how all human love and hate
Find one sad level—and how, soon or late,
Wronged and wrong-doer, each with meekened face
And cold hands folded over a still heart,
Pass the green threshold of our common grave,
Whither all footsteps tend, whence none depart,
Awed for myself, and pitying my race,
Our common sorrow, like a mighty wave,
Swept all my pride away, and trembling I forgave!

DEATH.

For what is death to him who dies
With God's own blessing on his head?
A charter—not a sacrifice—
A life immortal to the dead.
And life itself is only great,
When man devotes himself to be,
By virtue, thought and deed, the mate,
Of God's own children and the free.

THE DYING CHILD'S REQUEST.

"O Ma," a little maiden said,
Almost with her expiring sigh,
"Put no sweet roses round my head,
When in my coffin-dress I lie."
"Why not, my dear," the mother cried,
"What flower a corpse so well adorns?"
"O Ma," the innocent replied,
"They crown'd our Saviour's head with thorns."

WORTH.

"The high, the mountain majesty of worth,
Should be, and shall, survivor of its woe,
And from its immortality look forth
In the sun's face, like yonder Alpine snow,
Imperishably pure beyond all things below."

FABLE OF THE VULTURES.

BY DR. JOHNSON.

The most skillful or most confident interpreters of the sylvan dialogues have been commonly found among the philosophers of the East, in a country where the calmness of the air and the mildness of the seasons allow the student to pass a great part of the year in groves and bowers. But what may be done in one place by peculiar opportunities, may be performed in another by peculiar diligence. A shepherd of Bohemia has, by long abode in the forest, enabled himself to understand the voice of birds; at least he relates with great confidence a story, of which the credibility is left to be considered by the learned.

"As I was sitting (said he) within a hollow rock, and watching my sheep that fed in the valley, I heard two vultures interchangeably crying on the summit of the cliff. Both voices were earnest and deliberate. My curiosity prevailed over my care of the flock; I climbed slowly and silently from crag to crag, concealed among the shrubs, until I found a cavity where I might sit and listen, without suffering or giving disturbance. I soon perceived that my labor would be well repaid; for an old vulture was sitting on a naked prominence, with her young about her, whom she was instructing in the arts of a vulture life, and preparing, by the last lecture, for their final dismission to the mountains and the skies.

"My children, (said the old vulture,) you will the less want my instructions, because you have had my practice before your eyes; you have seen me snatch from the farm the household fowl; you have seen me seize the leverett in bush and the kid in the pasture; you know how to fix your talons, and how to balance your flight when you are laden with your prey. But you remember the taste of more delicious food; I have often regaled you with the flesh of man. Tell us (said the young vultures) where man may be found, and how he may be known; his flesh is surely the natural food of a vulture. Why have you never brought a man in your talons to the nest? He is too bulky, (said the mother;) when we find a man, we can only tear away his flesh, and leave his bones upon the ground. Since man is so big, (said the young,) how do you kill him? You are afraid of the wolf and the bear, by what power are vultures superior to man? Is man more defenseless than a sheep? We have not the strength of man, (said the mother,) and I am sometimes in doubt whether we have the subtilty; and the vultures would seldom feed upon his flesh, had not Nature, that devoted him to our use, infused into him a strange ferocity, which I have never observed in any other being that feeds upon the earth. Two herds of men will often meet, and shake the earth with noise, and fill the air with fire. When you hear noise and see fire, with flashes along the ground, hasten to the place with your swiftest wing, for men are surely destroying one another; you will then find the ground smoking with blood and covered with carcases, of which many are dismembered and mangled for the convenience of the vulture. But when men have killed their prey, (said the pupil,) why do they not eat it? When the wolf has killed a sheep, he suffers not the vulture until he has satisfied himself. Is not man another kind of wolf? Man, (said the mother,) is the only beast who kills that which he does not devour, and this quality makes him so much a benefactor to our species. If men kill our prey, and lay it in our way, (said the young one,) what need shall we have of laboring for ourselves? Because man will sometimes (said the mother) remain for a long time quiet in his den. The old vultures will tell you when to watch his motions. When you see men in great numbers moving close together like a flock of storks, you may conclude that they are hunting, and that you will soon revel in human blood. But still, (said the young,) I would gladly know the reason of this mutual slaughter. I could never kill what I could not eat. My child, (said the mother,) this is a question which I cannot answer, though I am reckoned the most subtil bird of the mountain. When I was young, I used frequently to visit the eyrie of an old vulture who dwelt upon the Carpathian rocks; he had made many observations; he knew the places that afforded prey round his habitation as far, in every direction, as the strongest wing can fly between the rising and setting of the summer sun; he had fed, year after year, on the entrails of men. His opinion was, that men had only the appearance of animal life, being really vegetables with a power of motion; and that as the boughs of an oak are dashed together by the storm, that swine may fatten upon the falling acorns, so men are, by some unaccountable power, driven one against another, until they lose their motion, that vultures may be fed. Others think they have observed something of contrivance and policy among these mischievous beings; and those that hover more closely round them pretend that there is, in every herd, one that gives directions to the rest, and seems to be more eminently delighted with a wide carnage. What it is that entitles him to such preëminence we know not; he is seldom the biggest or the swiftest, but he shows, by his eagerness and diligence, that he is, more than any of the others, a friend to the vultures."

DR. FRANKLIN IN THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

BY WM. WIRT.

Nver have I known such a fire-side companion as he was! Great as he was, both as a statesman and philosopher. He never shone in a light more winning than when he was in the domestic circle. It was once my good fortune to pass two or three weeks with him, at the house of a private gentleman, in Pennsylvania; and we were confined to the house during the whole time, by the unremitting constancy and depth of the snows. But confinement could not be felt where Franklin was an inmate. His cheerfulness and his colloquial powers spread around him a perpetual spring. Of Franklin no one ever became tired. There was no ambition of eloquence, no effort to shine, in any thing which ever came from him. There was nothing which made any demand either upon your allegiance or your admiration. His manner was just as unaffected as infancy. It was nature's self. He talked like an old patriarch; and his plainness and simplicity put you at once at your ease, and gave you the full and free possession and use of all your faculties.

His thoughts were of a character to shine by their own light, without any adventitious aid. They required only a medium of vision, like his pure and simple style, to exhibit, to the highest advantage, their native radiance and beauty. His cheerfulness was unremitting. It seemed the systematic and salutary exercise of the mind, as of its superior organization. His wit was of the first order. It did not show itself merely in occasional coruscations; but without any effort or force on his part, it shed a constant stream of the purest light over the whole of his discourse. Whether in the company of commons or nobles, he was always the same plain man; always most perfectly at his ease, his faculties in full play, and the full orbit of his genius forever clear and unclouded. And then the stores of his mind were inexhaustible. He had commenced life with an attention so vigilant, that nothing had escaped his observation, and every incident was turned to advantage. His youth had not been wasted in idleness, nor overcast by intemperance. He had been all his life a close and deep reader, as well as thinker, and by the force of his own powers had wrought up the raw materials, which he had gathered from books, with such exquisite skill and felicity, that he had added a hundred fold to their original value, and justly made them his own.

DR. OLIN'S VISIT TO THE RIVER JORDAN.

Every thing was quiet, but wide awake, watching for the morning. Groups were assembled, standing or sitting upon the ground, in all directions through the camp and grove, either silent or conversing in low tones. Between two and three o'clock in the morning, I sallied forth again, and was surprised to find every one upon his feet, by the side of his horse or donkey, ready equipped for a start.

There had been no bustle for preparation; the camp was still covered with darkness. And we had received no information that so unseasonable a movement was to be made. I soon fell in with a gentleman of our party, who was beset with the prevailing tendency of watchfulness, and we walked together to the north side of the camp. A moment after, a man at a little distance from us, mounted a horse, and lifting a blazing flambeau on high, shouted at the top of his voice, "Yellah!" "Go! A hundred torches were blazing in an instant, and the whole field was illuminated as by a flash of lightning. In the same breath, as if moved by a single volition, the whole pilgrim army were mounted and in motion towards the Jordan. In five minutes more the governor and his suit followed, attended by a band of music, which struck up a lively air.

Whether this simultaneous movement was the result of previous concert, or of the universal eagerness and excitement, I know not, but it had almost the appearance of enchantment. It was now after three o'clock, when I returned again to my tent, and sought with better success a short season of repose. Not being aware that it was the intention of the pilgrims to set out at so early an hour, our party had fixed on six o'clock as the time for leaving the camp. I had sufficient reason to fear we should be too late for the religious spectacle when I saw the early movement of the host.

Our muleteers, with their animals, were out of the way, and a detachment of mounted men which the governor had left behind for our protection and to accompany us during the remainder of our excursion, were not likely to be in readiness before the hour appointed. An unusual spirit of drowsiness seemed to have fallen upon us all, and it was six before we got under way. We passed by the village, making, however, but little delay, and hastened towards the Jordan with a slight expectation only of arriving in time to witness the ceremony. We rode at a quick step for half an hour or more, and were full two miles from the river when we met the head of the returning cavalcade. The religious function and ablution in the sacred river had been performed a little after day break, and the multitude were now on their way back to the camp, where their tents had been left standing.

We halted to observe the train, which moved slowly by us, while the rear still rested on the bank of Jordan. All were engaged in singing hymns, and I thought I had never seen so many happy faces. They had attained the summit of earthly bliss,—an indescribable air of satisfaction, the beaming forth of heart-felt joy, rested upon every countenance. Nearly every one of the vast multitude exhibited some memorial of his visit to the holy waters. Some had long branches of the Jordan willow, with tufts of foliage left upon the extremity, waving about their heads. Almost all had walking sticks of the same material, and several, less affected by the prevaling enthusiasm, than the desire of gain, had their beasts loaded with trunks of trees,—to be wrought into crucifixes, caskets, and toys, or articles of small furniture, and thus to become the basis of profitable traffic.

A CAREER OF FAME ENDED.

The Parisian chit-chat of the Home Journal, furnishes the following item:—

Missed from this year's May-day celebration is a very singular man who has been, almost immemorially, its best-known and popular feature—Lazarin, the famous puppet show manager, the king and patriarch of the vagrant theatricals of France. He died just before the holiday came round, and thus terminated one of the most curious and extraordinary lives of the time. Lazarin was a marquis—a real legitimate marquis—born of one of the best and oldest descents of France, and married in his youth, to a daughter of a family as noble. He came into manhood by the gate of gold. Strikingly handsome, distinguished looking, (as he continued to be to the last) rich, joyous and brave, he launched into the gayeties of Court life, and was soon the person whose wit was the most imitated, and who was the most sought and best received. The waste of his fortune, however, kept equal pace with his triumphs, and when the Revolution arrived, he was desperately ready to throw himself into the front rank of the partizans and plotters. After miraculous hazards and escapes, his last disguise served to take him beyond the reach of harm, and he found himself in Germany, one of a company of strolling players, and without a sous or a hope. Instead of yielding to any depression, he gaily adopted the sock and buskin for the remainder of his life, and with one or two intervals, during one of which he came and passed some little time in America, he industriously followed it till he died. At the Restoration, he returned to Paris, having in his absence passed the meridian of life, but he returned with no idea of resuming rank or name. The fortunes of his marquisate were extinct, and poverty with the dignities of such a name offered little temptation. His winning address, in parading before the tent door of his wax figure show, and inducing the strolling public to enter, was profitably employed, and though he loved in his leisure moments to tell his story, and laugh over his adventures, he was never other than "Lazarin" in his claims to position or respect. He is lamented by more than would have lamented him had he died under the satin canopy and been buried under the heraldic blazon of a prince.

Hay-Racks for Horse Stables.—It is a disputed point of what form the hay-racks in a work-horse stable should be. The prevailing opinion may be learned from the general practice, which is to place them as high as the horses' heads, because, as it is alledged, the horse is thereby obliged to hold up his head, and he cannot then breathe upon his food. Many more cogent reasons, as I conceive, may be adduced for placing the racks low down. In the first place, a work-horse does not require to hold his head up at any time, and much less in the stable, where he should enjoy all the rest he can get. 2. A low rack permits the position of his neck and head, in the act of eating, to be more like the way he usually holds them, than when holding them up to a high one. 3. He is not nearly so liable to pull out the hay among his feet from a low as from a high rack. 4. His breath cannot contaminate his food more in a low than in a high rack, because the greatest proportion of the breath naturally ascends; though breathing is employed by the horse to a certain degree in choosing his food by the sense of smell. 5. He is less fatigued eating out of a low than from a high rack, every mouthful having to be pulled out of the latter, from its sloping position, by the side of the mouth turned upward. 6. Mown-grass is much more easily eaten out of a low than a high rack. 7. And lastly, I have heard of peas falling out of their straw, when eaten out of a high rack, into the ears of the horse, and therein setting up a serious degree of inflammation.

Americans in Russia.—The Emperor of Russia has recently visited the splended establishment of Messrs. Harrison, Winans & Eastwick, (American mechanics,) for the construction of railroad locomotives for the use of the Russian Government. He was delighted with the triumph of American genius and skill, and ordered the Cross of St. Anne to be conferred upon Maj. G. W. Whistler, theAmerican engineer, and diamond rings to be presented to the contractors, Messrs. Harrison, Winans & Eastwick. The establishment employs at present 1,920 workmen, including 1,613 Russians, 121 Germans, 164 Swedes, 17 English, and 5 Americans—which number embraces the whole number of foremen and workmen. The contracts of Messrs. Harrison, Winans & Eastwick embrace 162 twenty-five ton locomotives and tenders; 5,300 iron trucks for eight-wheel cars; 2,500 eight wheel freight cars; 70 passenger cars; and two improved cars on sixteen wheels, eighty feet long. Out of which are now finished, 108 locomotives with their tenders; 5,200 iron trucks; 906 freight and two passenger cars.

New-Fashioned Railroad.—M. Audrand, an individual well known in Paris for his unremitting exertions for the last seven years, to perfect a system of railroad traveling by means of compressed air, seems at length in a fair way to succeed. He has laid down a way 100 yards long, upon which a carriage built for the purpose is impelled, upon his new principle, with an ease and smoothness heretofore not attained on the ordinary railroads. There is no locomotive necessary to move it, inasmuch as this is accomplished by a tube laid in the centre of the road, with a pipe by its side, which keeps up the motive power. This system, the inventer undertakes to show, is vastly preferable, in all respects, to that of the atmospheric. It combines all its advantages, while it is subject to none of its imperfections. It unites entire safety with the capacity to run 15 to 50 miles per hour. The cost of keeping it in motion is stated to be less than one half of that of engine-propelled carriages.

"Well, George," asked a friend of a young lawyer, who had been "admitted" about a year, "how do you like your new profession?" The reply was accompanied by a brief sigh to suit the occasion—"My profession is much better than my practice."

VARIETY.

A Norwegian newspaper has recently been started at Norway, Racine County, Wisconsin. The Milwaukie Gazette says that Norwegian settlements are already numerous and growing rapidly. There are now in Wisconsin, Illinois and Iowa, twenty settlements, and sixteen of them within the limits of this Territory. They embrace a population of from fifteen to twenty thousand; frugal, industrious, honest, law-loving and law-abiding citizens. The principal settlement in Wisconsin is on Koskonong prairie, where there are nearly a thousand Norwegian families. In the towns of Muskego, Waukaska county, and Norway, Racine county, which adjoin each other, the Norwegian settlers number nearly 1,000. In Rock county there are a thousand and upward, and many in Jefferson, Dodge, and other northern counties.

It has been decided in Scotland, in the case of an Odd Fellows' Lodge, that a majority of the members have no power to break up the Lodge, and divide the funds between the individual members. The Court held that "so long as an Association adheres to the principles upon which it was founded, and applies its funds to the purposes intended, it is not in the power of a majority of its members to dissolve the Association, and to seek a distribution of the funds for their own private use, contrary to the original intention thereof, and in violation of the agreement under which they became members, and under faith of the integrity of which others became members.

A sailor, mate of a vessel at East Boston, perhaps a little disguised with liquor, came across a cow, quietly feeding in the streets of that place, and jumped upon her back. The frightened animal started down the street with its unusual burden, much to the amusement of the spectators. Having reached the end of the street, the sailor jumped off, and with a loud cry of "starboard your helm!" jerked the cow round by the tail, jumped on again, and rode back to his original starting place. The owner of the cow, upon hearing the facts, was disposed to sue the sailor for damage done to the cow; but the matter was settled by his paying ten dollars for his ride.

People have often heard stories about a wheel being found within a wheel, and such sort of things, but we presume very few have ever heard of an egg being found within an egg. They must therefore hear of the latter phenomenon now for the first time. On Saturday last, as we are informed on good authority, Miss Phebe Agnevine, daughter of Mr. Bartholomew Agnevine, of the town of Clinton, in this County, broke a hen's egg, which was found to contain another inside of it as large as that of a partridge, perfectly formed, and having a hard shell. It is a singular case, and we presume the wisest ones in curious things will find it hard to account for it. [Poughkeepsie Eagle.

On the night of the late illumination at Cincinnati, a highly excited crowd assembled in front of the residence of a patriotic citizen, who had given out that he would exhibit a Drummond Light on the joyful occasion. When expectation was at its highest point, a colored man walked out with something mysterious in his hand. A loud shout from the multitude rent the air. The colored man placed upon a dry goods box a paper drum with a lighted candle stuck in the end of it, and underneath was written, in large capitals, "Drum and Light." The crowd, good humoredly, forgave the authors, for the sake of the joke.

In Franklin County, Northern New York, is a brook formed from two streams, which are intermittent; they are very singular in that character, sometimes being perfectly dry for twenty hours together, and then again flowing freely. It is supposed they are fed by some underground syphon, for it is noted that they are never dry in the hot summer weather, when other streams generally fail, and never cease to flow for more than a day at a time; they stop flowing very suddenly, and when at the highest have been known to stop running and dry up at once.

During the sixty-one days of New York canal navigation this season, ending 30th June, the tolls received amounted to $1,304,320,74—which is nearly $356,000 more than the receipts of seventy-five days of navigation ending at the same date last year. In the same time 1,360,058 bbls. flour, 1,561,058 bush. wheat, 2,298,712 bush. corn, and 211,729 bush. barley, arrived at tide water. These receipts, as compared with those of last year, show an excess of wheat and flour equal to 632,386 bbl. flour; whilst of corn the excess is 688,568 bushels over the entire receipts of 1846.

There are said to be sixty individuals of American birth, including men, women, and children, residing in Constantinople, among whom are Messrs. Davis and Smith, natives of South Carolina, now in the receipt of very handsome salaries from the Turkish Government. It is known that these gentlemen are employed in making geological surveys, and seeing to the improvements of Turkish agriculture, having been sent out at the request of that Government.

A letter from Batavia, in the Paris Presse, says that the commerce in ice in the burning climate of India, and the Indian Archipelago, chiefly carried on by the United States, has become very lucrative. One house in Boston, in a single year, sent 101 vessels with cargoes of ice to Asia, which yielded ten millions of florins—almost as much as the product of the whole wine harvest of Bordeaux.

THE DAILY NATIONAL WHIG is published in the city of Washington, every day, at three o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted, and served to subscribers in the City, at the Navy Yard, in Georgetown, in Alexandria, and in Baltimore, the same evening, at six and a quarter cents a week, payable to the sole agent of the Whig, G. L. Gillchrist, Esq., or his order. It is also mailed to any part of the United States for $4 per annum, or $2 for six months, payable in advance. Advertisements of ten lines or less inserted one time for 50 cents, two times for 75 cents, three times for $1, one week for $1 75, two weeks for $2 75, one month for $4, two months for $7, three months for $10, six months for $16, one year for $20, payable always in advance.

The "National Whig" is what its name indicates. It speaks the sentiments of the Whig party of the Union on every question of public policy. It advocates the election to the Presidency of Zachary Taylor, subject to the decision of a Whig National Convention. It makes war to the knife upon all the measures and acts of the Administration deemed to be adverse to the interests of the country, and exposes without fear or favor the corruptions of the party in power. Its columns are open to every man in the country, for the discussion of political or any other questions.

In addition to politics, a large space in the National Whig will be devoted to publications upon Agriculture, Mechanics, and other useful arts, Science in general, Law, Medicine, Statistics, &c. Choice specimens of American and Foreign Literature will also be given, including Reviews, &c. A weekly list of the Patents issued by the Patent Office will likewise be published—the whole forming a complete family newspaper.

The "Weekly National Whig," one of the largest newspapers in the United States, is made up from the columns of the Daily National Whig, and is published every Saturday, for the low price of $2 per annum, payable in advance. A double sheet of eight pages will be given whenever the press of matter shall justify it.

The Memoirs of General Taylor, written expressly for the National Whig, are in course of publication. They commenced with the second number, a large number of copies of which have been printed, to supply calls for back numbers.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, IRA SAYLES, } Principals,

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; a number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

THE SABBATH AFFECTED BY THE EARTH'S MOTION.

[From James A. Begg's unpublished work on the Sabbath—Section v.]

In the absence of Scripture proof of a change of the Sabbath, manifold excuses have been devised by the church, in her fertile unfaithfulness, for the refusal to yield true obedience to the fourth commandment of the Decalogue. Against another of these, which has sometimes been urged, the line of argument which we have adopted in repelling the objection founded on the prohibition against kindling fires, is, in part, equally available. The observance of the seventh day, it has been said, could only have been intended for one country; for that, as the commencement and close of the day vary in different latitudes and longitudes, no day is the same in all its hours or minutes in different lands—and that of places distant from each other by the extent of the earth's diameter, the sun only rises upon the one, when it sets as regards the other.

The difference referred to is, indeed, an unquestionable fact; it exists now, and has always done so; but the inference drawn from it is most unwarrantable and illogical. The objection labors under a double disadvantage—it not merely has no Scriptural basis, but it does not even pretend to rest upon a single text, either perverted or misunderstood. And whilst it has no countenance in the Word of God, it is pleaded by some whose inconsistency it grievously betrays. For if the objection is worth any thing as directed against the Sabbath, it has the same force against any other day. Now no observer of Sunday is entitled to plead an objection against the Sabbath of the Lord, which is equally applicable to the day of his own adoption; and it is obvious enough that this objection is of that character. If, on Sabbath last, the sun rose and set on Glasgow four and a half hours earlier than it did at New York, so also was there a corresponding difference on the Sunday of the same week. And if any advocate for a changed Sabbath feels no such difficulty in reference to the application of his own principle to the first day, why should he imagine or impute it to the seventh?

The missionary sent by British Christians to the banks of the Ganges, to China, or to New South Wales, teaches his convert to sanctify the first day, as he himself did when in England or in Scotland, and as the church with which at home he was connected continues to do, without reference to the fact that the commencement and close of the day are so different in the several lands named. The same observation applies to the principle inculcated by the American missionary upon his converts in the empire of Burmah, and other distant lands. Again—(and the force of our illustration may be better perceived when thus presented)—in the United States full fellowship will be maintained among Christians observing the Sunday in Maine with those of Missouri, without their ever dreaming of a different day, although the sun, so to speak, in passing from the one to the other, traverses six and twenty degrees of longitude, occasioning thereby a difference of about an hour and three quarters.

But we resume the higher ground of Scriptural illustration. Passing over the scene of primeval bliss, in which the sanctified and blessed Sabbath day was at first given to man, the locality of which is still a matter of controversy, we recall in connection the wonders of the wilderness, in which God discriminated the Sabbath from other days, by the mode in which the manna was supplied to his people—we gaze again on the thousands of Israel at Sinai, from whose flaming summit the sanctity of a Sabbath was repromulgated—we reënter the land of promise, in which its observance was enforced—we follow to Media and Babylon, in which the captive Israelites were still called to sanctify it—our sympathies are awakened in their behalf over the hundred and twenty-seven provinces of Ahasuerus, when Haman's wickedness plotted their ruin—we see them now throughout the wide world, over which, agreeably to the predictions of Moses and other prophets, they have been dispersed, and from which dispersion, as we have formerly seen, they are to be recalled when they return unto the Lord, doing all that Moses commanded them, the weekly Sabbath included. That their observance of all the law of Moses and the divine promise here referred to, does not relate to any past event in Israel's history, is evident, from the fact that it is recorded as what shall take place after a full declaration has been made of all that should befall them, from that day till this, including the destruction of Jerusalem and their being scattered into all nations, (Deut. xxviii, xxix,) "when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse," and when they shall call them to mind among all the nations whither the Lord their God hath driven them, even "unto the utmost parts of heaven." The text reiterates the declaration of their observance of the whole law when they shall be brought again into the land which their fathers possessed, and then God's blessed promise shall be enjoyed, "He will do thee good and multiply thee above thy fathers." Deut. xxx. 1—10. They shall then have circumcised hearts, and love the Lord with all their souls, and "the Lord will again rejoice over thee for good, as He rejoiced over thy fathers." These are promises which have not had even the semblance of fulfillment since the first captivity; and, therefore, wait their accomplishment in Israel's future and final restoration.

The divine obligation rests upon them among all the nations whither the Lord their God hath driven them, to obey his voice, and do all the commandments which Moses gave them. The Sabbath, therefore, they at least are required to hallow, in all the lands of their wide dispersion, No difference of latitude or longitude, no diversity in the sun's rising and setting, prevents this. The sun never sets upon the scene of Israel's present sin and present suffering, and no argument drawn from the earth's diurnal motion, avails to release them from the obligation of the seventh day. Where, then, is the force of the alledged impossibility, or even the improbability of yielding full obedience, which the objection we are considering has contrived? In all time, and every where, the Sabbath obligation, according to this the authority of God, has accompanied Israel in all their wanderings. In some of these lands of their habitation, the Sabbath's sun may have only risen at the time that on others it was setting; but, every where that sun does rise and set, thereby indicating duties the creature owes to his Creator. Every where, the seventh day Israel are required to keep holy to the Lord. That which God requires of them must be possible; and what is possible to a Jew cannot be impossible to a Gentile. The law of the fourth commandment is not that all must weekly sabbatize during precisely the same hours, but that, keeping register of time as God in His grace directs, that law, imperative on all, is, "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work."

We have admitted fully the fact on which the objection is based; we even go farther, and admit, that the effect arising from the earth's motion we need both to know and in certain circumstances well to remember. Ignorance of it, or inattention to it, might occasion error or uncertainty in the calculations of the traveler. We know that Captain Cook had to adjust his reckonings of the days of the week when he arrived at Batavia. More recently, McLeod, in his Voyage of the Alceste, (p. 197) relates that on leaving China for the Philipines, in 1817, they reached Manilla on Monday, the 3d of February, but found it was only Sunday at this place, owing to the different routes by which the Spaniards and the Portuguese advanced to the Asiatic seas, the one by Cape Horn, and the other by the Cape of Good Hope. Magellan, having made more than half the circuit of the world without taking reckoning of the difference of nearly seventeen hours in the astronomical time, produced by the difference of longitude, occasioned the calender at Manilla being ever since a day in arrear relatively to those of Macao, Batavia, and other adjacent colonies. The inconvenience arising from this variation has, within the last two years, led the Governor General and Archbishop to correct it; which was done by dropping a day, causing the 30th of December 1844, to be immediately followed by the 1st of January 1845, in the Manilla calander. (Athenæum, June 28th, 1845.) The fact, then, on which the objection rests, is one the influence of which extends to every day of the week, to Sunday as well as to the Sabbath; but the danger of mistake may be anticipated and prevented; and the error and the inconvenience which neglect might occasion at any time, are not without remedy.

The structure of the globe, and the law under which God has placed its regulation, necessarily makes the commencement and close of the day different in different longitudes, while yet, both in regard to the Sabbath and "the six working days," the commencement and close are capable of being known in all lands. But the form of the earth and the nature of its motion, and therefore the effects of that motion, have undergone no change since the beginning. The objection, therefore, if of force now, has had the same force since the creation of the world. From the first moment when the earth began to revolve, impelled in its course by the hand of the Almighty Creator, there has been the same order in this respect, and when God made it so, he "saw that it was good," and it doubtless remains so. He calls not for one man in the extreme east to hallow precisely the same hours as another in the extreme west; but he requires of both that they sanctify the seventh day. In both places there is, and has always been, the seventh day, as well as there has been the first day. The first revolution of the earth at creation, as well as its latest revolution in our own day, occupied time; and, therefore, one part of its surface was then illuminated before another part. Yet as this fact did not prevent the Lord from both sanctifying and blessing the seventh day at first—as it did not release the ten tribes when in Media, nor the Jews when in Babylon, from the sacredness of its obligation—as that obligation was not impaired while they were in all the lands from India to Ethiopia—as it does not in the eye of "the God of the whole earth" shield any of his people Israel from just condemnation when now scattered still more widely, when they have blasphemed his holy name among the Gentiles, by profaning his hallowed day—so neither will it form any justification or palliation of "the son of the stranger that hath joined himself to the Lord," if he keepeth not the Sabbath from polluting it.

ANTITHESIS.

BY MRS. M. T. W. CHANDLER.

When thou, dear child, wrapt in unconscious sleep,
Within my circling arms thy form didst lay,
From troubled rest I oft would start and weep,
And dream some power had borne thee far away.
Pale with affright, and trembling with my fears,
I woke—to find thee slumb'ring on my heart—
And with a gush of warm and grateful tears,
I bade the visionary dread depart.

But now, when sinking to my lonely rest,
Brooding o'er mem'ries of thine infant charms,
In my false dreams, I lull thee on my breast,
And fold thee, soft and warm, within mine arms.
Who, then, shall tell the anguish of my soul,
When the chill morning cometh—bleak and lone—
When the sweet spell which o'er my senses stole,
Hath vanished, and I wake—to find thee gone!

CHINESE PROCESSION IN HONOR OF THE GODS.

For several days the whole city has been in commotion on account of a great procession, celebrated annually, in honor of all the gods. It commenced yesterday, to continue three days. The city is crowded with strangers, who have come from the country, and neighboring villages, to the distance of twenty and thirty miles.

Having a desire to witness this exhibition of heathenism, we procured permission to sit in an upper room in the house of an acquaintance, on one of the streets through which the procession was expected to pass.

In about half an hour the procession appeared, preceded and guarded by men holding little rattans, with small white flags, with which they cleared the way, and kept off the crowd. The procession beggars all description. It consisted of a medley, of which mere words can convey no idea. There were thousands of toys, and trinkets, and gaudy colors, and fantastic shapes, fitted to dazzle the eyes of the vulgar—a perfect chaos of sights and sounds—of embroidered silks and brilliant tassels, of glittering pewter, and shining brass, and flowers, and figures of men, set off with the sound of innumerable drums, and symbols, and shrill trumpets, and explosions of gunpowder.

There too were horses, loaded down with gaudy ornaments, and mounted by little boys in tawdry dresses—men with immense satanic-looking masks, and men on stilts, covered with cut paper, so as to look like ostriches, flapping their wings, and occasionally sending forth clouds of smoke from their long beaks—high tiers of lanterns, and glass cases, enclosing ornaments, flowers, or paper figures of English soldiers—seven immense dragons, some of them of rich silk, and a hundred and fifty feet in leagth. I saw no idols, but they may have been in some part of the procession which did not pass us.

But the chief attraction was some fifteen or more cars born on men's shoulders, on which were seated boys and girls richly dressed. On some of these the children were placed in curious positions. The following may serve as specimens:—

An ordinary flower-pot, from which grew a little stunted tree, with two long branches, on the extremity of each of which was seated a little girl.

A girl with her right foot dangling in the air, supported in her position by a younger girl holding her by the left ancle.

A little girl with both feet dangling in the air, supported by the left hand resting lightly upon a rod attached to the car.

A girl, with a violin and guitar crossed and tied to her back, on one of which was seated a little boy, and on the other a little girl.

A girl standing on one foot on the head of a small brazen serpent held in the hand of another.

A girl, standing on the circumference of a ring, placed vertically, and at right angles upon another, the latter being held in the hand of a little girl.

A root, growing from a glass globe, in which gold fish were swimming, on each of the two branches of which was seated a little girl.

A little girl, with a stick over her shoulder, on the extremity of which stood another girl on one foot.

The secret of these positions every body knew. Strong iron wires were concealed under the wide flowing garments of the girls, so that while they appeared to be suspended upon the frailest imaginable support, they in fact had tolerably firm and comfortable seats. Some of them were well executed, but others were done in a bungling manner. The whole was nearly an hour and a half in passing.

This procession is said to have cost from twenty to thirty thousand dollars. [Miss. Chron.

THE MISSIONARY VANDERKEMP.

Moffatt, in his missionary labors in South Africa, draws the following striking portrait of the missionary Vanderkemp:—

"Some time elapsed before the crafty monarch Gaika would give his consent that they should remain in his dominions; and when this was at length granted, and a suitable spot selected, he adds, in true gospel simplicity, 'Brother Edmonds and I cut down long grass and rushes for thatching, and felled trees in the wood. I kneeled down on the grass, thanking the Lord Jesus that he had provided me a resting-place before the face of our enemies and Satan, praying that from under this roof the seed of the gospel might spread northward through all Africa.

"'After Mr. E.'s departure, the doctor in his cheerless abode was instant in season and out of season, eagerly embracing every opportunity of recommending the gospel, and catching each little ray of light that beamed in his devious path. He was a man of exalted genius and learning. He had mingled with courtiers. He had been an inmate of the universities of Leyden and Edinburgh. He had obtained plaudits for his remarkable progress in literature, in philosophy, divinity, physic, and the military art. He was not only a profound student in ancient languages, but in all the modern European tongues, even to that of the Highlanders of Scotland, and had distinguished himself in the armies of his earthly sovereign, in connection with which he rose to be captain of horse and lieutenant of the dragoon guards. Yet this man, constrained by the "love of Christ," could cheerfully lay aside all his honors, mingle with savages, and bear their sneers and contumely, condescend to serve the meanest of his trouble some guests—take the axe, the sickle, the spade, and the mattock—lie down on the place where dogs repose and spend nights, and his couch drenched with rain, and cold winds bringing his fragile house about his ears. Though annoyed by the nightly visits of hungry hyenas, sometimes destroying his sheep and traveling appurtenances, and even seizing the leg of beef at his tent door; though compelled to wander about in quest of lost cattle, and exposed to the perplexing and humbling caprice of those whose characters were stains on human nature—whisperings occasionally reached his ears that murderous plans were in progress for his destruction—he calmly proceeded with his benevolent efforts.'"

THE TRIAL SERMON.

At a village church, on the occasion of a new minister's debut among them, who happened to be more remarkable for his simple eloquence and perspicuity than his predecessor, after the sermon there was the usual gathering of the Deacons.

"Well, Mr. Squint, what do you think of the new dominie?"

"Why, Mr. Twist, I can't say that he pleased me, that is, he warn't what one might have expected—indeed, I don't know but I might say, I was disappointed a leetle!"

"That's just what I should ha' said, Mr. Squint, but you took the words out o' my mouth. But what do you think is the failing?"

"Why, as to that, Mr. Twist, I don't know but he's all failing; I've heerd preachers in my day, and not a few neither; the fact is, the village is waking up—we must have learning—why, the Dominie's sermon was so plain that I understood every word of it. There was no larning in it; now the Dominie down the river preaches crack sermons, such as would take you all the week to find out what his meaning was, his discourses are so learned."

"You've hit it, neighbor, 'xactly. I don't think he knows much, and always did think so. Good morning!"

So it is. If a minister astounds his hearers with mysteries himself knows nothing about, the fool is pleased, "while it cannot but make the judicious grieve." Bishop Beveridge used to say that it required all his learning to make the great things of the Gospel plain. Some persons painfully remind us of the audience of Goldsmith's Village Schoolmaster. The lines may be re-quoted:—

While words of learned length and thundering sound,
Amazed the gazing rustics ranged around;
And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew,
That one small head could carry all he knew.

A COUNTRY MINISTER.

There is no lesson more beautifully instructive to our mind, than that which is taught in the devoted, faithful life of a country minister. His sphere of action is a retired one. He hears little of the world's encouraging applause. His name is, perhaps, confined to a narrow sphere. He has, in these divided times, especially, peculiar difficulties to contend with, and under the most favorable circumstances, his trials and discouragements are many. But his life is one of cheerful usefulness, and the end of his days is peace. The promises of the gospel and its delightful encouragements are his daily portion. He may at times be disheartened, and fear that his labors are in vain. But the good work, which so engages his thoughts, is going on. The smile of God is upon him. In the evening of life, he may look back with a calm satisfaction on the years that are past. The faith which he has labored to establish in the hearts of others, grows warm and bright in his own breast, and when his toils here are over, he goes to meet, in a purer world, the glad welcome of those whom his teachings have blessed, and who have gone from his prayers on earth to join in the anthems of praise in heaven. Many there are seeking no higher or broader sphere, than that which their Master has assigned them in his vineyard. And what more glorious office is there under heaven? or, to whom will the words be more appropriate, "Well done, good and faithful servants, enter ye into the joy of your Lord?"

CHINESE BURIAL PLACES.

No people profess so much veneration for the memory of their fathers as the Chinese; and the worship of their tombs is by far the most solemn, and apparently sincere, ceremonial in the shape of religious worship they exibit. In order to perform its rites, men (women take no part in it) who emigrate to distant lands often return, at much expense and trouble, to the place of their birth: and their fond clinging to the memory of their dead, more than love for its institutions, seems, and is said to be, the strong bond which binds the Chinese to their country. But they have no consecrated place of interment; and, if they have a right analogous to episcopal consecration, it must be so simply and easily executed as to have effect any where. At any rate, they have no accumulation of graves in particular enclosed spots: they do not set apart acres for that purpose, and surround them with walls, separating the silent tenants from the living world, and forming a great prison-house for the dead. On the contrary, every one chooses the spot he likes best for the final resting place of those he loves.

The country residents bury their dead on their own land, often very close to their dwellings. On the hillsides, especially in stony, barren places, are seen tombs and graves, thinly scattered in rural districts, and more numerous in the neighborhood of towns. The choice is wise, andits effects any thing but upleasing to the eye. The tombs are often of porphyry, finished with much minute chiseling, and sometimes in tolerable monumental taste. Placed on rocky eminences, often in particularly picturesque situations, under the shadow of cedars and cypresses, they present every where here and there objects of pleasing, perhaps profitable, centemplation. A PLEASANT INCIDENT.

A very pleasant incident occurred in one of our public schools a day or two since. It seems that one of the boys attending the school, of the average of seven years, had in their play of bat and ball, broken one of the neighbor's windows; but no clue to the offender could be obtained, as he would not confess, nor would any of his associates expose him.

The case troubled the teacher, and on the occasion of one of our citizens visiting the school, she privately and briefly stated the circumstances, and wished him to advert to the principle involved in the case.

The address to the school had reference principally to the conduct of boys in the streets and at their sports. The principles of rectitude and kindness which should govern them every where—even when they thought there was no eye to see, and no one present to observe. The school seemed deeply interested in the remarks.

A very short time after the visitor left the school, a little boy arose from his seat and said—

"Miss L——, I batted the ball that broke Mr. ——'s window. Another boy threw the ball, but I batted it, and it struck the window. I am willing to pay for it."

There was a death-like silence in the school as the little boy was speaking, and continued for a minute after he had closed.

"But it won't be right for —— to pay the whole for the glass," said another boy, rising from his seat, "all of us that were playing should pay something, because we were all alike engaged in the play. I'll pay my part!"

"And I."

"And I."

A thrill of pleasure seemed to run through the school at this display of correct feeling. The teacher's heart was touched, and she felt more than ever the responsibility of her charge.

THE SHEPHERD'S LOVE.

Walking through my field on a winter's morning, I met with a lamb, as I thought dead, but taking it up, I found it just alive. The cruel mother had almost starved it to death. I put it into my bosom, and brought it into my house, where I rubbed its starved limbs, warmed it by the fire-side, and fed it with warm milk from the cow. Soon the lamb revived: first it feared me, but afterwards it thoroughly loved me. As I mostly fed it with my own hands, so it followed me wherever I went, bleating after me whenever it saw me, and always happy when it could frisk around me, but never so pleased as when I would carry it in my arms.

Jesus is a Shepherd, the Shepherd of souls; and of him it is said, He carries the lambs in his bosom, and gently leads those that are with young. If you desire to love Jesus, read that blessed book, the Bible; there you hear such things of the love of Christ to poor ruined sinners, as I hope will melt your eyes to tears, and your hearts into love.

USE OF SCRIPTURE IN A DYING HOUR.—A poor Sabbath School girl was found by a benevolent lady in an asylum in England, very near her end. The lady inquiring into her state, asked her, "My child, what do you most of all things desire?"

She replied, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me."

Lady. Have you no fear of death?

Child. "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me, thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."

Lady. But are you not afraid that some of your sins are yet unpardoned?

Child. "If we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin."

O that this might be the experience of all who read the above, both living and dying.

THE "SABBATH DISCUSSION."

It was our intention to enter into a still farther examination of the "Sabbath Discussion." But as there has not yet been any intimations of a disposition on the part of the editor of the Chronicle to give to his readers what we have already written, we shall for the present forbear. Indeed, after a reëxamination of the Discussion, we are inclined to think that nothing farther is necessary. Recently "E. W. D." has attempted to define his position more clearly. He denies that he regards the fourth commandment as binding Christians to the observance of a seventh day. "Such language I never penned. I discard the idea altogether." We have read, and re-read, all that "E. W. D." has written; and, notwithstanding he professes to reject the sentiment charged upon him, we confess that we cannot understand him in any other light. If the "seventh" may be reckoned from any point, as he expressly says in one of his communications, then any day may become the seventh day; which is all that is meant by a seventh day. "Indagator," to illustrate the practical tendency of his opponent's doctrine, says, "If each seventh portion of the citizens of this city had fixed on a different day of the week to observe as the Sabbath, each day that passes over our heads would be the Sabbath of Jehovah our God." "E. W. D." replies, "Just so. The law indicates no preference. It says, simply and only, Six days shalt thou labor. The seventh—i. e. the day after the sixth—is the Sabbath of Jehovah your God." What consistency there is in all this, we shall leave our readers to imagine, until the writer chooses to explain himself still farther. The "seventh" may be reckoned from any point;—the law indicates no preference;—and yet it does indicate a preference, for it requires the seventh day and not a seventh! We confess we do not comprehend such reasoning. "I wish some of your correspondents would explain how Saturday comes to be exclusively the seventh day." We are not of the correspondents of the Chronicle, and perhaps "E. W. D." has never seen what we have written. But we now repeat our request that the editor of that print will give our remarks a place in his columns. We hold ourselves ready to attend to any thing that may be offered farther on this important subject. *

PLEADINGS FOR PEACE WITH MEXICO.

The London Peace Society has addressed Memorials to our own Government, to that of Mexico, to the British Ministry, and to all the principal monarchs of Europe, pleading for a speedy termination of our conflict with Mexico, and for a general adoption of such substitutes, for war as shall supersede its necessity in all cases. These Memorials set forth that the Peace Society is not formed for any national, political, or sectarian objects, but is based upon the principle that all war is inconsistent with the spirit of Christianity and the true interests of mankind. Its object is to secure the entire abolition of the system and practice of war, throughout the whole world. In this instance, it desires to promote the object by conveying to the parties concerned the sentiments which pervade their own minds, and those of the Christian people of England.

The Memorial designed for our own government, is addressed "to the Hon. James K. Polk, President of the United States of America," and after stating the views of the Society, concludes with the following entreaty:—

"In this moment of your victory, we would, most earnestly and respectfully, entreat you to display a truly magnanimous and Christian spirit, by at once offering to the Mexicans such terms as they can scarcely fail to accept, and by declaring your determination to abandon at once all appeal to military force, and to settle the disputed questions, should any such still arise, by referring the whole case to the arbitration of two or three friendly powers. We cannot but think that such steps as these would secure to the American people a distinction among the nations of the earth far more valuable than any thing which can be acquired by military triumphs, and would tend, by its influence on other countries, to discourage the unchristian practice of war, and to secure to the nations the unspeakable blessing of permanent and universal peace."

The Memorial designed for the Mexican Government is addressed "to the Honorable Santa Anna, President of the Republic of Mexico." It states the objects and wishes of the Society, deplores the large amount of privation and suffering which has been endured by those who are innocent and unoffending as to the cause of this war, and closes with the following language:—

"Your memorialists disclaim every thing like a right to interfere, as between your nation and America, nor have they any such power of interference; but they do, most respectfully and fervently, as men and as Christians, implore you to use your utmost endeavors to secure a total and immediate suspension of hostilities, and to seek the adjustment of the existing differences by mutual negociation, or by referring them to the arbitration of one or more friendly powers, with the distinct and full understanding that both parties will abide by the decision.

"Your memorialists cannot but hope that this mode of settling international disputes, or some other of an equally pacific and purely moral character, will soon be adopted by all the nations of the earth, instead of having recourse to the barbarous and unchristian practice of war.

"Your memorialists are firmly persuaded, that the course of procedure which they thus venture to recommend, would yield you the highest satisfaction, and secure that state of settled and permanent peace which you cannot but ardently desire; and allow us to suggest, in conclusion, that any sacrifice which such course may involve, is trivial indeed when compared with the dreadful calamities inseparable from war."

The Memorial to the English Government expresses the satisfaction with which the Society has learned that friendly meditation between the two contending powers has been once and again offered. It also submits "to the Right Honorable Members of Her Majesty's Government, whether the renewal of their proffered meditation be not very desirable, accompanied, it may be, with a recommendation that, should this mediation not be accepted, they will submit the matters in dispute to the arbitration of some other friendly power or powers."

The Memorials addressed to the King of the French, the Emperor of Austria, the Emperor of Russia, the King of Prussia, the King of the Netherlands, the King of the Belgians, and the King of Sweden, are all alike. They earnestly invite those monarchs to recommend, in a spirit of friendship and love, to the belligerent powers, a total and immediate suspension of hostilities, and the adoption of vigorous measures to decide whatever points of dispute there may be, by moral and pacific means alone; by mutual negociation, if possible; and, failing in this, by referring them to the arbitration of one or more friendly powers.

This movement of the London Society shows how earnestly the friends of peace in the Old World desire the cessation of the war with Mexico. We cannot doubt that their appeals will have an influence to create hostility to war in general, and in that way perhaps hasten the termination of our own most unnecessary and unjustifiable conflict.

NEWS FROM OUR MISSIONARIES.

The following private letter from Bro. Carpenter to the Editor, came to hand since the publication of our last paper. It contains a great deal of matter which will interest all of our readers, and we therefore make it public:—

On board Ship Houqua,
STRAITS OF SUNDA, March 25, 1847.

Through the tender mercies of our God, we have been highly favored, thus far, on our voyage. Not only have we been preserved from a watery grave, but our health is good. Mrs. Wardner's health is much improved. We have been now seventy-eight days from New York, and we expect to see Java-head before night. I must hasten to give you a brief account of our voyage. As you left us, near Sandy Hook, falling quickly in the rear of the expert Houqua, and while the sound of Heber's thrilling strain had scarcely died away upon the breeze, and we were making a bold stand for the open sea, we went down into the cabin to make ready for sea-sickness. But in less than five minutes, several of us gave convincing proof of having been taken by surprise. The next five days, I shall denominate, in regard to myself, the period of irresolution. The wind that was briskly bearing us off when you left us, continued with unabated strength, until the third night, when it increased to a hard gale, and the ship lay to. While we were all in our berths, but not asleep, the stove, containing a good quantity of white-hot coal, made a leap to leeward, spilt out the coal, and sent the tea-kettle full of boiling water into one of the state-rooms. But no harm was done. The sea continued rough for several days. The first week was far more trying than any we have passed through since. By sea-sickness, and the constant exertion required to keep our balance, we became somewhat reduced in strength. While passing through this ordeal, we were compelled to feel for the foundation of our hope, to ascertain afresh whether it were built upon the sand, or upon the Rock of Ages. On our first Sabbath, and at the same time with the assembling of our brethren at home, we assembled in Bro. Wardner's room to ask mercies of the God of heaven. After the reading of the 28th and 29th Psalms, which never appeared so precious to us before, we bowed our spirits before the throne of our Father, and felt his hand strengthening us. The belief that our brethren were engaged, the same hour, in prayer for us, and for those to whom we are sent, added much to our comfort. And this morsel we specially needed, just at that time. Our native land, our friends, and the churches redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, always dear to us, are doubly so now that we realize the vastness of the sea that rolls between them and us. True religion triumphs over all the obstacles of time and space, and brings the true-hearted near to each other. The grace of God gives a zest to friendship, which otherwise it could never possess. Often, as the stiff breeze has been wafting us along, I have taken my station on the quarter deck, while the mantle of night has been thrown around us, and enjoyed an indescribable kind of mournful pleasure in visiting, in imagination, the different sections of our beloved Zion, and in conversing with those whom I love in the truth, and whose voices have always sounded pleasantly in my ears. It was mournful to think of the improbability of ever hearing those voices again. At the same time it was a matter of joy and thankfulness that it was ever my privilege to become acquainted with such, and to have their sympathies.

We made a quick passage of twenty-nine days to Trinidad, a small island in lat. 21° S. and long 30° W. This we only saw by moonlight, at a distance of ten or twelve miles on our left. There is an authentic description of this Island, which states, among other things, that from one of its lofty rocks, there is a waterfall, whenever it rains hard, seven hundred feet in height. At another part of the Island, there is a bluff rock eight hundred feet high, through which there is a stupendous arched passage, 40 feet in breadth, nearly 50 in height, and 420 in length, through which the sea breaks, sometimes with a tremendous roar. The Island is only about six miles in circumference, and is, for the most part, destitute of vegetation.

From Trinidad we made a quick passage to St. Paul's Island, in the Indian Ocean, in lat. 38° 48′ S. long. 80° 19′ E. This also was done in twenty-nine days. We passed this also at a considerable distance, and in the night. Here are some hot springs, so near to some of the fishing spots, that they catch fish and throw them into the springs where they are soon cooked for the table.

Our route lay about two hundred miles to the south of the Cape of Good Hope.

Although there is much monotony in so long a voyage, yet we have not felt it to be tedious. Within the Tropics we have frequently been cheered with the sight of a shoal of flying-fish. These are about 9 inches in length. Their wings, when folded, resemble a lady's fan. Sometimes the little Portuguese man-of-war, a species of nautilus, has amused us very much, with their little sail spread to a stiff breeze, as though they were making a voyage around the world. Then the Bonitos, or skipjacks, as the sailors call them, have sometimes afforded us diversion as they would throw themselves quite out of water in their sports. These are perhaps four or five feet in length. Shoals of Porpoises have frequently chased us, apparantly desiring to try our speed. Sometimes they show great agility, leaping ten feet out of water, and turning summersets. A few days ago, March 21, in lat. 11° 39′ S. long. 101° 7′ E., we had a fair sight of a whale. He was, some of the time, within a very few rods of us. In the conscious pride of being monarch of the deep, he moved himself slowly and majestically through the water.

Of the feathered tribe we have had considerable variety. The most numerous have been the little Stormy Petrel, a bird smaller than a robin, which flies close to the surface of the water, now and then putting out its little webbed feet to touch the water, whence it seeks the food which the hand of its Creator has furnished for it. There were several species of birds nearly the size of the hawk. The Albatros is a huge bird, measuring from tip to tip of its wings, ten feet. They feed upon the squid, a species of radiated animal that sometimes attains an enormous size. Albatroses have been abundant. One bird, called the man-of-war-hawk, we saw yesterday. It is about the size of a goose. Another very singular bird has accompanied us some. It is called the Boatswain or marling-spike bird. It is mostly of a white color, with a long single feather perhaps two feet in length for its tail. The first one that approached us was when we had got within about a hundred miles of St. Paul's. And he saluted us, in the evening, with a loud voice, to let us know that we were drawing near the land. He was quickly responded to by the geese we have on board.

On the 12th of Feb., as they were hauling upon the fore-top-gallant-back-stay, the fall fall parted, and one of the men tumbled into the sea. The ship was under a good motion. In a moment all was excitement. But our excellent Captain was by no means disconcerted, though, of course, greatly excited, as the life of the man depended on his exertions. "Down with the helm! Back the mainsail! Lower away the boat!!" resounded through the air. The quarter-boat was soon manned and on its way to rescue the brave fellow from a watery grave. Although he was perhaps a quarter of a mile from the ship when the boat touched the water, James Ritchie was soon picked up, safe and sound. On this occasion John Moore stood at the helm. Six days afterward, while Ritchie was at the helm, Moore fell overboard. He had just stooped over the taff-rail to disengage some part of the rigging, and had been in that position but a moment, when a gust of wind, (breath of the Lord,) suddenly put the spanker-vang upon the stretch; this being under him, hurled him headlong into the deep. I saw the unhappy man as he fell, and when he came up, and cast an anxious look towards the ship. He was not a swimmer, the wind was nearly aft and strong, the sea rough, the quarter-boat could not be sent after him. A large box, the covering of the steering apparatus, was quickly thrown overboard. An effort was made to bring the ship about; but a squall coming up just at that moment, delayed this operation some minutes. Men were stationed high up in the rigging to look out. The ship was brought about as soon as possible, and a search made of two hours length; but no trace could be found of the man or the box. Before the squall he was out of sight, and was not seen afterward. With the wind behind him, he doubtless went quickly down into the sea; yea, he sank as lead in the mighty waters, and the billows swept over him. Thus with awful suddenness one of our number passed from our sight, through an ocean death-bed, to the shoreless ocean of eternity. This tragical event we regarded as a loud peal from the trump of God, bidding us all to be ready for our departure. Moore was a moral man, but not known to be religious. He was one of the most intelligent of the crew. A funeral discourse was delivered from Rev. 20: 13—"And the sea gave up the dead which were in it."

In our Bible Class we have had under consideration for two Sabbaths past the following question, viz: Is there evidence in the Scriptures that the Sabbath has been changed from the seventh to the first day of the week? Bro. Lord, our fellow voyager and missionary, took the affirmative, and occupied the greater part of the first session. His argument was divided into three general heads—1st. The legal argument; 2d. The apostolic argument; 3d. The argument or testimony of the Fathers. I replied to him, and on a sheet accompanying this you will find that part of my reply which relates to the law. I also examined his inspired and uninspired example; to which he made no reply. He did not think the discussion of denominational differences profitable.

Now, my dear brother, accept of a large share of love from all of us. The Island of Sumatra is in full view. I expect to leave this at Anjier, on the north-east part of Java. The Dutch Governor keeps a mail-bag for such purposes. We shall write again when we get to Hong Kong or Canton. Farewell.

S. CARPENTER.

 The reply to Mr. Lord's argument from the law, alluded to above, is in our possession, and will be published soon. It is a very candid and convincing article, the perusal of which has given us more pleasure than any thing of the kind we have read in a long time.

LATER AND BETTER.—Since the foregoing was in type, the ship Sea Witch has brought us farther letters from brethren Carpenter and Wardner, dated at Hong Kong, China, April 29th, which place they reached on the evening of the 27th, after a voyage of 112 days. Mr. Dean, the Baptist missionary visited them on board the ship, and in company with him they called upon Mr. Bush, the American Consul. After consultation, it was deemed advisable to remain at Hong Kong for a season, until they should determine upon their exact location for the future. Mr. Robert Strachn, a Scotch merchant, learning their business in China, generously offered them the use of a suitable house during their stay, rent free, or, rather, as his contribution towards the mission. Their goods were removed to this house on the 28th, and they had taken possession of it, in person, on the day the letters were closed. More in our next.

THE GERMAN SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.—A letter from one of the brethren at Snowhill, Pa., informs us that the spirit of persecution is still alive in that vicinity. On a recent Sunday, while some twelve or fifteen persons were at work on their farm, two persons came among them in the character of spies, to mark who were at work, and inform against them. But it is said that when they came before the Justice to enter complaint, he refused to take any action in relation to the matter. In this case, as in previous cases, the informers were of a low class, having no regard for any day as the Sabbath. Such persons, before starting on their tour of discovery, are in the habit of visiting the tavern, drinking freely, and so preparing themselves for their nefarious business. To talk of the disturbance which the labors of peaceable Seventh-day Baptists give these men is superlatively ridiculous. Any man whose eyes are half open can see that they are influenced by revengeful feelings or mercenary motives, but not at all by a regard for the sabbatic institution.

GOVERNMENT SLAVE AUCTION.—On the 13th of July, 1847, in the city of Washington, D. C., two Christian women were sold as slaves on the account of the United States Government. The Marshal's notice states that one negro woman, named Elizabeth, about the age of sixty years, and one negro girl, named Caroline, about the age of twenty years, had been seized and levied upon as the property of Henry Miller, and would be sold to satisfy Judicial No. 22, in favor of the Postmaster General, and Judicial Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, in favor of the United States, and against said Henry Miller. The sale took place as notified. There was a good deal of competition among bidders, but benevolence outbid selfishness, and these two women—professors of religion—were knocked down to some kind-hearted gentlemen at $530, which sum goes into the Treasury of the United States. A strange commentary this upon the doctrine of our nation's Declaration of Independence, "that all men are created free and equal," and have an "inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

SUNDAY IN NEW ORLEANS.—The New Orleans Commercial Bulletin says that the fourth of July was celebrated by the military with the customary salutes; but on account of its being Sunday, there was not the usual civic procession, nor quite so much display as common. The same paper complains that the national salute was fired at noon in Lafayette Square, at the very door of a church, during the administration of the communion, of which probably 800 or 1,000 persons were partaking, or were present as spectators. This, the editor thinks, was an unnecessary "mark of disrespect to religion, and to a numerous and respectable congregation"—particularly as it was a matter of no consequence whether the salute was fired half an hour sooner or later.

BROOKFIELD, N. Y., July 20th, 1847.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I observed in a late number of the Sabbath Recorder a notice that the American and Foreign Bible Society had appointed me one of its Vice Presidents. I was somewhat surprised at the information, as it is a well-known fact, that I have hitherto refused to coöperate with the above-named Society, in consequence of their connection with Slavery. If I could not (for the above reason) contribute to its funds, I certainly could not, without the most glaring inconsistency, hold any of its offices. I do therefore respectfully decline the honor tendered me by the Society.

REMITTANCES AND LETTERS FOR OUR MISSIONARIES.—In answer to inquiries which have been addressed to us, we may as well say, through the Recorder, that the Executive Board have not yet made a remittance to the missionaries, but expect to do so by a ship which is to sail from New York about the 10th of August. Meanwhile it is hoped that those having on hand money for the mission, or desirous of contributing towards it, will immediately forward their contributions to the Treasurer, A. D. Titsworth, Metouchin, N. J. Letters or parcels designed for the missionaries may be sent to the care of Geo. B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

AMERICAN BAPTIST FREE MISSION SOCIETY.—This Society has been in existence some four years. It is composed of Baptists of acknowledged Christian character, who are not slaveholders, but who believe that involuntary slavery, under all circumstances, is sin, and treat it accordingly. It has missionaries or colporteurs in Illinois and Wisconsin, and in the Island of Hayti. It is also looking forward to China and Africa as missionary fields. Its missionaries in Hayti are Rev. W. H. Jones, and wife, Rev. W. L. Judd, and wife, Miss Lake and Miss Young. The fourth Annual Report states that the receipts of the Society for 1846—7, were $4,575 53, while the expenditures were $4,077 86, leaving a balance in the Treasury of $497 67.

CHEERING.—The N. Y. Observer publishes an account of a recent revival in Hinsdale, Mass., during which about one hundred persons seem to have been brought into the kingdom of God, not a few of whom are in middle life, and two are more than seventy years of age. One result is that seventeen family altars have been erected where they never before existed. This has been brought about without any foreign aid or protracted meeting, but by faithfully applying the ordinary means of grace.

BAPTISM OF HENRY CLAY.—We published the account of Henry Clay's baptism as it went the rounds of the papers. But an article in the Episcopal Recorder corrects the statement respecting the manner in which the rite was administered. It says that he was "baptized" in the little parlor at Ashland, in the presence of a small assembly, consisting of the immediate family and a few family connections. "In the middle of the room stood a large center-table, on which was placed, filled with water, the magnificent cut glass vase, presented to Mr. Clay by some gentlemen of Pittsburgh. On one side of the room, hung the large picture of the family of Washington, himself an Episcopalian by birth, by education, and a devout communicant of the Church; and immediately opposite, on a side-table, stood the bust of the lamented Harrison, with a chaplet of withered flowers hung upon his head, who was to have been confirmed in the Church the Sabbath after he died—fit witnesses of such a scene. Around the room were suspended a number of family pictures, and among them the portrait of a beloved daughter, who died some years ago, in the triumphs of that faith which her noble father was now about to embrace; and the picture of the last son, who fell at the battle of Buena Vista."

ANOTHER ANTI-SLAVERY PROTEST.—The Morning Star, of June 30, contains a Protest against Slavery, by Free-Will Baptist Ministers of the United States. The names appended, amount to about 400. They say:—

"Believing, as we do, that the sympathy of no holy being in the universe can for a moment be given to this foul system, and that neither the principles of the gospel nor indications of Providence constitute the least apology for its continuance, we wish publicly to withdraw all implied or supposed voluntary political or moral support of this enormous evil. Our necessary and involuntary connection with the civil and social organizations now existing, which seems to give to each of us the character and reputation of the body unless by personal public dissent from their errors and crimes we throw the responsibility exclusively upon those who support the evils of which we complain, renders it more necessary for us to announce our unwillingness to sanction the system of slavery in any manner whatever. The view thus taken of this subject will render it perfectly inconsistent for us to give our suffrages or religious influence for the support of slavery.

"We therefore, by refusing to support slavery, its principles, or its advocates, and by withholding Christian and church fellowship from all guilty of the sin of slavery, and by remembering those in bonds as bound with them, would wish to wash our hands from the guilt of this iniquity."

If a man is not rising upwards to be an angel, depend upon it he is sinking downward to be a devil. He cannot stop at the beast. The most savage men are not beasts; they are worse, a great deal worse. [Coleridge.

General Intelligence.

WAR NEWS.

The rumors from the seat of war are so vague and contradictory, that it is difficult to make out any account of them. It is sufficient to say, that no decisive or important action has been reported during the past week. The peace mission of Mr. Trist does not seem likely to produce the desired result, the Mexicans claiming that our troops ought to be withdrawn before they can treat for peace. It is said that Gen. Scott has all his measures taken preparatory to moving on the Capital. Gen. Cushing has so far recovered from the accident to his leg as to be be able to walk. Eight American prisoners, escaped from the Mexicans, had reached New Orleans. The papers are publishing a deeply interesting narrative of the capture, adventures, sufferings, etc., of Major Gaines and Borland's party in Mexico.

Orange Riots.—The St. Johns (New-Brunswick) News of 14th inst. contains the particulars of a violent disturbance at York Point, on the anniversary of the Battle of the Boyne, which lasted three hours, and was put down by the military, after five or six persons had been wounded. It is the old quarrel, Protestant with Catholic, revived from obsolete Irish practice. The News of the 15th contains the following statement:

Woodstock and Fredericton were on Monday last the seats of tumult. In the former place some five or six lives were sacrificed, and upward of twenty persons were wounded, some supposed to be fatally. Monday, being the festival day for the Orange party, the Orangemen of Woodstock assembled to the number of 250, and walked in procession to Jacksontown, a distance of about two miles, to hear a sermon suitable to the occasion. Previous to marching, the party equiped themselves with fire arms, which were conveyed along in a wagon so as to be prepared for invasion. Thus men go to church to worship their God, and to hear the language of 'soberness and truth' from one of God's ministers, while without the portals of the church, these very men have the instruments of death in waiting, to carry out the most hellish of all purposes, viz: shooting down their fellow beings, after tantalizing them to deeds of daring. On their return homeward, the opposite party met them, and fired upon them; whereupon the Orange-men ran to their wagons, seized their guns, which had been already loaded, and fired at their opponents, and five of them fell dead, and a number of them received wounds. The fight now became general, and ended with the assaulting party retreating out of the town. A riot took place in Fredericton on the same day, but not of a very serious nature.

Remarkable Cave.—A correspondent of the Chronotype, writing from Jay, Vt., gives the following description:

We visited a cave located in a spur of the Green Mountains, famous in this vicinity as the 'Cogniac Den,' ('Cogniac' being the term used to designate counterfeiters,) and though I have visited most of the remarkable spots in New-England, I am fain to confess that this exceeds them all. It is composed of four compartments, the outer one being in the form of an Ellipse, 53 feet by 37, and 16 feet in hight; the second compartment is somewhat smaller than the first, and of a more irregular form, and so also is the third; the fourth is the grandest hall that ever I beheld, and of a circular form, the diameter of which is 321 feet, overarched by a magnificent dome, the extreme hight of which apparently exceeds the diameter of the floor; the walls are composed of brilliant iron ore, and the light of our birch-bark torches was reflected in a thousand hues, lighting the whole with the brightness of a summer's day. Theregularity of the walls could not have been improved by art. In this cave the notorious Burroughs carried on his illegal occupation for some years. The villain had a good eye for the beautiful, there is no denying that.

Hack Hire.—The Corporation of New-York have recently issued a circular, wherein are explicitly stated the rates of fare which the hack drivers are allowed by law to charge their passengers. For the benefit of all strangers visiting the City, we publish an abstract. For conveying a passenger less than one mile, 25 cents, and for every additional passenger, 25 cents each; for any distance over one mile, the fare is 20 cents. For conveying a passenger to Forty-second-st, remaining half an hour, and returning, $1; to Sixty-first-st, three quarters of an hour, and back again, $1 50; and to Eighty-sixth-st, remaining one hour and returning, $2. For conveying one or more passengers to Harlem, remaining three hours and returning, $4. Cab hire by the day, $5. For attending a funeral within watch district, $2; to Potter's Field, $3. These regulations have reference to hackney coaches, carriages and cabs.

Can it be Possible?—Immigration brings misery enough among us, and this we knew full well. But we did not know—we could not conceive—that such scenes as are recorded below, ever occurred in New York. The Tribune says:—

Yesterday, about noon, three women, poorly dressed, one of them shoeless, and two or three little children with them, passed up Fiftieth-st., from the Third avenue toward the burial ground. One of them held with her hand a plain coffin on the crown of her head, and the unhappy creature wept as though her heart would break. It was the coffin of her own infant boy or girl, perhaps 6 or 8 years old, and neither man nor boy, cart nor wagon, was near to aid her. Three weeks since a woman and her daughter, as it seemed to us, passed up with a coffined corpse of the infant of the latter—no attendants were there but the grand-mother, the weeping mother, and their dead babe. One day last week a plain dressed man, wearing a much-worn blue coat, was seen carrying on his back, all alone, the coffined body of his dead son, nine years old. He asked the loan of a spade, and got it, to dig his child's grave. The boy who went to get the spade for him asked why he was to dig the grave himself, to which the reply was, "Because I have no money to pay another."

Effects of Negro Emancipation.—The Trinidad Spectator says that the slaves constituted formerly the wealth of the planters; now, as free and remunerated laborers, they are the soul of our Island commerce, and, as such, are the wealth of the merchants. Let us look back at the commercial revolution which has taken place in Trinidad since the dawn of freedom. The signs of comparative wealth among the laboring people every where appear. The great change in their condition has greatly stimulated trade of every description. Mechanic trades of every class have increased a hundred fold above the lower order of society; these are rapidly rising in respectability and wealth, and promise at no distant day to act an important part in the internal trade and the affairs of the colony. In consequence of the possession of money by the people, our Island imports have increased to a most surprising extent, in the course of a few years.

SUMMARY.

A beautiful young woman, apparently about 20 years of age, and who gave her name as Mary Ann Lott, but subsequently as Catharine Morse, was taken up, in the upper part of New York, a few days since, in a state of insanity, and carried to Jefferson Market Police Court. She states that she is from Bordentown, New Jersey, where her mother at present resides. She had in her possession some $50 in cash, and from information derived from herself, a trunk, filled with very valuable clothing, was found at the hotel where she stopped. She is about 5 feet high, and rather delicately formed, with dark hair and eyes, and has certainly a cultivated mind, from her conversation at times when reason seems to have regained its throne.

Mr. Manual Alvarez, late American Consul at Santa Fe, describes the mineral resources of New-Mexico, in which he resided 20 years, as being varied and extensive. In a letter recently published in the St. Louis Reville, he states that on the east side of the Tandilla Monntains, there is plenty of gold dust, or grain but no workers with skill and capital, because no protection could be had. There are also silver mines and a bed of silver ore in the Namby Mountains —abundance of the richest iron ore and lead. Copper abounds every where, and coal is plentiful and of good quality in many places.

Rev. Mr. Willoughby, Church of England, died the other day at Montreal, of the ship fever, as did a young Catholic priest, (Rev. Pierre Richard,) whose benevolence led him to attend the emigrant sheds day and night till born down by the contagious disease. The small-pox has broken out in the troop-ship Apollo, in a form so aggravated that the departure of the 52d regiment for England is put off. Cardinal Acton, an Englishman, who managed the affairs of the Roman Catholic Church of Canada at Rome, died lately at Naples.

It is difficult to forsee to what perfection the manufacture of Glass may be brought, and to what purposes the article may yet be applied. The balance-spring of a chronometer is now made of glass, as a substitute for steel, and possessesa greater degree of elasticity, and a greater power of resisting the alternations of heat and cold. A chronometer with a glass balance-spring was sent to the North Sea, and exposed to a competition with nine other chronometers, and the result of the experiment was a report in favor of the glass-spring one.

A gentleman in Pittsfield, Mass., who has been residing and transacting business several years near Senora and Tepic, in Mexico, near the Pacific ocean, has returned, and has shown some specimens of gold and silver ore, from that country. One specimen is a rough piece of quartz not larger than a goose egg, in which pure gold is irregularly mixed, of the value of more than one hundred dollars! Some of the specimens of silver ore are equally rich.

The rate of postage from New York to Paris by the new line of French steamers is fixed as follows: For letters weighing one-quarter of an ounce, New York Post Office, one cent, New York to Havre twenty cents, Havre to Paris ten cents—total, thirty-one cents. The postage to England by the same route for letters weighing half an ounce is: New York Post Office one cent, New York to Havre twenty cents, Havre to the English shore two cents, and thence to its destination ten cents—total, thirty-three cents.

From various experiments which have been made within a few years, the evidence is becoming strong, that the best mode of building dwelling-houses, for combining cheapness, durability, solidity, warmth, and dryness, is with unburnt brick. A number of houses have been erected with great success with this material, at the village of Geneva, in western New York, within a few years, and their superiority has also been proved at Chicago.

On rapid streams, where there is no sailing or steamboating, if there is a rope stretched across the river, and a boat attached to it with a block and skiver in such a manner as to let the stern swing more clear of the rope than the bow, the current setting against the side of the boat pushes her ahead, across. By this contrivance and a large flat oar dropped on a pivot nearly at right angles with the keel to receive the force of the current, the boat is driven across with considerable speed.

The British and French Railroads must nett a vast deal of money. The incomes of certain railways for the first week in June last, were as follows: The London and North Western yielded $249,670—the Great Western, &c., $116,955—the Midland, Bristol and Birmingham $100,485—the Paris and Rouen $39,725.

Among the notices of recent patents there is one granted to Mr. Allen, of Cincinnati, Ohio, for a method of restoring fullness or roundness to the cheeks. The patentee claims as his invention, the restoring of hollow cheeks to their natural contour and rotundity by means of metallic bulbs, formed, fitted to, and secured in the mouth by a suitable attachment between the jawbones and the cheek.

A gentleman, leaving the Paterson cars in Jersey City on Wednesday morning, was robbed of his pocket-book, containing $400 in bank bills of the Paterson Bank. Luckily, however, the thief selected the wrong pocket, for in the other was a pocket-book containing $15,000.

The workmen of Louisville, Ky., have organized an "Industrial League," among other objects looking to the establishment of the ten hour system by law, and to the exemption from execution and sale for debt, of the mechanic's tools, and of two hundred dollars worth of household or other goods, to every citizen having a family in the State.

The New York Chief of Police has just made a report to the Mayor, from which it appears that there are in that city, 594 houses of prostitution, with 2,673 inmates; 166 police officers; 65 gambling houses; 11 mock auction shops; 215 junk shops, and 115 second hand clothing shops all receivers of stolen goods.

The Company for the construction of a Ship Canal around Sault St. Marie have disposed of most of their stock. Only $200,000 more are wanted. The distance is only 4,460 feet, and the fall 18 feet, to be overcome by two locks, 250 feet long and 60 feet wide. By this canal, the lake navigation is extended over 500 miles.

The Ellen, Capt. Hurd, one of the Grand Bank fishermen, belonging to Messrs D. & N. Scudder, arrived at Barnstable on the fourth with twenty-five thousand five hundred codfish! The Ellen has been absent short of three months, and returns full.

The house in which John Milton once resided, known as Birklin Manor-house, situated in the village of Horton, Bucks, about five miles from Windsor Castle and Slough, was recently put up at auction. The sum of two thousand and seven hundred pounds was offered for it, which was refused. The remains of the great poet's mother are deposited in the village church, near Birklin Manor-house.

The practical utility of Chalk as an article of fuel has been tested within the last few weeks, according to a Salisbury (Eng.) paper, and with the most satisfactory results. Surrounded with coal, it gives a strong heat and a clear fire, at half the usual expense; so that to the poor, in the Chalk districts, it must be an incalculable boon.

A toad, which was buried under a reversed flower pot, three feet beneath the surface of the ground, on the 14th June, 1846, was, on the 14th of last month, disinterred, and instantly commenced skipping about. Its mouth was closed up with a white skin, but its eyes were as sparkling as when, on that day twelve months, it was put below the ground.

The number of streets, avenues and places which intersect the City of New-York, is 375; of Banks, we have 33; Insurance Companies, 100; Periodicals, 50; Newspapers, 98; Miscellaneous Schools, 110; Moral, Benevolent and Literary Associations, 116; Consuls, 41; and Churches, 227.

Letters have been received, announcing the death, at Jerusalem, of Rev. Nathan W. Fiske, Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy in Amherst College. He died, it is stated, of cholera. Our readers will recollect that he was on a tour in the Eastern world for the benefit of his health—being afflicted with symptoms of pulmonary disease.

The contracts have been made for constructing the Hudson River Road, from the City to the line of Dutchess Co., including some of the most difficult sections of the route. This important enterprise is thus in full progress.

Hon. Rufus Choate, of Massachusetts, is to deliver an Oration at Coventry, Conn., on the 22d of September, on the anniversary of the death of Hale, who was hanged by the British, as a spy, during the Revolution.

The Quebec Mercury states the deaths at sea, and at Grosse Isle, up to June 30, at 4,095; to which may be added the deaths at Quebec and Montreal, this month, say 2,500 more —in all, 6,495. This estimate is doubtless under the truth.

The Albany Argus states that $590,858 have been received in Tolls at Buffalo to 15th inst. —an increase of $255,136 on last year in the same period. There is a like increase of $36,340 at Oswego, where $94,034 have been collected.

Mr. Abbott Lawrence has given $1000 to the Franklin Library Association of the City of Lawrence. Mr. L. is one of the most munificent patrons of public learning that distinguish the age in which we live.

We learn from the New-Haven Journal that Hon. Henry W. Edwards, late Governor of that State, is in a very debilitated condition, and is not expected to recover.

Of 432 deaths in the City last week, 210 were of children under five, being nearly fifty per cent of the whole.

But thirty-four years have elapsed since the first religious newspaper was started in the United States. Now there are upwards of a hundred of this character, published by the different Christian denominations, many of which have a very wide circulation.

According to a table compiled for the New-York Observer, the Austrian Leopold Society at Vienna, have in the last fifteen years and a half expended two hundred and ninety thousand dollars towards propagating the Roman Catholic faith in Canada and the United States.

The Dublin (Ireland) Evening Postsays, 'We have learned that there are at present upwards of two millions nine hundred thousand persons receiving rations, at the public expense, under the out-door relief system now in operation in this country!'

The fourth of July was celebrated with odes, speeches, &c., by the convicts of the Massachusetts State Prison. After these social entertainments, they partook of a good dinner in their cells.

Pittacus, one of the seven wise men of Greece, made a law, that every man who committed a fault, in a state of intoxication, should receive a double punishment.

Charles Coghlin was executed at Montreal a few days since, for the murder of Richard Oliver on the 22d of March last. His last words were: "Three cheers for the Queen—three for Dan O'Connell—three for the Green Isle—and the mercy of the blessed Saivour be with ye."

An excellent and cheap paint for rough woodwork is made of six pounds of melted pitch, one pint of linseed oil, and one pound of brick-dust or yellow ochre.

While the workmen on the Central Railroad were engaged in removing the earth in the deep cut north of Burlington, Vt., on Saturday last, a large mass of sand and gravel gave way and was precipitated upon them, burying four from five to six feet below the surface, and nearly covering two or three others. Those who were not entirely covered were released without having received any material injury; but their four less fortunate companions could not be extricated until life was extinct.

A most sad and painful spectacle (says the Memphis Eagle of the 27th ult.) was the public funeral in this city, on Saturday evening, of Lieut. Gill and his father, at one and the same time. Young Gill was a lieutenant in the first company of volunteers from Memphis, and fell with many others while gallantly advancing to the charge at Cerro Gordo. His father, Mr. Lyman Gill, grieved at his son's death, repaired to Mexico to bring hither his remains, and bury them among his own kindred in his own country. In returning home he sickened and died.

A festive party given by Lieut. Colonel Fitzmaurice, at his residence in Berkley street, Cheltenham, England, was shocked by the awfully sudden death of one of his guests, a young lady named Quinelar, who had formerly been governess in the family. The deceased had, after supper, danced a quadrille, and had just partaken of an ice, when she was suddenly taken ill, became insensible, and, though a medical gentleman was present as one of the party, she expired within a few minuets.

We learn from the Rochester Advertiser that the report of the loss of the schooner Merchant on Lake Superior, in a tremendous gale on the 13th ult. has been confirmed. She had on board seven passengers and a crew of seven. Capt. Brown, of the Swallow, commanded her.

We understand that letters were received by the last steamer, announcing the death of Rev. E. Bullard, Missionary of the Baptist Board, of cholera, at Maulmain, Burmah, in April last.

The coinage at the mint for the last six months, (namely, from the 1st of January to the 1st of July, 1847,) is $8,206,223—far exceeding the amount coined during any similar period of time since the Government was founded.

A young man at Belfast, Maine, Monday evening, was struck by the rod of a sky rocket upon the top and front part of his head, which passed down and came out under his chin, and there stuck. He died the next morning.

Mr. Atwood, the artist, who was sent on from Philadelphia to take a portrait of Gen. Taylor, has returned. His picture is said to be an excellent likeness.

DIED,

In Verona, N. Y., on the 1st inst., of consumption, Ahijah, son of A. Jones, Esq., in the 13th year of his age. His relatives became satisfied that he so fully apprehended the scheme of gospel salvation, as to believe to the saving of his soul. Only a little more than eight months have passed, since his sister, older than himself, fell by the same disease; but of them both, it is believed that the scriptures made them wise unto salvation.

Notice.—We are occasionally requested to discontinue papers where arrearages are not paid up. This is contrary to our rules, and cannot be done except in extraordinary cases. When we erase the name of a subscriber from our list, we have no longer any trace of him, or chance to collect our account against him. Hence the necessity of some such rule as we have adopted in common with most other newspapers. If subscribers wish to have their papers discontinued, it is very easy to do so, by paying up and ordering them stopped. But to expect us to discontinue papers, while accounts remain unsettled, is in a high degree unreasonable.

THE NEW HYMN BOOK.

At the last meeting of the General Conference, a Committee, consisting of Thomas B. Brown, Lucius Crandall, Wm. B. Maxson, Eli S. Bailey, Nathan V. Hull, and Sherman S. Griswold, was appointed to prepare and secure the publication of a Hymn Book suited to the wants of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Subsequently Mr. Brown, Chairman of the Committee, suggested a plan for the work, which received the unanimous and hearty approval of the other members of the Committee, and which he was requested by them to carry out. We are happy to state, that he has completed the duty assigned to him, and has prepared for the press a book which is believed by good judges to be equal in point of merit to any thing of the kind now extant. The copy is already in the hands of the printer, and the work will be published and ready for distribution on the 10th day of September next. It will contain above one thousand hymns, covering nearly six hundred pages of the size of the medium edition of "The Psalmist," now in use among the Baptists. It will be printed on fine paper, and upon stereotype plates prepared from entirely new type. In style of workmanship, it is intended that the book shall be inferior to none. To secure for it as general a circulation as possible, the price, in common leather binding, has been fixed at 75 cents per copy, or $9 per dozen. Copies will be put up in extra binding, with gilt edges, &c., to suit every variety of taste, at prices corresponding to the style.

The Publishers of the Book are desirous of learning what number of copies will be at once demanded, in order that they may regulate the size of the first edition by the demand. They request, therefore, that those in want of the work will give them as early notice as possible of the number they desire. Probably the best way to do the business will be for each society or church to appoint some person to ascertain how many will be wanted within its own bounds, and send on the order accordingly. The books will be ready for delivery, as before stated, on the 10th day of September, in time to supply at the Anniversary of the Missionary and Tract Societies in DeRuyter, all who may wish to obtain them in that way. To save uneasiness, no money will be required until the books are delivered; and to save loss, no books will be delivered except for the money or its equivalent. Orders for the books are now solicited, and should in all cases be accompanied with explicit information as to the way in which they may be sent. Those who wish to be sure of copies of the first edition, should send their orders as early as the 1st day of September. Address, "Utter & Champlin, No. 9 Spruce-st, New-York."

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE.

REV. J. T. HEADLEY, EDITOR.

The Christian Parlor Magazine, formerly under the care of Rev. D. Mead, commences its fourth volume under the editorship of Rev. J. T. Headley, author of "Napoleon and his Marshals," "Sacred Mountains," "Letters from Italy," &c. We hazard nothing in saying that this Magazine, so deservedly popular hitherto, is destined to fill a large place in public estimation; that it will not only maintain its present enviable distinction, but earn to itself a far higher popularity, and become the companion of many a circle to which it is now a stranger, gladdening by its presence, while it exerts an influence pure, elevating, and healthful. The Editor will bend his energies to make this the most popular Magazine of the day, and while he avails himself of articles from the best writers, he will draw freely from his own exhaustless store.

The design of the Editor and Publisher is to present a Magazine containing all the facination and interest of the lighter Periodicals, while at the same time it moves in a different path, and is not exposed to the same objections. It is issued monthly, containing 32 pages of original matter, printed on fine paper, in handsome covers, with a splendid steel engraving, and a beautiful colored flower, and music, to each number, and got up in every respect in the best style of the art, making a yearly volume of 384 pages, full of choice illustrations, and forming a handsome ornament to the Parlor Table, or a rich and valuable present to a friend.

☞ Price, two dollars a year. Three copies for five dollars

A few good, responsible agents wanted to circulate this work; to whom the best inducements will be offered.

From the Albany Evening Journal.

THE DYING WIFE TO HER HUSBAND.

BY GEORGE ASPINWALL.

Come nearer to me, William, come and clasp me in thine arms,
For the sight of thee, my loved one, even death of fear disarms;
Come nearer to me, William, come and fold me to thy breast,
And let my head be pillowed where alone it can find rest.

Go and call the children, William, go and call them from their play,
For I'm conscious, my own husband, that I'm hastening fast away.
Go and call the children, William, bid them gather round my bed,
And let me lay my feeble hand upon each infant's head.

O! forgive me, my beloved, for each harsh and hasty word,
For though my will was sometimes strong, I ever for thee cared—
O! forgive me, my heart's treasure, let my faults forgotten be,
And think alone upon my love, my burning love for thee.

You'll see me, William, will you not—you'll see me when in death?
You'll come and kiss my cold, cold brow, when gone my latest breath;
And, William, dearest William, when you lay me 'neath the sod,
Remember, though my body's there, my spirit is with God.

And bring the children, William, bring them sometimes to my grave,
In the church-yard's quiet shadow, where the weeping willows wave;
And tell them, dearest William, of the paradise above,
And bid them pray that we may meet within those realms of love.

THE WAGES OF WAR.

It was a few days after the news of Buena Vista—the very day that the mail brought the official list of the killed and wounded—we were seated in the office reading over the names with a sad curiosity, seeking out those with which we were of old familiar. McKee we remembered well—a dashing, daring, artillery officer; he was in the third when we knew him. But he married, left the service, engaged in business, and at the opening of the war, resumed the epaulets as Colonel of a Kentucky Volunteer Regiment. Brave fellow! none braver fell on that bloody field.

We were sorrowfully enough engaged in these thoughts, when a young woman entered the office. When we say young, we mean under thirty. She had a small girl by the hand—a beautiful little creature, about three years old. Both mother and child, (for such no one could doubt to be their relationship who observed their features,) were dressed with extreme neatness, though all the little elegancies of decoration were bestowed upon the child.

We just looked over the top of the paper to note these particulars, when, having been directed to us by the clerk, she came forward to our desk.

We handed her a chair, and, while we endeavored as well as we could to soothe her very apparent agitation, we were somewhat at a loss to account for its existence.

After a few minutes' conversation, we discovered the reason in the fact that she was a relative of a soldier in Captain ——'s company of artillery. This corps had been engaged, and we remembered had suffered very severely. She had been informed that the list of killed and wounded had arrived, and she had called to hear some intelligence of his fate.

She wished us to read over the names.

We again took up the paper, and proceeded to comply with her request. We shall never forget the expression of that woman's features as we read. Her agony was terrible. She was not unhandsome; but her face became ghastly pale, and her eyes looked unutterable despair, as she fixed them upon the child, who was playing with a newspaper, and laughing joyously in its heedless innocence. Her lips were colorless, the perspiration started on her forehead, and, as she lifted her hand to wipe the large drops away, we could see it trembling as though palsied.

The presentiment of evil had already almost broken her heart, and we knew that the relative must be a very near one.

She had avoided giving us her name, and, so soon as we found the list, appallingly long, which comprised the casualties of the designated corps, we began to read. We did not know when we would reach the fatal name, if at all, and at each individual we looked inquiringly in the woman's face. She said nothing, however, for some time, and we began to hope that the name was not down, when we read—

'John ——, sergent, KILLED.'

Such a scream! It was the wail of a broken heart. Only one—and then as still as death. That cry was ringing in our ears for a month. We immediately ran towards her, but she arose from her chair, motioned us her thanks, and without a word left the office. We had read to her the announcement of her husband's death. We did not do much service in the office that day.

The next morning, happening down on the wharf, we saw the woman and the little girl going on board the Cincinnati packet. She recognized us, and we spoke to her. She was crushed completely. She had grown twenty years older in as many hours. She informed us that she had resided with her husband in New York; that she was originally from the West; and, on his corps being ordered to Mexico, she determined to repair to her friends, and await the conclusion of the war. She had heard of the battle, and knew that Captain ——'s battery was engaged; and, on her arrival in Pittsburg, had been directed to the Journal office for further information. She arrived the very morning after the receipt of the list of killed and wounded.

We bade her good-bye. She continued her route to her girlhood's home, now desolate, as was all the world to her; and we to our daily business, a sadder man, indeed.

The little incident recorded above was recalled to our mind, on Saturday, by reading, in a western paper, the notice of the death of 'Mrs. Sarah ——, widow of John ——, a soldier killed in the battle of Buena Vista.'

It was our acquaintance—there could be no mistake. She had grieved herself to death for he husband. [Pittsburg Journal.

Buck Wheat.—In Germany this grain is called buel-weizen, which may be translated beech wheat, in consequence of its grains resembling in some measure, and in fact in a very near degree, the mast of the beech tree, being three-cornered like the beech-nut. We think our farmers, generally, labor under a sad mistake, in regard to this grain. In the first place, it has been supposed that it requires a poor and exhausted soil, and that it will not grow on lands that are rich, or in a condition to produce other grains. The very poorest portions of the farm, therefore, are generally selected for its culture, and the result is just what ought to be expected from such a course—an expenditure of time and cash, but no return.

MARRIAGE CUSTOMS IN SWEDEN.

Dr. Baird, in a late lecture delivered in Springfield upon foreign governments and the social customs of different nations, alluded particularly to Sweden, a land made recently quite familiar to us through the graphic writings of Frederika Bremer. The manners and customs of the Swedes he describes as being remarkably interesting, and some of them very peculiar. He instances most especially the ceremony of marriage, of which formality he gives the annexed singular account:—

When a young girl is to be married, she dresses herself in all her bridal garments, and places herself in the middle of the parlor, standing. A circle of bright lights are placed about her, and the groomsmen also come into the room, bearing each a brilliantly lighted chandelier. The doors and windows are then thrown open, and every one who chooses can come and see and criticise the bride as they please. Impudent fellows will walk about her, and besides criticising her appearance, which they do within her hearing, they will use some such expressions as, "Well, so and so is to be married at last; she has been long enough about it. I pity the man who marries her," &c. Females, too, will appear about her in masks, and make still more cutting and insulting remarks. After standing thus for an hour and a half, the ordeal is ended, the throng is dispersed, and the wedding takes place in the presence of the immediate friends of the parties. After a dinner party, the guests approach the hostess, who stands in the middle of the room, and each retnrus thanks. This beautiful custom prevails even among the simple peasant families. After the meal is over the children approach their mother, and, taking her by the hand, say, "Thank you, mamma." The guest, if one there be, merely says, "Thanks."

FAMINES.

In the year 272, the Britons were compelled to eat the bark of trees.

In 306, thousands of the Scots died from want of food.

In 310, 40,000 English perished from the same cause.

In 450, if we may believe Dufresnoy, so dreadful was the scarcity of food in Italy, that parents devoured their own children.

In 739, in 832, and in 954, England, Wales and Scotland lost thousands of their inhabitants by starvation. Famine again desolated these countries in the years 1087, 1195, 1251 and 1315. During the last visitation, horses, dogs, cats, and the most loathsome vermin, were greedily devoured. We find at intervals of time, six other seasons of famine, reaching down as late as 1795.

A most dreadful calamity of the same nature visited the Cape de Verds in the year 1775, when 16,000 persons died of starvation, and also in 1811, when some of the islands lost from one-third to one-half of their population.

In 1822, the potato crop proved a failure in Ireland, and the southern countries were involved in extreme distress. The province of Munster was in a state of actual starvation. Many persons committed misdemeanors which were punishable by confinement, that they might obtain the food of the prisons. Typhus fever followed in the steps of hunger, and many hundreds were swept away by disease.

CALAMITIES OF GENIUS.

Homer was a beggar; Plautus turned a mill; Terence was a slave; Boethius died in gaol; Paul Borghese had fourteen trades, and yet starved with them all; Tasso was often distressed for a few shillings; Bentivogolio was refused admittance into an hospital he had himself erected; Cervantes died of hunger; Camoens, the celebrated writer of the Lusiad, ended his days in an alms-house; and Vaugelas left his body to the surgeons to pay his debts, as far as it would go. In England, Bacon lived a life of meanness and distress; Sir Walter Raleigh died on the scaffold; Spencer, the charming Spencer, died forsaken and in want; and the death of Collins came through neglect, first causing mental derangement; Milton sold his copyright of Paradise Lost for fifteen pounds, at three payments, and finished his life in obscurity; Dryden lived in poverty and distress; Otway died prematurely, and through hunger; Lee died in the streets; Steele lived a life of perfect warfare with bailiffs; Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield was sold for a trifle, to save him from the gripe of the law; Fielding lies in the burying-ground of the English factory at Lisbon, without a stone to mark the spot; Savage died in prison at Bristol, where he was confined for a debt of eight pounds; Butler lived in penury; and died poor; Chatterdon the child of genius and misfortune, destroyed himself.

Improvement in the Ox-Yoke.—A farmer in Seabrook, Mass., has made the following very important improvements in the ox-yoke:—

The bows go through a slide which is fitted to a mortice in the yoke, which is made 3 or 4 inches longer than the slide, which will make it changeable 6 or 8 inches, which makes the difference between a long and short yoke. The mortice is made an inch wider at the bottom than at the top, with a groove in the center half an inch each side for the slide to rest upon, an iron bolt at each end of the mortice, and one in the center, which goes through a mortice in the slide and preserves the requisite strength. The slide is regulated by an iron hasp attached to it, and enters holes in the yoke half an inch apart, which makes it easily fitted to any yoke of cattle from a long to a short, and to give the advantage to either ox from half an inch to 6 or 8. It has been fully tested by using it two years. If one ox in a team should appear weak and unwell, it would seem cruel to oblige him to do an equal share of the work; remove the slide, give him 6 inches advantage, and your team need not lie by on that account.

New Discoveries in Asia Minor.—In the course of some researches which have been recently made at Lipsek, (the ancient Lampsacus,) in Asia Minor, a number of antique articles of gold and silver have been found; among them are, 1st, forty silver spoons, the bowls of which are nearly twice as long, wide and deep as our table spoons, and the handles also, proportionally longer than those in use at the present day, are square in form, and covered with Greek inscriptions, which are almost effaced, and which have not yet been deciphered. At the top, on each side of the handles of these spoons, is engraved a female bust, surmounted with the Artensis (Diana.) Each of these spoons weighs 40 drachms. 2. A round plate of silver of five feet in diameter, on which is engraved a female figure of the height of two feet, magnificently attired—about her are a fox, a peacock, and a parrot, and at her feet crouch two lions astride of which is a child. 3. A large plate in the form of a star with six angels, on which are engraved two female heads with flowing hair. 4. A silver stick of 2 metres 12 centimes length, and composed of four pieces soldered together. 5. Four large goblets of silver with handles, on which are sculptured in bas relief, female heads, all of different physiognomies. 6. A large cylindrical vase on three feet, ornamented with arbesques. 7. A flambeau of silver, with three feet, ornamented with arabesques, and armed at the top with a point. 8. A woman's necklace of gold, of beautiful workmanship, weighing 24 drachms. This necklace was set with forty large pearls, all of which crumbled to dust as soon as they were touched. Every thing leads to the supposition that the most part of them, if not all, belonged to a temple of Diana, a divinity, the worship of whom prevailed very much in the neighborhood of Lampsactus. The Turkish Government have sent to the spot two agents to examine these antiquities, and to carry on researches.

Fruits of the War.—The Jonesboro Whig has the following direct and sufficient answer to the question, "What harm has the War done?"

"Col. Wm. B. Campbell's 1st regiment of Tennessee volunteers numbered 1,000 brave men on the march to Mexico. Only 350, rank and file, of this gallant regiment, returned with their Colonel to their homes.

"Col Wm. T. Haskell's 2d regiment of Tennessee volunteers numbered 1,040 on their march to Mexico. Only 360 of these gallant men, rank and file, returned with Col. Haskell to their homes and friends—their wives and children—their fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, and other relatives and friends.

"The rest of them—thirteen hundred and thirty—sickness and bullets, disease and shot, and swords, have consigned to an early grave in a foreign land, from their native homes, without coffins and winding sheets, or headstones to tell who they are or where they are. Poor fellows! mournful and vacant are many loved homes and firesides; but the sleeping dead know it not. They repose beneath the burning sands of an inhospitable clime, promiscuously thrown together; and there they must rest in quiet till the last loud trump calls the nations of the earth to stand before the God of Armies!"

The Tomb of John Bunyan.—Bunyan was buried in Bunhill fields, where his tomb is often visited to this day. Not long since, a funeral took place there, which was attended, among others by the celebrated Dr. Maginn, for a long time, one of the most brilliant writers for Blackwood's magazine. As soon as the funeral was over, the doctor said to the sexton, "Grave-digger, show me the tomb of Bunyan!"

The grave-digger led the way, and was followed by Maginn, who seemed deeply thoughtful. As they approached the place, the doctor stopped, and touching him on the shoulder, said, "tread lightly." Maginn bent over the grave some time in a melancholy mood, deeply affected; at length in solemn tones, as he turned said, "Sleep on, thou prince of dreamers." The "dreamer" had lain there one hundred and fifty years, but no lapse of time has destroyed the spell which he still holds over the strongest minds. [Presbyterian.

A Gentle Hint.—Some years ago, before the introduction of the Croton water, a wealthy citizen of New York had occasion to send his coachman for a pail of water. John refused to fetch it, alledging that it was not his business, but that of the house-maid.

"And pray; what do you understand to be your business?" rejoined his master.

"To take charge of the horses, and drive the carriage, sir."

"Well, do you harness the horses directly, and bring the carriage to the door."

When the carriage drove up, its owner ordered Mary, the house-maid, to take her pail and get in, and the fastidious coachman was compelled to drive her to the pump—stop for her to fill her pail—and then drive her back again!

The lesson, it is needless to say, was never forgotten. [Anglo Saxon.

Premonition of Death.—Lord, be pleased to shake my clay cottage before thou throwest it down. May it totter awhile before it doth tumble. Let me be summoned before I am surprised. Deliver me from sudden death. Not from sudden death in respect of itself, for I care not how short my passage be, so it be safe. Never any weary traveler complained that he came too soon to his journey's end. But let it not be sudden in respect of me. Make me always ready to receive death. Thus no guest comes unawares to him who keeps a constant table. [Fuller.

In Brooklyn, sometimes called the "City of Churches," and in Williamsburgh, there are at the present time no less than seven grain, three molasses, and five rectifying distilleries! These seven grain distilleries are all in successful operation now, with one exception, and that will fire up in a few weeks. They work up at present about 2,200 bushels of grain daily, which yield about 1,000 gallons of whisky, and feed about 4,000 cows. This, however, is only one-third of the capacity of these distilleries for making whisky; when they are working at a profit they can turn out about two-thirds more. The rum distilleries, we are told, work up twenty hogsheads of molasses daily, and the rectifiers turn out about 12,000 gallons each per week—making 60,000 gallons!

VARIETY.

The National Intelligencer contains a beautiful description of the wild and romantic scenery of the Saguenay River, between Hudson's Bay and the St. Lawrence—many of the bluffs are 800 to 1500 feet perpendicular, chiefly of granite, and some of them lean over upon the river, which in many places is 1,000 feet deep, and seldom less than 100 feet. Awful beyond expression is the appearance of these rocks—a mass of granite weighing perhaps a million of tons hanging over the traveler's head, as if ready to fall and crush him. The river abounds with salmon, seals, and other fish, and at 150 miles north of the St. Lawrence there is a lovely lake 40 miles long, called, St. John's

About a year ago a cargo of 500 broomsticks arrived at London from a port in Germany, and not being claimed by the consignee, were conveyed to the Qneen's warehouse attached to the Custom house. Last week, one of the sticks was accidentally broken, when lo! it was found to be partly hollow, and to contain a considerable quantity of manufactured tobacco. The top of each pole had been perforated—the tobacco pressed in and secured with a peg, which, smoothed over, gave all the appearance of solidity.

A lawyer at a circuit court in Ireland dropped a ten-pound note under the table, while playing cards at an inn. He did not discover the loss until he was going to bed, but then returned immediately. On reaching the room, he was met by the waiter, who said, 'I know what you want, sir; you have lost something.' 'Yes; I have lost a ten-pound note.' 'Well, sir, I have found it, and here it is.' 'Thanks, my good lad; here's a sovereign for you.' 'No, sir; I want no reward for being honest; but,' looking at him with a knowing grin, 'wasn't it lucky that none of the gentlemen found it?'

Formerly an enormous tax was laid on the salt used by the British people, which the Government was at length compelled to relinquish in a great measure. Not so in India. The London Mining Journal shows that many millions of dollars are exacted from the wretched population of India by reserving to itself, (as the old Kings did in France,) the sole monopoly of supplying fifty millions of people with salt, which it does of a very impure quality.

Dr. Baird, in his lecture, on Thursday evening, mentioned a singular fact concerning the Greek Church, viz: that the priests are required to be married men, and whenever a wife dies, the priestly office ceases until he is married again. They claim authority for this in the Scripture, which reads, "A bishop must be blameless, the husband of one wife." In the Armenian Church this rule is extended so as to require that a priest shall also be the father of one child.

The difference between rising every morning at 6, and 8, in the course of forty years, amounts to 20,000 hours, or 8 years, 121 days and 10 hours, which will afford eight hours a day for exactly ten years: so that it is the same as if ten years were added to a man's life, in which he could command eight hours each day for the cultivation of his mind and heart.

The Scientific American says that we have in our city the American Patent Steam Ice Cream Co., which, with an engine of ten horse power, is in full operation, manufacturing every discription of this much sought for article in the summer months, from the quality which is retailed to the newsboys for a cent a glas full, including the use of a spoon, to the costly quality which can be seen on the tables of the "upper ten."

A writer in the True Sun, recommends the following mixture for the Summer Complaint with children:—Two drachms rhubarb; half drachm salts of wormwood; one ounce paragoric; seventy drops essence peppermint, and eight ounces water. Dose for a child two years and upwards, a dessert spoonful, twice a day, or oftener, if required; and for an infant, a teaspoonful.

A patent has been taken out, in England, and one is to be secured in the United States, for a new invention, which on being attached to the ordinary kitchen, or other fire, will produce a continuous and sufficient supply of gas to any extent. The apparatus is of such a simple construction that it can be attached as an embellishment to kitchen ranges, stoves, parlor grates, steam engine furnaces, &c.

All the gold ever discovered in the new world, says the Mining Journal, would not fill half of a Paris shop-keeper's drawing-room. The annual value of the gold mines of the United States is $1,200,000; of the gold and silver mines of Mexico $20,000,000; ditto Peru $51,000,000, (chiefly in silver;) of New Grenada $3,500,000; Brazil (gold only) $1,700,000.

A German priest was walking in procession at the head of his parishioners over cultivated fields, in order to procure a blessing upon the crops; when he came to one of unpromising appearance, he would pass on, saying, "Here prayers and singing will avail nothing; this must have nature."

A curious pamphlet has been published in Paris on the private wealth of sovereigns. It shows that Louis Philippe, (who was once permitted, in charity, to share the bed of a stage driver at Salem, Massachusetts,) is now unquestionably the richest individual in the world.

THE DAILY NATIONAL WHIG is published in the city of Washington, every day, at three o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted, and served to subscribers in the City, at the Navy Yard, in Georgetown, in Alexandria, and in Baltimore, the same evening, at six and a quarter cents a week, payable to the sole agent of the Whig, G. L. Gillchrist, Esq., or his order. It is also mailed to any part of the United States for $4 per annum, or $2 for six months, payable in advance. Advertisements of ten lines or less inserted one time for 50 cents, two times for 75 cents, three times for $1, one week for $1 75, two weeks for $2 75, one month for $4, two months for $7, three months for $10, six months for $16, one year for $20, payable always in advance.

The "National Whig" is what its name indicates. It speaks the sentiments of the Whig party of the Union on every question of public policy. It advocates the election to the Presidency of Zachary Taylor, subject to the decision of a Whig National Convention. It makes war to the knife upon all the measures and acts of the Administration deemed to be adverse to the interests of the country, and exposes without fear or favor the corruptions of the party in power. Its columns are open to every man in the country, for the discussion of political or any other questions.

In addition to politics, a large space in the National Whig will be devoted to publications upon Agriculture, Mechanics, and other useful arts, Science in general, Law, Medicine, Statistics, &c. Choice specimens of American and Foreign Literature will also be given, including Reviews, &c. A weekly list of the Patents issued by the Patent Office will likewise be published—the whole forming a complete family newspaper.

The "Weekly National Whig," one of the largest newspapers in the United States, is made up from the columns of the Daily National Whig, and is published every Saturday, for the low price of $2 per annum, payable in advance. A double sheet of eight pages will be given whenever the psess of matter shall justify it.

The Memoirs of General Taylor, written expressly for the National Whig, are in course of publication. They commenced with the second number, a large number of copies of which have been printed, to supply calls for back numbers.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; a number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

THE SABBATH AFFECTED BY THE EARTH'S MOTION.

[From James A. Begg's unpublished work on the Sabbath—Section v.]

[Concluded.]

But the objection we are considering has reference not merely to the effect arising from difference of longitude, but also to that arising from difference of latitude. It has been said that at the Poles there is in the year only a day and a night, each of six months duration, and that consequently there can be no weekly Sabbath, nor can the fourth commandment be obligatory there.

This objection is, we suppose, an enlargment of that of Bishop White, of the 17th century, who puts it in this form: "In many regions of the world, and under sundry climates, there are no ordinary weeks containing seven particular days, distinguished each from other by morning and evening, and by the rising and setting, and by the presence and departure, of the sun. Therefore, the Sabbath day of the fourth commandment cannot be observed in many regions of the universal world, by such nations as live under a climate where there are no such weeks and days as the law of the fourth commandment enjoineth to be observed." He gives the following latitudes of places:—

"70°. In the Southern part of Groineland, Finmarke, Lapland, and in the North of Russia and Tartaria, one day lasteth from the 10th of May unto July 14, sixty-five of our days.

"75°. In the North of Groineland, the Isle of Chery, Nova Zembla, Lancassters, and Horse-sounds: the day continueth from April the 21st, until August the 2d, of our days one hundred and two.

"80°. In the North of Baffin's-Bay and Greenland; the day continueth from April the 6th, until August 17th, of our days one hundred and thirty-three.

"85°. In regions and places undiscovered, the day continueth from March 23d, until August 31st, of our days one hundred and sixty-one.

"90°. Under this degree, the day continueth from March the 10th, until September the 13th, of our days one hundred and eighty-seven.—Treatise of the Sabbath, p. 178.

We will not stop to speculate on what may be found at the Poles, should God ever permit the arduous adventurer to reach these objects of scientific ambition. The possibility of their approach remains yet to be proved, (although another attempt to do so has just been proposed;) and it will be time enough to discuss the bearing of the Creator's Sabbath law upon the inhabitants of these regions when it shall have been proved that there are any.

Meanwhile, we observe that all experience in lower latitudes, tend to destroy our confidence in the Bishop's calculations, by falsifying that portion of his theory which relates to them. Inhospitable as Greenland is, it has been satisfactorily ascertained in our own day, that even there the law calling men to remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy, is not an impossibility. Our own countrymen have reached the latitudes named by the objector in relation to that land, and they have recorded their experience without seeming to have been aware or even to suspect their Sabbathless condition. In this instance, facts make fictions of the bishops speculations.

In the year 1822, Mr. William Scoresby, junior, commander of the ship Baffin, (now, we believe, a minister of the Gospel,) sailing from Liverpool, passed along the east coast of Greenland till he reached not merely latitude 70°, but even to 80° 31′. Now, what is the evidence which his journal of this voyage to the Northern Whale Fishery furnishes on the point in question? Exactly the opposite of that which our objecting friends so dreaded or deplored, and which all, but specially they, ought to prize. Mr. Scoresby is evidently a Christian, and one who has a truer and far higher reverence for Sunday than most men bearing the Christian name, and was much more than usually attentive to secure Sunday observance, by all under his command. "Divine service on board," is regularly noted. Even before leaving our own shores, we read, "In the evening, we had also our usual religious exercises with the apprentices, consisting of reading the Bible, singing, and prayer," and where there was not a church near, a boat was sent ashore inviting any of the villagers on board "who might be disposed to join us in our usual divine service." pp. 5, 12.

While regretting deeply the ignorance of God's revealed will which led this brother to confound Sunday with the Sabbath, we rejoice in the evidence of a true and living faith which his work affords. Proceeding with him upon his voyage, we find that in latitude 68° 45′ N., "on Sunday the 21st of April," they had a hard gale directly against them; but being fully prepared for it "had divine service, as usual, morning and afternoon, with the religious exercises of the apprentices in the evening." p. 22.

On the 25th of April they were in latitude 75° 5′, and afterwards he writes, "We continued to approach the Pole in a sea clear of ice to the N. W. and W., until one in the morning of Sunday the 28th, when, in latitude 80° 30′, we were stopped by the main northern ice." "Here," he adds, "we remained, standing off and on or lying-to the most of the day, with the intention, after the conclusion of the Sabbath, to proceed to the eastward, along the northern face Spitzbergen." pp. 24, 29.

Again, May 11th, "Our latitude was 79° 58′. The next day being Sunday, our researches were suspended, for the usual observance of divine worship." "May 13th—Immediately after the conclusion of the Sabbath, we hove to, reefed the top-sails, and took in all unnecessary sails." p. 48. In latitude 75°, Sunday, June 2d—several whales were seen during the afternoon and evening; and the Altona was observed to have all her boats in chase. The harpooners were so tantalized by seeing whales in considerable numbers which they were not allowed to pursue, that I was obliged to order them from the mast head, and to run the ship out of the way." p. 72. In latitude 73°, June 23d, "Being Sunday, we rested. We had public worship as usual." p. 127. In latitude 72°, July 14, "Being Sunday, we remained as nearly stationary as the crowded state of the ice by which we were enveloped would permit, for the purpose of honoring the Sabbath, and giving all hands an opportunity of joining in public worship and spending the day in religious exercises." p. 147.

These extracts form a fair specimen of the records of northern summer Sundays, which are noted as regularly in these high latitudes as they ever are, or can be, in more temperate climes. Other days' transactions are noted with the same distinctness, proving abundantly that although the sun did not set to them below the horizon, for a period of three months, still there was no difficulty in their distinguishing day and night in their regular succession. Their careful and constant observance of Sunday is of itself the best evidence in disproof of the Bishop's notion of the impossibility of sanctifying the Sabbath in those regions. The objection we have been considering, never seems indeed to have been present to Mr. Scoresby's mind; but, even if the very object of the voyage had been its confutation, it could scarcely have been more effectually accomplished than when, at the close of his journal, under date, "Sunday 15th of September," he says, "We had divine service as usual. It is a little remarkable, that during the whole of the voyage, no circumstance ever occurred to prevent us engaging in public worship on the Sabbath day; in a few instances, the hour of worship could not exactly be kept, but opportunity was always found of having each of the services in succession, on the plan adopted at the commencement of the voyage." p. 382.

We now adduce another witness. In 1818, Sir John Ross explored the northern extremity of Baffin's Bay, and therefore, although not in quite such high latitudes as we have seen Mr. Scoresby attained, came but little short of him. In latitude 63° 53′, on Sunday, May 31st, we read, "This day the church service was performed, and a sermon read as usual." Voyage of Discovery, vol. I. p. 26. In latitude 66° 22′, on Sunday, June 7th, "The day was marked with the customary observance of divine worship." Ibid. p. 37. In latitude 70° 35′, on June 21st, "It being Sunday, divine service was performed." Ibid. p. 58. In lat. 75° 35′, "On Sunday, July 26th, divine service was performed, and a sermon, as usual, read to the ship's company." Ibid. p. 85. In latitude 75° 57′, August 16th, "After divine service, we had a good meridian altitude of the sun." Ibid. p. 155. In latitude 76° 37′, Sunday, August 23, "Soon after divine service, a breeze sprung up from the southward." Ibid. p. 219. In latitude 74° 19 1-2′, Sunday, August 30, "Divine service was performed." In latitude 65° 30′, Sunday, Sept. 27th, "After divine service the ship's company were mustered, and their clothes inspected." Ibid. vol. II. p. 43.

Both of the northern voyages already referred to, in proof that the Sabbath can be distinguished in high latitudes, it is true, were performed principally during the summer, and therefore while the sun was mostly above the horizon. But they abundantly prove that in such circumstances, at least, there is no difficulty in distinguishing one day from another, and that the worship observed upon Sundays could have been maintained on Sabbath.

We have, however, other important evidence. Sir John Ross, our last-adduced witness, in a Second Voyage in Search of a North-West Passage, spent four winters, chiefly in latitudes about 70°; and his journal still abounds with testimony quite in point for our present purposes. On July 5th, 1829, they entered Davis' Straits, and on the 26th of the same month, at the Danish Settlement of Holstein, being Sunday, Sir John "attended the church with the Governor," having joined in worship with the Esquimaux. Narrative, pp. 43, 75. On August 2d they were in latitude 74° 18′, and being Sunday, he says, "Divine service was performed, and the remainder of it was made, what we always wished, a period of rest." p. 85.

Passing now to the sunless days of winter, we find that the absence of that luminary makes no such alteration in their arrangements as objectors to the universal observance of the Sabbath would lead us to expect. The events of every day are journalized in the absence of the sun, much in the same way as when he shone out most brilliantly. Dimmer days they were, indeed; but although it was but a twilight, there is no intimation of any interruption of their plans or purposes having been occasioned by that circumstance. Nov. 16, "The Sunday was spent as usual. The sun had not been seen yesterday, and neither sun nor moon was visible this day." p. 221. But although the sun should have disappeared for the winter, still on Dec. 1st its upper limb was again seen, by refraction. p. 227. On the 26th of the same month, when the sun never rose above the horizon, Sir John still speaks of it as "a calm and clear morning;" and four days after, "There was very good light during the day from ten till half after three." pp. 232, 233. And on the 3d of January, 1830, "It was Sunday, and spent as usual." p. 240.

At Boothia Felix, in latitude 70°, Sir John met a party of Esquimaux natives, amounting in number to thirty-one. The appearance of these people, he remarks, was very superior to that of the ship's company, "being at least as well clothed, and far better fed." "And if the moralist is inclined to speculate on the nature and distribution of happiness in this world, on the admirable adaptation found here, as elsewhere, between the desires and the means of gratification, the pious one will not forget the Hand which, under the most apparently hopeless circumstances, thus spreads for His creatures a table in the wilderness." pp. 245, 248.

On the 20th of January, the sun reappeared at noon, the first time for the season; and the remark appended, well deserves the attention of such objectors as those with whom we are at present contending, who regard this as a climate in which no Sabbath can be enjoyed: "The gale abated to-day, and the weather became settled and clear. Commander Ross and the surgeon paid a visit to the native village, and were amused by an exhibition of singing and dancing. The sun appeared for the first time, after an absence of fifty days, being about half its diameter above the visible horizon; so that we might have seen the upper limb before, as we had calculated, had the sky been sufficiently clear. That, however, which gave us pleasure, had no such effect on the Esquimaux, to whom the night of this region is their day; or to which it is, at least, far preferable, since it is of far more value to them in hunting the cunning and cautious seals. For this reason, they always returned home when the day broke; complaining of the light as their enemy, and as the cause of a compulsory, not a wilful idleness." p. 268.

The objection speculatively advanced by theological controversialists, is thus found in experience to have no foundation. The day's transactions, Sabbath and Sunday, are noted by the adventurous discoverer alike minutely when the sun is below as when it is above the horizon. Doubtless, those in such circumstances are less incommoded by diminished light, than they would be if only occasionally subjected to the deprivation. The eye by the prolonged twilight adapts itself to, and thus becomes fitted for it. He who made man's eye clearly sees; and He who said, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," has not placed the creature in circumstances in which obedience is impossible. Such an idea in connection with Polar scenes seems never once to have presented itself to the mind of Ross; but if it had, no better confutation of the fallacy could have been adduced than is furnished in his regular notings of the every-day life of himself and others placed in the very condition which has so often been pointed to as beyond the reach of a Sabbath's blessing.

EASTERN CUSTOMS.

"Early next morning, we settled accounts (at Damietta) with the Egyptian donkey-men who had brought us thus far on our journey; soon after which the Consul's Janissary, dressed in white, with red shoes, came in to invite us to our forenoon's repast. We then found that it is the custom in the East, to send for the guest when the feast is prepared, saying, 'Come, for all things are now ready.' The Consul was sitting as usual in the corner of his divan, along with some Egyptian friends, among whom was the Governor of the province—a rough looking man, with a grisly beard, snow-white turban, and piercing eye. After the repast, the servants carried round a brazen basin, and out of a jar poured water on the hands of every guest. We remembered Elijah pouring water upon the hands of Elisha. (2 Kings iii. 11.) Returning again to the hall, and squatted once more upon the divan, coffee was brought in very small cups, each cup being enclosed in a small silver case. The long pipes were next carried in by six attendants. Each servant stood at a reverent distance, and kept his eye fixed upon the hand of the guest whom he was serving, watching the slightest motion. This visibly recalled the allusion in the Psalms, 'Behold, as the eye of servants look unto the hands of their masters, so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God,' &c. (Ps. cxxiii. 2.)

"About the door of the Consul's house were many poor and diseased, hanging about in expectation of getting help from those who visited him. We remembered Lazarus laid at the rich man's gate. At dinner we were still more interested in observing a custom of the country. In the room where we were received, besides the divan on which we sat, there were seats all around the walls. Many came in and took their place on those side seats uninvited, and yet unchallenged. They spoke to those at the table on business or the news of the day, and our host spoke freely to them. This made us understand the scene in Simon's house at Bethany, where Jesus sat at supper, and Mary came in and anointed his feet with ointment; and also the scene in the Pharisee's house, where the woman who was a sinner came in uninvited and yet not forbidden, and washed his feet with her tears. We afterwards saw this custom at Jerusalem; and there it was still more fitted to illustrate these incidents. We were sitting around Mr. Nicolayson's table, when first one and then another stranger opened the door and came in, taking seats by the wall. They leaned forward and spoke to those at the table. Now in the case of the woman that was a sinner, Christ is dining at the Pharisee's table. As the feast goes on, the door opens, and a woman enters and takes her seat by the wall just behind him. The Pharisee eyes her with abhorrence; but as custom permits it, he does not prevent her coming in. After a little time, as Jesus is reclining with his feet sloped toward the back of the couch, the woman bends forward, pours her tears on his feet, and anoints them with precious ointment."—[Narrative of a Mission of Enquiry to the Jews, 1839.

FAREWELL TO THE SHIP HOUQUA.

Inscribed to her honored and worthy Commander, Capt. T. D. Palmer.

Now fare thee well!—spread thy white wings forth,
And haste, noble ship, to thy home in the North;
But thou wilt awaken fond memories there,
Of the loved, and the lost, and the dwellers afar.
They will hasten to meet thee, who trustingly cast
Dear treasures, with thee, on the ocean's breast;
And some, they will welcome with usury back,
While others, alas, have no homeward track.

And there will be pictured, at memory's beck,
A sad, fond scene on thy crowded deck,
When they met, who will meet upon earth no more,
And parted, whose partings will soon be o'er;
The sighs, that were wreathed with hope's best smile,
And tears, whence the rainbow gleamed out the while,
And hopes, that were symboled, good ship, by thee,
Unmoored from earth's soundings, thrown out on the sea,
To the prospering breath of the Unseen given,
Steered only by eyes that are fixed on Heaven.

So be it ever—each thought of thee,
A gem in the casket of memory.
We have had our sorrows—they past away;
We had our joys, but they might not stay;
And lights, and shades, have the wanderers felt,
Since last by their fathers' hearth they knelt.

We saw the brow of the angry storm
Smile out when kissed by the sunbeam warm,
And sink to its quiet and breeze-like rest,
Like maddened Saul, by the minstrel blest.
We saw the troubled waters rise,
A crystal shaft, to the bending skies;
And many a night, and many a day,
We roamed where the Porpoise and Dolphin play;
Where the monarch of the finny tribes,
Rolls back the white spray from his rugged sides;
Where the Albatros stretches his tireless wing,
Or sleeps on the wave in his wandering;
Where the Stormy Petrel and Sea Gull come,
And dip their plumes in the crested foam.

We stood on old Ocean's topmost height,
Where both pole-stars challenged the wondering sight,
And the waves seemed beating each starry strand
Where earth's unshaken pillars stand,
On either side grasped by her outstretched hand.
Again we behold, and strange bright stars
Look down from our zenith; the high sun wears
Unwonted bearings; his noon-tide ray
Casts our shadow southward—how far we stray!

Lo! the spicy breeze from a sunny land,
And our bounding steps press a coral strand.
We stray where the children of nature rove,
Where the orange-tree skirteth the plantain grove,
Where the banian nurseth her pendant stems,
And we sighed to view, by the gushing stream,
The strange oblation in blindness laid
On a heathen shrine in the cocoa's shade;
And our hearts went up to Him whose hand
Has won bright gems from a heathen land,
For the shadows of death to be swept away,
And Java redeemed by the gospel ray.

'Tis past! thou wilt shelter our heads no more;
We pass from thy decks to a foreign shore,
Thou hast been a bright link in the lengthened chain
That bound us with dear ones beyond the main;
That link is severed, but love guards well
The wires, that thrill to its wakening spell,
Nor fears, with a whole broad world between,
The cankering rust;—but go—we have seen
The "Celestial Empire" heave in sight—
And we turn from thee, with a sad "good-night."

God prosper thee in thy homeward track,
Bearing kind hearts and loved voices back
To the homes, whose hearths shall be gladdened by thee,
When thy pennons stream out to the land of the free.
But thou hast a voice which shall sorrow awaken,
For death's fearful lance over thee has been shaken,
And one has passed from our midst away—
A meteor vanished—a darkened ray.

There will be sad tears to his memory,
Who sank to rest in the Southern Sea;
And weeping for those who have gone away,
By heathen temples and streams to pray;
For they shall return no more, nor see
Kindred or country;* but peace to thee,
O wanderer! God's blessing be with thee still,
And ours, dear Houqua; farewell—farewell!

FORGIVENESS; OR, VICTORY TO JESUS CHRIST.

Some years ago a missionary was preaching to the Hindoos. He was telling of the true and only God, who is love; whose mercies are over all his works; who shows his love in the care with which his almighty providence hath provided for the insect that crawls on the earth; the bird that flies in the air; the fish that swims in the water; the beast that walks on the earth; and the man, the lord of all, to whom he hath given dominion over the works of his hands. He was telling of that God who willeth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should turn from his wickedness, and live; who is a holy, pure, and just God, and therefore is angry with the wicked every day, but yet is forbearing and patient, slow to anger, and of great kindness. He was telling of that God who so loved sinful, cruel, and unmerciful men, as to give his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life.

He was telling, moreover, of the Son of God; describing the character of the meek, holy, compassionate Saviour; who even sent away the doves from the temple unharmed, though he was angry with those who polluted the temple by selling them in it:—he was telling of his love, of all his patience;—how he forgave his enemies, and taught his disciples to do good to those that hated them; to bless those that cursed them;—how, in his last miracle on earth, he returned good for evil, and healed the ear of the high priest's servant, who was come with others to make him prisoner.

Now, while he was speaking thus, many listened attentively; but others thought he was pointing to their religion, and contrasting it with the religion of Jesus Christ; and contrasting such a goddess as Kalee, with the character of the true God. The priests, or Brahmins, are always much opposed to the Christian missionaries, because these priests live in ease and idleness by the superstition of the people; and they think, like the silversmiths we read of in the Acts of the Apostles, that if Christianity were to prevail, their craft would come to naught. So sometimes when they did not interfere, they would incite others to do so.

I do not know whether a Brahmin was the cause or not, but while this missionary was thus preaching, one of the Hindoos, who had come from some distance, grew very indignant at the preacher's discourse, and determined to put an end to it; and as human life is thought very little of by them, he did not hesitate about it. So he got a great stick, and went behind the missionary while he was preaching, and raised it up to knock the poor man on the head; but fortunately he missed his blow, and the stick came down on the preacher's shoulder instead of his head. Then the guilty and disappointed Hindoo wanted to escape, but a great many of those who had been listening to the discourse, and saw his base action, became very angry and ashamed at it; and they seized the man, and brought him to the missionary. So the preacher looked at him, as he stood quite ashamed and full of fear before him; and then looking at his other hearers, said, "What shall I do with him?"

"Give him a good beating," they cried, holding the stick that might have killed him.

"O," said the preacher, "I cannot do that!" I suppose the Hindoos thought he did not think himself strong enough to beat the wicked Hindoo as he deserved.

"Well," said they, "send him to the judge, and he will be sentenced to two years' hard labor on the road."

"I cannot do that," said the missionary. The Hindoos were astonished, and said, "What can you do?"

"I can forgive him," said the missionary; "this is all I can do; and I will tell you why, —Jesus Christ is my Lord and my God: he commands me to love my enemies, and to do good to them that despitefully use me and persecute me."

Then he turned to the trembling Hindoo, and said, "I forgive you from my heart; but never forget that it is Jesus Christ you are to thank for your escape from punishment; and it was against Jesus Christ and his religion you were angry when you aimed that blow at me."

The Hindoos were astonished at this forgiveness of an enemy;—they were silent a moment; then rose up altogether, and shouted out, "Victory to Jesus Christ! Victory to Jesus Christ!" [S. S. Advocate.

A WONDERFUL CONVERSION.

There was, some years ago, not far from this place, a very gifted preacher, who, for several years, preached with great earnestness and success the doctrines of the cross; but who on that very account, was violently opposed. One of his opponents, a well-informed person, who had for a long time absented himself from the church, thought, one Sunday morning, that he would go and hear the gloomy man once more, to see if his preaching was more tolerable to him than it had been hitherto. He went, and that morning the preacher was speaking of the narrow way, which he did not make either narrower or broader than the word of God describes. "A new creature in Christ, or eternal condemnation," was the theme of his discourse, and he spoke with power and not as a mere reasoner. During the sermon, the question forced itself upon the hearer's conscience, "How is it with myself? Does this man declare the real truth?" This thought took such a hold on him, that he could not get rid of it in any of his engagements or amusements. But it became from day to day more troublesome; more and more penetrating, and threatened to embitter every joy of his life, so that at last he thought he would go and see the preacher himself and ask him upon his conscience if he were convinced of the truth of that which he had lately preached. He fulfilled his intention and went to the preacher. "Sir," said he to him, with great earnestness, "I was one of your hearers when you spoke, a short time ago, of the only way of salvation. I confess to you, you have disturbed my peace of mind, and I can not refrain from asking you solemnly before God, and upon your conscience, if you can prove what you have asserted, or whether it was unfounded alarm."

The preacher, not a little surprised at his address, replied with convincing certainty, that he had spoken the word of God, and consequently infallible truth. "What, then, is to become of us?" replied the visitor. His last word, us, startled the minister; but he rallied his thoughts and began to explain the plan of salvation to the enquirer, and exhort him to repent and believe. But the latter, as though he had not heard one syllable of what the preacher had said, interrupted him in the midst of it, and repeated, with increasing emotion, the anxious exclamation, "If it be true, sir, I beseech you, what are we to do?" Terrified, the preacher staggers back. "We?" thinks he; "what means this we?" and endeavoring to stifle his inward uneasiness and embarrassment, he resumed his exhortations and advice. Tears came to the visitor; he smote his hands together like one in despair, and exclaimed in an accent which might have moved a heart of stone, "Sir, if it be true, we are lost and undone." The preacher stood pale, trembling and speechless, and then, completely overwhelmed with astonishment, with down-cast eyes and convulsive sobbings, he exclaimed, "Friend, get down on your knees, and let us pray to God for mercy?" They knelt down and prayed, and shortly after, the visitor took his leave. The preacher shut himself up in his closet. Next Sunday word was sent that the minister was unwell, and could not appear. The same thing happened the Sunday following. On the third Sunday, the preacher made his appearance before his congregation, worn with his inward conflict, and pale, but his eyes beaming with joy, and commenced his discourse with the surprising and affecting declaration that he had now for the first time passed the strait gate. You will ask what occurred to him in his chamber during the interval that had elapsed. A storm passed over him—but the Lord was not in the storm; an earthquake—but the Lord was not in the earthquake; a fire—but the Lord was not in the fire. Then came the small still voice; on which the man enveloped his face in his mantle, and from that time he knew what was the Gospel, and what was grace.

DEFENSE OF NEGRO SLAVERY.

A book of nearly three hundred pages, in defense of Negro Slavery as it exists in the United States, was published in one of our southern cities in 1846. It was prepared by Dr. Matthew Estes, of Columbus, "cheered and assisted in his labors by several distinguished literary and scientific gentlemen, who kindly consented to furnish facts, hints, and suggestions." If any reliance can be placed upon the opinions of the press in South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and other cotton-growing States, this work is regarded as a triumphant vindication of the "peculiar institution." Under such circumstances, our readers my feel interested in a brief statement of some of its leading arguments.

One position, upon which considerable stress is laid by the writer, is, that slavery makes men brave and courageous. In support of this assertion, reference is made to the late struggle in Texas, where, it is said, "a mere handful of southern men—a majority of them slaveholders—contended successfully against the comparatively colossal power of Mexico." Indeed, it is claimed, that in all our wars, whether with whites or with the Indians, southern men have displayed high-toned chivalry and undaunted courage, which can be ascribed only to the spirit fostered by slavery. Now there can be but little doubt that the system of slavery fosters a spirit which makes good fighters. Thomas Jefferson says that "the whole commerce between master and slave is a perpetual exercise of the most boisterous passions; the most unremitting despotism on the one part, and degrading submission on the other. The parent storms, the child looks on, catches the lineaments of wrath, puts on the same airs in the circle of smaller slaves, gives loose to his worst passions, and thus nursed, educated, and daily exercised in tyranny, cannot but be stamped by it with odious peculiarities." Of course no better school could be found in which to obtain the first qualification of a warrior—recklessness of the rights and lives of others. But we fail to see in this result of the system any thing to recommend it. On the contrary, such exhibitions of its natural consequences make us feel like the immortal Washington when he said, "It is among my first wishes to see some plan adopted by which slavery in this country may be abolished by law."

Another position taken by Dr. Estes, is, that slavery is adapted to protect our republican institutions against the ignorance of northern mechanics and laborers. The course of reasoning by which he sustains this position is plain enough, but takes for granted the very questions at issue. He says that the whole mass at the North, "though but little superior to our blacks," enjoy the right of suffrage, and of course may abuse it in their ignorance. At the South it is not so. There the great body of those who perform the drudgery of society are slaves, who are represented at the ballot-box by their intelligent and aristocratic masters; hence there is less danger to the State. But we are yet to learn, that there is more danger in extending the elective francise to the many, than there is in concentrating it in a few individuals whose interests may be in direct opposition to the interests of the many. In this connection the Doctor makes a great boast of the number of Presidents who have been southern men and slaveholders. It is admitted, he says, that slaveholders are now, and have been in times past, the leading politicians of the Union; and this fact he regards as among the many instances of southern superiority. It is hard for northern politicians, not only to be cheated out of the principal offices in the gift of the government, but to have that fact trumpeted as an evidence of their ignorance and stupidity. Perhaps, however, there is no more effectual way to teach them a lesson they need to learn. It ought, therefore, to be received with meekness and thanks.

But the most important benefit of the system of slavery, in the estimation of this writer, is, that it discourages infidelity and promotes piety. In proof that such is the fact, we are told that there are no infidel papers or parties at the South, and that Mormonism, Millerism, Fourierism, Swedenborgianism, and Universalism, are scarcely known there; while there are at least six hundred thousand church communicants among slaves, comprising nearly one half of some of the most popular religious denominations. Verily this is a glowing picture of the state of things. Would that it were a true picture. But stubborn facts stand in the way of believing it. According to the census of 1840, a large portion of the 500,000 white persons 20 years of age who can neither read nor write, are located in the Slave States. Only a very small portion of the slaves know the letters of the alphabet, and in some of the States it would be treated as a crime to teach them. According to reports of the missionaries of the American Home Missionary Society, it seems that ninety-nine one-hundredths of the slaves receive no instruction at all; and that "while the white family are bowing before God in the parlor, the slave is preparing the morning meal in the kitchen." In view of such facts, we must be permitted to doubt the correctness of the conclusion, that slavery promotes any thing deserving the name of piety.

This book of Mr. Estes is an attempt to sustain slavery by fair argument; and the writer says that if it cannot be so sustained, "it should be abandoned as soon as possible, for no one can have any interest in sustaining error." Perhaps he thinks he has succeeded in his object; indeed, he talks as though that was certain. But we think that most readers will be set against, rather than won to the love of, slavery by this effort.

NEWS FROM OUR MISSIONARIES.

☞ The following letter continues the narrative of the voyage of our missionaries up to the latest date. We have other communications, descriptive of interesting incidents and places, which will appear in due time.

Hong Kong, April 28th, 1847.

Supposing that an early notice of our safe arrival would be desired, I embrace the first opportunity to inform you. Guarded by that Hand which controls the raging deep, after a pleasant and prosperous voyage of 112 days, we have arrived at this place, where we intend to stay until we obtain the necessary information to enable us to determine in reference to a permanent location. Bro. Carpenter has given you an account of the voyage as far as the Island of Java, where I will commence.

For several days we lay becalmed between Prince's Island and Crockatca, until the morning of the 29th of March, when a light breeze springing up, wafted us gently onward. As we approached the land, its towering peaks and verdant plains, alternately covered with trees and green, exhibited no uninteresting spectacle to the eye. When within twelve or fifteen miles of Anjier, we were met by a boat containing eleven Malays, laden with fruits and articles of their manufacture for sale. Their complexion resembles our North American Indians, stature small and slender, nearly naked, hair long and black, small flat noses, black eyes, with prominent oval foreheads, and possessing a good degree of shrewdness. Their early visit was for the purpose of securing the job of supplying the ship with water and provisions. At 10 o'clock in the evening we were safely moored about a mile in front of Anjier village. Before sunrise the next morning, we were thronged by native peddlers, laden with cocoanuts, mangusteens, devil's apples, oranges, plantains, bananas, pine-apples, onions, sweet-potatoes, yams, squashes, corn, rice, eggs, curry, sea-shells, bats, monkeys, squirrels, Sumatra pigeons, Java sparrows, hens, sheep, &c.

About 10 o'clock all the passengers went on shore, in company with the Captain. At the landing was a well-constructed dock, furnished with glass lamps, which bore a strong resemblance to civilized architecture. As we came near the shore, our attention was attracted by some instrumental music performed by the natives at a little distance from us. Their instruments were rude and rudely played. One somewhat resembled a tenor viol, but the rest seemed to be composed of metal, upon which they beat with sticks. Near the spot where we landed stood a large banyan tree, whose trunk was five or six feet through, composed of a multitude of parts, of various thicknesses. Its branches covered an area three or four rods in diameter, among which were seats arranged sufficient to accommodate many persons. Among the first things which attracted our attention on landing, were the coral fragments which lay strewn in abundance; from which we gathered several interesting specimens. We soon proceeded to the Post Office, kept by the Dutch Governor, where we deposited our letters. The few dwellings occupied by the Dutch, are well constructed, roofed with tiles, high between-joints, brick floors, plastered inside and out, with veranda in front, and surrounded with beautiful flower gardens. The houses of the natives, comprising most of the village, are constructed of bamboo, and seem to answer a very good purpose in that climate. The village contains about two hundred buildings, a considerable part of which are store-houses, containing the various articles of produce and manufacture brought in by the surrounding inhabitants for trade. These we visited next. On our way we met a distressed looking object, sitting in the middle of the street, nearly naked, who seemed to be merely a living skeleton. As we passed, he stretched out his withered hand, expressive of his wretchedness. At a little distance from this were some natives manufacturing bark ropes. One end was tied around the body of a man standing at a proper distance, while one at the other end twisted it with a rude machine which he held in his hand, and another laid and rubbed it. On the other side of the street was a park, surrounded by open buildings, and thronged by natives busily employed in preparing their articles for sale. Thence we crosed a bridge south of the Post Office, and entered the guard's department, including about two acres, surrounded by an embankment, with gate-way entrances. This was tastefully arranged, in a square form, bordered by a few nice buildings inhabited by whites. Leaving this, we entered a Chinese store, containing a great variety, and many articles of European manufacture. Here we were treated with much attention and courtesy, being supplied with seats and fans for our refreshment. Passing out of the village east, we took a view of their rice fields, which are made level, surrounded with embankments, and watered by means of an aqueduct, constructed of brick, covered with white plaster, and elevated about six feet above the level, seeming to extend through the whole plain and village. In some places the rice was ready to harvest. Thence we passed through their fruit groves, consisting of plantains and bananas fifteen or twenty feet high, having leaves about eight feet long and three wide, resembling those of the hickory in shape. Their fruit is about the size and shape of a common cucumber, with a yellow rind, and very delicious to the taste. The cocoa tree is thirty or forty feet high, with two sets of leaves, starting from nearly the same point, one reaching up and the other down, about twelve feet long, resembling the sumack. These compose the top. The fruit hangs in large clusters of a hundred or more attached to the body. The Caster is six or eight inches in diameter and of proportionate height, bearing fruit about the size of an orange, from which the oil is extracted. After visiting these, we returned to the boat, and found two of our men so intoxicated that they were unable to row. No such degrading conduct did we discover among the natives. Their civility and respectful deportment would be a good reproof to most of the cities and villages in Christianized America.

Toward night, a breeze springing up, we raised anchor and set sail. The next day we passed through Banco Straits into the Java sea, having Banco Island on the left, Lepusee ahead, with Low and Saddle Islands on the right, all in plain view. On the night of the 2d of April, we passed through Gasper Straits into the China Sea, where we were becalmed in sight of St. Barb's Island five days. On the 14th of April we passed the Great Nutuna, lying in lat. 4° N. long. 109° E., being forty miles long and nine broad; high, uneven, rocky, and said to be inhabited by cannibals. We arrived at Hong Kong last evening. This forenoon Bro. Carpenter and myself called on Bro. Dean, the Baptist Missionary of this place, and gained some information in regard to what course it would be advisable to pursue. We then called upon the American Consul, who gave us farther information, and directed us to whom to apply for a house. We visited the man, a Scotch gentleman, named Strachn, who, after inquiring into our business, offered us the use of a convenient house, free of charge. We could but regard this unexpected favor as the gracious interposition of Divine Providence. In the course of the day we had our things taken from the ship, and safely deposited in the house. According to what information we have been able to attain, Shanghai appears to be a much more favorable location than Foo-chow-foo, both in regard to the healthiness of the climate and accessibility of its inhabitants. We learn that Mr. Shuck is expected to locate at the former place, on his return from America, and that Mr. Johnson, of the American Board, has recently established himself at the latter. We shall avail ourselves of every means within our reach for gaining the necessary information in respect to these places. Any thing which it is desirable to send us, may be forwarded to Mr. Bush, the American Consul at Hong Kong, who will forward to us.

Yours in Christian bonds,

N. WARDNER.

State Temperance Convention.—On Thursday, July 22d, pursuant to a call of the General Temperance Council of New York, a number of delegates from twelve counties in this State, assembled at Saratoga Springs, to promote the banishment from the Empire State of all that can intoxicate. After the opening exercises, several addresses were delivered, and resolutions discussed. Resolutions were adopted, to the effect that the advocates of the Temperance Cause then present fully believe in its Divine origin and support; that the system of licensing men to sell intoxicating drinks is radically wrong, and ought to be abolished, together with all laws that give countenance thereto; that no legislation can be a sufficient defense against the evils of Intemperance, except that which aims at the entire prohibition of the sale of intoxicating drinks; and that, properly, the great question now to be submitted to the people, and by them to be decided at the ballot-box, is not "License or No License," but Sale or No Sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage;—and that "in self-defense we will vote for such men only as we believe will, if elected, give their influence and vote in favor of a law granting to the people liberty to decide by ballot, in a general State vote, whether intoxicating liquors may or may not be sold within the State." At the conclusion of the meeting, the officers were authorized to call a General Temperance Convention, to be held at Troy on the 12th of August.

Temperance in the Sandwich Islands.—One of our cotemporaries says that in the Sandwich Islands, notwithstanding the impositions and compulsory acts of foreign governments, the people maintain their steadfastness in the cause of temperance. Frequent processions and temperance festivities sustain and animate them, while their adherence to the pledge is made to a great extent a religious duty. A spirit of worthy emulation in other lands was recently shown at an attempt to smuggle in five barrels of brandy at the port of Honolulu. The offence subjected the vessel to confiscation, and the principals and accessories to fines of $1,000 each. The forfeited liquor was publicly emptied into the street in front of the Custom House. The King, in a recent letter to America, asks for help from our country to deliver his nation from ardent spirits.

THE SABBATH.

660. H. M. Hayward.

Sabbath Morning.

1 WELCOME, delightful morn;
Sweet day of sacred rest,
I hail thy kind return;
Lord, make these moments blest:
From low desires | I soar to reach
And fleeting toys, | Immortal joys.

2 Now may the King descend,
And fill his throne of grace;
Thy sceptre, Lord, extend,
While saints address thy face:
Let sinners feel | And learn to know
Thy quickening word, | And fear the Lord.

3 Descend, celestial Dove,
With all thy quickening powers;
Disclose a Saviour's love,
And bless the sacred hours:
Then shall my soul | Nor Sabbaths be
New life obtain, | Enjoyed in vain.

661. L. M. Edmeston.

Sabbath Evening.

1 SWEET is the light of Sabbath eve,
And soft the sunbeams lingering there;
For these blest hours the world I leave,
Wafted on wings of faith and prayer.

2 The time how lovely, and how still!
Peace shines and smiles on all below;
The plain, the stream, the wood, the hill,
All fair with evening's setting glow,

3 Season of rest! the tranquil soul
Feels the sweet calm, and melts to love;
And, while these sacred moments roll,
Faith sees a smiling heaven above.

4 Nor will our days of toil be long,
Our pilgrimage will soon be trod;
And we shall join the ceaseless song,
The endless Sabbath of our God.

Two Church Edifices burned on a Sunday.—Some persons claim great shrewdness in discovering the designs of Providence in the various casualties which occur—particularly those which occur on Sundays. But two events transpired on Sunday, July 25, which will probably puzzle them. The first event was the burning of St. Paul's Church in Rochester, which took place at an early hour in the morning, destroying consecrated property valued at about thirty thousand dollars, on which there was an insurance of only ten thousand dollars. The second event was the destruction of St. Paul's Church in Philadelphia, in the afternoon of the same day. The building was nearly new, and erected at an expense of twenty-eight thousand dollars, of which some seventeen thousand dollars was insured. We should like to know whether these would properly come under the head of "Sabbath Accidents," and what is the natural inference from them as to the estimation in which Providence holds the churches or congregations to which these edifices belonged.

Dissenters in England.—The National Era says that in consequence of the interference of the Government with the work of public education, including religious instruction, the Dissenters have determined generally to withdraw their support from the Whigs, and eschew all party alliances in the coming election. We notice in the last number of the Nonconformist a very valuable address, to Dissenting Electors, calling upon them to stand firmly upon the basis of their own principles, supporting candidates fully committed to them, or, if none such be in the field, setting up candidates of their own, or retiring formally from the polls, just as the circumstances may require.

The Sabbath in London.—The Presbyterian says that at a public meeting recently held in England, it was stated that out of a population of more than two millions, there was an attendance of only four hundred thousand persons on the services of the Sabbath, in the churches and chapels of all denominations! "If inquiry was made as to the occupation of the rest, the crowded state of steam-vessels, rail-way carriages, public houses, gardens, club and gaming houses, would furnish a reply."

Royal Beneficence.—The King of Prussia has recently given $758 to the Rhemish Missionary Society, toward the support of its first missionaries in China. The Minister of State, Dr. Eichorn, in transmitting the donation, informed the Society that he was charged by the King "to testify the lively interest which his majesty takes in this enterprise, in behalf of which he invoked the gracious aid and the rich blessings of the Lord."

A Martyr Reformer.—Many are the instances in which the advocates of reform fall martyrs to their zeal. Rev. Orange Scott, one of the founders of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, belongs to this class. He is now on the verge of the grave, brought there, as is supposed, by his abundant labors and cares. Recently he dictated an address to the church of his founding, which was published in the True Wesleyan, and from which the following paragraph is taken:—

'You will all, brethern, concede to me a deep interest in all our concerns. When our church was organized, I threw myself and all that I had upon her altar, not then thinking I should so soon be consumed; but so it is. The embarrassed state of our Book-Concern, over which you called me to preside, has literally worn me out. Yes, brethern, I must go down to the dead. I would not cast a reflection upon any of you—some of you have done nobly; others, perhaps, might have done more, and so have released the Concern from its embarrassment long before this, and have saved the Agent from a premature grave.'

Alfred, N. Y., July 27, 1847.

To the Churches in the Western Seventh-day Baptist Association:—

Dear Brethren,—I take this method of calling your attention to the fact that the Anniversaries of the Missionary and Tract Societies are soon to be held. The place designated is DeRuyter; and it is desirable that all the money, &c., which can be collected for these objects, should be forwarded to that place at that time; and farther, that those meetings should be conducted upon such a plan as to create the greatest possible amount of interest in behalf of the objects the interests of which they meet to promote. Therefore I suggest that immediate and efficient measures be taken to collect funds for these objects, and that they be forwarded to some person designing to attend, or one of the delegates appointed to attend said meetings, that they may forward the same in due time. And I farther suggest, that as many of the friends of these Societies as possibly can, should attend their meetings. Let them not be thinly attended. Brethren, will you immediately attend to this?

N. V. Hull.

The Hymn Book.—Eld. Nathan V. Hull suggests that the most convenient way to supply the churches in Western New York and Pennsylvania with Hymn Books, would be to send them to an agent in Alfred, from whom they might be taken to the different places where they are wanted. The suggestion is favorably received, and arrangements will probably be made to have those who desire it supplied in that way. But the publishers desire to know, as near as possible, what number will be required in the different sections, that they may send accordingly. They hope, therefore, that the churches and societies will send in their orders as early as convenient, stating distinctly in what way the books can best be sent.

The Union Magazine of Literature and Art.—The second number of this beautiful monthly has just been issued, and fully realizes the expectations awakened by the first number. It is edited by Mrs. C. M. Kirkland, author of "A New Home," "Forest Life," &c., assisted by a long list of the most eminent writers of the country. Each number contains forty-eight pages of reading matter, one engraving in mezzotint, one line engraving, illustrative wood cuts dispersed through the body of the work, and a colored fashion plate. All the engravings are from original designs, and admirably executed. The literary matter is equal to that of any work of the class. As a whole, we think this magazine has few rivals. Published by Israel Post, No. 140 Nassau-st., N. Y. Terms $3 per year, in advance.

Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine.—The July number of this deservedly popular monthly has been republished by Leonard Scott & Co., of No. 79 Fulton-st. The following is a list of its contents: "Prescott's Peru," "Crossing the Desert," "Life of Jean Paul Richter," "A Tale of the Masorcha Club," "Letters from a Railway Witness in London," "Sir H. Nicholas's History of the Navy," "Evenings at Sea," "The Dog of Alcibiades," "Sir Robert Peel and the Currency." The July number commences a new volume, making the present a favorable time to subscribe.

English Missionary Societies.—There has been an increase of the receipts of the English Missionary Societies during the past year. The total income of the Church Missionary Society during the past year was £116,287, being an advance on the previous year of £14,369; of which sum £10,429 was raised and expended by the different missions. The total income of the Wesleyan Missionary Society during the last year was £115,762, being an advance of £2,838; of which sum £4,770 was derived from Juvenile Christmas and New Year's offerings, £11,788 raised by foreign auxiliaries among the missions, and £6,462 were contributed by Ireland. The receipts of the London Missionary Society have amounted to £76,319, £3,426 less than those of the previous year, and the expenditures to £75,724. The receipts of the Baptist Missionary Society were £28,223, being an increase of £1,934, and the expenditures were £26,399. It will be seen that the total increase of these societies amounts to £15,705.

Return to Protestantism.—The London Atlas contains a letter, of which the following is an extract. It is from the Paris correspondent of that journal:—"The religious world are all on tiptoe, awaiting the result of a negociation pending between the highest ecclesiastical authority in the kingdom, and a lady of the most illustrious rank—the Duchess de Talleyrand, known in this country as the Duchess of Dino—who has announced her determination of returning to Protestantism, from which she had been persuaded some few years ago. You can form no idea of the excitement to which this determination has given rise; and I am told that in the church of her parish, in the Fabourg St. Germain, litanies to the Virgin are put up night and day in her behalf. Meanwhile the lady's family stand aghast, and know not where to call for aid. The event will cause much interest in England, where the Duchess accompanied her uncle, the late Prince Talleyrand, in his embassy, and where she is still remembered with the admiration due to her great genius and romantic beauty."

Baptism of a Jewish Hazan.—Mr. Bernard Sleinthal, for many years a Minister in the Synagogue in Germany, was received into the Jewish Mission House in New York a few months ago, became a candidate for membership in one of the Reformed Dutch Churches of this city, and was baptized on the 15th ult. It is his purpose, says the Jewish Chronicle, "to devote himself to the services of the gospel as a Missionary to his brethren."

General Intelligence.

ELEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Washington arrived at New York on Friday last, bringing English papers to the 15th of July, on which day she sailed. The news is not important.

The weather continued favorable, and there is scarcely room to doubt an abundant harvest. Even the potato appears to be very generally healthy, and to promise bountifully. Wheat and flour had risen somewhat since previous advices; but in other respects the market remained unchanged.

In France, there had been a judicial development of official corruption in the matter of M. M. Teste and Pellapra, members of the Government. The evidence adduced fastened guilt upon M. Teste beyond cavil or doubt, and tended strongly to inculpate others. At the close of the sitting on the 12th inst., M. Teste having returned to his prison in the Luxemborg, attempted suicide by firing two pistols, one into his mouth, which missed, and another aimed at his breast, but the ball did not penetrate his body. He remains under strict guard.

Affairs in Spain seem at present to be in a wretched state. Beside the open rupture of the Queen and her Consort, rumors of treacherous intrigues, even to the extent of designs, if not to assassinate, at least to dethrone the Queen, are generally circulated. These designs appear to have their chief seat in Paris, and every day brings fresh proof of the signal failure of the schemes of Louis Philippe, which he meditated compassing when bringing about the Montpensier marriage.

The Malta Mail of the 25th ult. says: "We have just received intelligence from Kurdistan that is rather discouraging. It is said that in an engagement with the Kurds the Turks have lost about 3,000 men. Bederhan Bey was at Van, and report says that he is strengthening that fortress for defense. The Turkish Government is, however, still very sanguine in the expectation that this chieftain will soon be brought to terms, perhaps relying on the number of their troops, not considering the difficulties the country opposes to their bringing Bederhan Bey to terms."

In a debate in the House of Commons, July 8, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that "with respect to the future prospects of the country, and more especially of Ireland, he believed that he was warranted in saying that nothing could be more promising than the appearance of the crops."

The condition of Ireland in a social point of view, can be fully understood from the fierce litigation now going on at quarter sessions. There is at Nenagh the enormous quantity of 4,500 civil bills and 200 criminal cases; at Storkestown, one of the divisions of the County of Roscommon, there were 1,900 civil bills, and 200 ejectments for non-payment of rent. At Parsonstown, out of 126 offences, 100 were offences against property.

It is stated in a private letter from Clonmel, Ireland, that the merchants of that town, who have realized such immense profits by hoarding up their stocks of meal, &c., are now obliged to destroy great quantities of it, through its becoming heated in their stores. The river Suir now receives on its placid bosom what would have subsisted many who have gone off this stage forever.

A great sanitary fact is at present being exemplified in Glasgow. While fever rages around, the prisons, containing about six hundred inmates, have not one fever patient. This is at once a reward to the friends of prison discipline, and an encouragement to those of sanitary advancement.

Mr. McQueen stated in evidence before a Committee of the House of Commons last month, that in the course of the last 25 years, England has paid, for Cotton alone, to the United States, £268,000,000 sterling, or $1,300,000,000.

The Paris Presse announces that the Emperor of Russia had determined to construct forthwith a vast line of railroads to connect the three capitals of St. Petersburgh, Moscow, and Warsaw.

The funeral service for the repose of the soul of O'Connell, was celebrated at Rome with great pomp on the 28th ult., as had been announced.

The increase of British revenue in the year ending 5th inst., as compared with the previous year, is $5,000,000.

WAR NEWS.

The following items give all the important news from the seat of war received within a week past:—

Gen. Scott still remained at Puebla at the last advices. Gens. Cadwalader and Pillow were at Perote. There had been a collision at La Haya, in which the Mexicans were worsted as usual.

Col. De Russy's detachment, in returning near Huejulta, in a narrow pass, was surrounded by 1,200 or 1,400 Mexicans, who commenced a heavy fire from all directions, but fled through the chapporal after six or eight rounds of grape. De Russy continued at intervals for several days to fight his way back to the river, where he was received by Col. Gates's reinforcements. He reached Tampico on the night of the 16th, with a loss of 20 killed, 10 wounded, 2 missing, and 20 horses and 60 pack mules. Capt. Boyd and Lieut. Tannahill were killed. De Russy received several balls through his clothes, and Capt. Wyse had three horses shot under him. The Mexican loss is represented at 150. Lieut. Whipple has been lassoed near Vera Cruz.

The Mexican Government is said to have appointed two Commissioners to confer with Commissioner Trist. Santa Anna is supposed to favor peace. A letter from Mexico, dated the 2d, says there is no doubt but that the treaty will be concluded immediately by the Commissioners, the peace party is so strong, and that Santa Anna will probably pronounce for peace. The names of the Commissioners given are Oarstiz, Baranda and Tornel.

The U. S. steamer Ann Chase, Capt. Brown, from the Brazos, with troops, burst her boiler on the 12th, killing 9, and wounding several. James Dolan, of Pittsburgh, and others, died of their wounds.

Accidents on the Sabbath.—On Saturday morning last, the steamboat Niagara left this City at half past six o'clock A. M. for Albany, and had proceeded on her route some thirty miles, when her steam chimney exploded, killing two firemen, scalding two of the passengers—Mr. Noah Avery and lady of Seneca County—and knocking off a portion of the roof of the firemen's room. Capt. De Groot, of the steamer Roger Williams, who was about two miles distant at the time of the disaster, answered the Niagara's signals for assistance, hastened to transfer her passengers to his boat, and proceeded with them to Albany; with the exception of the two persons scalded, who returned to this City in the Thomas Powell, (which had also gone to the relief of the Niagara, and which towed her near the shore where she anchored,) for medical assistance. They were taken to the City Hospital, their wounds examined and cared for, and are pronounced out of danger, and gradually recovering. The Niagara had about 200 passengers on board. That so few of such a number should be injured, is a circumstance almost miraculously fortunate.

The Sandusky Clarion says that last Saturday, as the steamer Constitution was making the wharf, she ran foul of the dock. The concussion was such as to stop her headway, by smashing a hole in the bow of the steamer 6 or 7 feet in length and width. She sunk in about 8 feet water.

Mr. J. Gildersleeve, of Babylon, while bathing, on Saturday the 24th ult., swam a great distance from the shore, and never returned. It is not known whether he perished by a shark, by the cramp, or by exhaustion. He was about 40 years of age and left a family.

On the same evening a young man named John Snediker was drowned at Oyster Bay Mill. He tried to swim too far, and sank from exhaustion.

Mr. Wm. Hughes, of Columbia-st., Brooklyn, stevedore, while at work on the British ship Tuscan, at the foot of Pine-st., New York, last Saturday morning, was thrown to the bottom of the hold, some twenty-five feet, and died in half an hour. He was about 40, and leaves a wife and family.

SUMMARY.

The tolls on the New York Canals continue to increase, and for the third week of July the increase was 82 per cent.! as compared with the same week of last year. The entire receipts of the season are $1,654,450. To same time last year $1,152,400. Increase $502,050. Equal to nearly 50 per cent. And this increase has taken place in 15 days navigation, equal at the present rate of receipts to $300,000. The receipts are more than twice as large as they were to the same period in 1842 or 1843. The largest rate of increase has been at Buffalo, being 81 per cent. for the whole season. But the third week in July shows an increase of 170 per cent! at last point.

Earl Grey, Colonial Secretary of England, writes to Lord Elgin, in Canada, that it will not be practicable this year to carry into effect a scheme of Colonization. He would rather advise Parliament to grant a sum of money to construct railways in the Colonies, and employ the emigrants on the works. He states, officially, that the number of persons who have emigrated to North America during the last twenty years, is 1,337,000. If we add the emigrants who have sailed since last February, it will be found that one and a half millions of men, women and children have been added to the population of this continent since 1826, from the United Kingdom alone.

The U. S. Steamship Washington, arrived at Mobile on the 12th with a bearer of dispatches to the Government. She reports that information had been received at Vera Cruz from Tobasco, stating that after Com. Perry had left Commander Bigelow, he marched at the head of 300 Marines and Sailors, and attacked about 600 Mexicans, whom they found encamped a few miles from the city. The Marines and Sailors fought bravely, and routed double their number, with a loss of twelve men killed and wounded.

On Monday afternoon, in one of the alleys near the old Brewery, a miserably haggard woman sat for most of the afternoon, on a block of wood, leaning against an empty hogshead. She had an infant in her arms, and was caressing it, although she seemed as feeble and helpless as her offspring. Darkness came, and she was in the same place. Some charitable individuals discovered her unhappy plight, and resolved to give her shelter for the night. On approaching her, they found that she was asleep, and the child in her arms was dead.

The Malta Times says that a curious instance of extreme affection in the animal, which ended fatally, took place last week, at the country residence of Baron Gauci, in this Island. A female gazelle having suddenly died from something it had eaten, the male stood over the dead body of his mate, butting every one who attempted to touch it; then, suddenly making a spring, struck his head against a wall, and fell dead at the side of his companion.

Twelve hundred Chinese criminals are said to have been beheaded in Canton during the last year, and many thousands are now in prison. Since the opening of the seals of the provincial officers on the 5th, the work of decapitation has been renewed. Causes are in operation among the Chinese that must year after year continue to swell the tide of evil, and hasten on some—it is hard to say what—dreadful calamity.

According to the Militia Law no person can be required to pay this commutation until the districts of the respective companies are designated by the proper authorities, all persons subject to military duty duly enrolled, notified of such enrollment, and the lists put into the hands of the Ward Collectors. So don't trouble yourselves about the commutation tax till these requisitions are complied with.

The Rev. James C. Richmond, of the class of 1828, has sent an amicable challenge, in the manner of the old universities, to the President, Professors, and students of the University at Cambridge, more especially at Divinity Hall, to discuss with him, orally, the three Christian doctrines of the Episcopacy, the Holy Trinity, and the Atonement.

The large barn and corn-house attached to the County House at Chatham 4 Corners, N. Y., was burnt on the 26th by an incendiary, supposed to be a man called York Shaver. There were over 4,000 sheaves of rye burned in the building, together with three valuable horses, nineteen sheep, a number of hogs, and a variety of farming utensils. The loss is severe, and falls heavy upon the County.

On Wednesday two men from Maryland arrived at Port Elizabeth, Cumberland County, N. J., in search of a negro, who they alledged had run away from his master. They found the man at work in a corn-field, who no sooner discovered his old acquaintances than he gave leg bail—whereupon one of the men fired the contents of a six barrel pistol at him, but more fortunately for himself than the runaway, he missed aim, and the man got off.

The Montreal Herald and the Pilot, continue to exhibit the melancholy results of the ship fever. At the wretched sheds, 1,712 miserable emigrants lay sick last Saturday—32 of them died that day, and 202 during the week. More banished creatures continue to arrive daily, and the record of human woe is proportionably lengthened.

On the 21st inst. a petition from Rev. T. Johnston and others, praying that the custom of selling property at the doors of the Churches, after Divine Service on Sundays, may be discontinued, was presented to the Parliament of Canada. It is also customary in Lower Canada to address political meetings at church doors on the Sunday.

The Editor of the Detroit Free Press has satisfied himself by diligent inquiry, that the wheat crop in Michigan will be equal to that of last year, when there was a surplus of seven millions five hundred thousand bushels, equal to one and a half millions barrels of flour.

Abby Folsome preached a Fourth of July oration, of two days' length, from her chamber window in Boston—commencing on Sunday, and getting through on Monday night. The Mail says "she preached enough during the two days from her window to wear out the lungs of a lion, and make an elephant hoarse. Her physical powers are tremendous, and her love of the freedom of speech stronger than death."

According to a paragraph in the Philadelphia Inquirer, a Greek manuscript, of the sixth century, has been discovered at Athens, which, besides a treatise on Byzantine painting, is said to contain an account of the daguerreotype process, and hints for the manufacture of gun-cotton. In this manuscript, the art of producing photographic pictures is called "Heliotype."

Some time since a Miss Amanda Smith was killed on the Long Island railroad. As her death was caused, as it was alledged, by the negligence of the agents of the road, her father prosecuted the company for damages. The case was referred to referees, of whom judge Greenwood was one. They rendered a verdict to the plaintiff of $950.

Rev. Messrs. Leider and Cruse, German Missionaries, have planted schools among the Copts, the remnants of the ancient Egyptians, in which they have three hundred pupils. There are 100 young men in the service of the Pasha, who have been educated by Mr. Leider.

The Recorder states that among the cheering intelligence from India, is the abolishment, in two of the provinces of that country, of the suttee, or burning of widows, and the prohibition of infanticide. It shows an increasing spirit of humanity in that country, which it may be hoped will prevail.

One of the principal lodges of Prussian Free Masons has struck out of its laws the clauses which prescribed that no person could be received a Mason unless he professed the Christian religion, and which particularly forbade the admission of Jews.

The Pottsville Miners' Journal says: "The quantity of coal sent by railroad this week is 32,269 15 tons; by canal, 7,640 15. Total for the week, 39,910 10; do for the season, by railroad, 683,668 04 tons, and by canal, 93,320. There has been an increase this week on both canal and railroad."

The Ice Trade, though but recently commenced in India, has become to the United States one of the most lucrative articles of export. They now drink iced champagin in Calcutta, Madras, and Canton. One house in Boston sent in a single year 101 vessels with cargoes of ice. Almost equal to the product of the whole wine harvest of Bordeaux—eighteen millions of florins.

An accident from the careless use of fire-arms occurred in Philadelphia, July 29, by which James McMullen was killed with his jaw entirely shot away, Henry McLaughlin so badly wounded in his breast that his recovery is doubtful, and John Cole severely lacerated.

A large lime-stone rolled from the top of a high hill in the vicinity of Pittsburgh on Monday afternoon. In its descent it rushed against a frame school house and instantly killed five children, besides wounding three others, one of whom it is feared may not recover.

During a thunder storm, a servant of Mr. Samuel Cohen, at Clifton, Staten Island, was wringing out a towel when a flash of lightning passed under her face and struck the towel in her hand, which was burnt in many places, without affecting her hands or her person in the slightest degree.

The Presbytery of Ohio, (Old School) lately passed resolutions forbidding their licentiates to solemnize the marriage covenant. The legislature of Connecticut enacted a law at its late session, authorizing licentiates, settled for one year, to perform the marriage ceremony.

In its sitting of the 16th, the three states of the Prussian Diet, adopted by two hundred and twenty votes against one hundred and fifteen, the bill for the admission of Jews to all places, except such as are connected with religious instructions.

Oswego, it is said, will soon be the greatest place for flour manufacturing in the United States. In addition to the extensive mills there already, three new ones of the largest class are going up.

We call the attention of postmasters and subscribers to newspapers, to the following article, taken from the new regulations for the government of the Post Office Department—(Page 35, No. 244:)—"It is ordered that Regulation 549, which authorizes persons to subscribe for newspapers by depositing the money with postmasters, &c., be, and the same is hereby repealed. This order to take effect from and after the first day of July, 1847." Owing to the limited circulation of the order, the Postmaster General has extended the time when it is to take effect, to July 31, 1847.

Mr. Hotchkiss, the gentleman who was so brutally assaulted in Brooklyn several months ago, has recovered his health to a considerable degree, but still exhibits a lamentable want of intellectual action. All attempts to test his recollection of the assault upon him have hitherto proved fruitless. He has not the slightest recollection of the circumstance, nor can his friends make him comprehend his present condition, nor the cause which led to it.

About thirty sail of vessels, says the Bath Tribune, are building on the Damariscotta river at this time. Six or seven of these vessels are ships averaging from 600 to 650 tons each. The tonnage built in the United States, on account of the late increase in the corn trade, has been enormous, and will, before another year, have its effect upon freights.

A recent order of the King of Prussia enacts that, pursuant to existing laws, clergymen who depart from their duty shall be submitted to different degrees of punishment. Those who preach against any form of religion sanctioned by the State are liable to dismissal, and to imprisonment of from four to six weeks.

Gov. Dodge, of Wisconsin, intends—so say the Wisconsin papers—to call together the Legislature early in October, for the purpose of preparing another Constitution, and the admission of the Territory into the Union. Before the adjournment of the next Congress, Representatives and Senators from Wisconsin may take their appropriate seats in the grand Council of the Nation.

On June 12 an interesting ceremony took place in the Parish Church of St. Elizabeth, in Paris. It was the baptism of three negro princes. Two of them sons of Peter, King of Grand Bassan in Africa, the other, the son of a neighboring King.

At Quarantine, near Quebec, 656 emigrants have died within four weeks. Last Wednesday 1,667 passengers arrived at Grosse Isle in five ships—one of them from Bremen, with 326 passengers. Few sick—few deaths.

The Quakers have had paid to them a compliment of exceeding significance. In almost all cases, and without any previous consultation, they have been made the distributors of American charity to the suffering people of Ireland.

TRACT SOCIETY NOTICE.

The Fourth Anniversary of the American Sabbath Tract Society will be held at DeRuyter, Madison Co., N. Y., on fifth day, September 16th, at 10 o'clock A. M. Auxiliary Societies, agents, and tract distributors, are requested to communicate to the Corresponding Secretary, without delay, such facts connected with the circulation of Sabbath Tracts as are calculated to show the usefulness of that field of labor. Annual Members of the Society, Auxiliary Societies, or Churches, owing or having contributions designed to be included in the Treasurer's Annual Report, are requested to forward them to the Treasurer before the 5th of September, at which time he will make up his report.

Paul Stillman, General Agent.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

PLUMBE NATIONAL DAGUERREAN GALLERY AND PHOTOGRAPHERS' FURNISHING DEPOTS; awarded the gold and silver medals, four first premiums, and two highest honors, at the National, the Massachusetts, the New York, and Pennsylvania Exhibitions, respectively, for the most splendid colored Daguerreotypes and best apparatus ever exhibited.

Portraits taken in exquisite style, without regard to weather. Instructions given in the art.

A large assortment of apparatus and stock always on hand, at the lowest cash prices.

New York, 251 Broadway; Philadelphia, 136 Chestnut street; Boston, 75 Court and 58 Hanover streets; Baltimore, 205 Baltimore street; Washington, Pennsylvania Avenue; Petersburg, Virginia, Mechanics' Hall; Cincinnati, Fourth and Walnut, and 176 Main streets; Saratoga Springs, Broadway; Paris, 127 Vieille Rue du Temple; Liverpool, 32 Church street.

THE NEW HYMN BOOK.

AT the last meeting of the General Conference, a Committee, consisting of Thomas B. Brown, Lucius Crandall, Wm. B. Maxson, Eli S. Bailey, Nathan V. Hull, and Sherman S. Griswold, was appointed to prepare and secure the publication of a Hymn Book suited to the wants of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Subsequently Mr. Brown, Chairman of the Committee, suggested a plan for the work, which received the unanimous and hearty approval of the other members of the Committee, and which he was requested by them to carry out. We are happy to state, that he has completed the duty assigned to him, and has prepared for the press a book which is believed by good judges to be equal in point of merit to any thing of the kind now extant. The copy is already in the hands of the printer, and the work will be published and ready for distribution on the 10th day of September next. It will contain above one thousand hymns, covering nearly six hundred pages of the size of the medium edition of "The Psalmist," now in use among the Baptists. It will be printed on fine paper, and upon stereotype plates prepared from entirely new type. In style of workmanship, it is intended that the book shall be inferior to none. To secure for it as general a circulation as possible, the price, in common leather binding, has been fixed at 75 cents per copy, or $9 per dozen. Copies will be put up in extra binding, with gilt edges, &c, to suit every variety of taste, at prices corresponding to the style.

The Publishers of the Book are desirous of learning what number of copies will be at once demanded, in order that they may regulate the size of the first edition by the demand. They request, therefore, that those in want of the work will give them as early notice as possible of the number they desire. Probably the best way to do the business will be for each society or church to appoint some person to ascertain how many will be wanted within its own bounds, and send on the order accordingly. The books will be ready for delivery, as before stated, on the 10th day of September, in time to supply at the Anniversary of the Missionary and Tract Societies in DeRuyter, all who may wish to obtain them in that way. To save uneasiness, no money will be required until the books are delivered; and to save loss, no books will be delivered except for the money or its equivalent. Orders for the books are now solicited, and should in all cases be accompanied with explicit information as to the way in which they may be sent. Those who wish to be sure of copies of the first edition, should send their orders as early as the 1st day of September. Address, "Utter & Champlin, No. 9 Spruce-st, New-York."

SILAS S. CLARKE, Teacher of Physiology.
CAROLINE E. WILCOX, Preceptress.
M. SAMANTHA NEWTON, Assistant.
AMELIA R. CLARKE, Teacher of Instrumental Music.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First commencing Wednesday, Aug. 25, and ending Dec. 1
Second " " Dec. 15, " March 22
Third " " April 5, " July 12

Tuition, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
Extras—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

PEACE.

A few years ago, I met an elderly man in the Hartford stage, whose conversation led me to reflect on the baseness and iniquity often concealed behind the apparent glory of war. The thumb of his right hand hung down, as if suspended by a thread; and some of the passengers inquired the cause. "A Malay woman cut the muscle with her sabre!" was the reply.

"A Malay woman!" they exclaimed; "how came you fighting with a woman?"

"I did not know she was a woman, for they all dress alike there," said he. "I was on board the U. S. ship Potomac when it was sent to chastise the Malays for murdering the crew of a Salem vessel. We attacked one of their forts, and killed some 200 or more. Many of the women were killed; and I can tell you the Malay women are as good fighters as the men."

After answering several questions concerning the conflict, he was silent for a moment, and then added with a sigh, "Ah, that was a bad business. I do not like to remember it; I wish I never had had any thing to do with it. I have been a seaman from my youth, and I know the Malays well. They are a brave and honest people. Deal fairly with them, and they will treat you well, and may be trusted with untold gold. The Americans were to blame in that business. The truth is, Christian nations are generally to blame in the outset, in all their difficulties with less civilized people. A Salem ship went to Malacca to trade for pepper. They agreed to give the natives a stated compensation, when a certain number of measures full of pepper were delivered. Men, women, and children, were busy picking pepper, and bringing it on board. The Captain proposed that the sailors should go on shore and help them; and the natives consented with the most confiding good nature. The sailors were instructed to pick till evening, and then leave the baskets full of pepper among the bushes, with the understanding that they were to be brought on board by the natives in the morning. They did so, without exciting any suspicion of treachery. But in the night the baskets were all conveyed on board, and the vessel sailed away, leaving the Malays unpaid for their valuable cargo. This, of course, excited great indignation, and they made loud complaints to the commander of the next American vessel that arrived on the coast. In answer to a demand for redress from the government, they were assured that the case should be represented and the wrong redressed. But 'Yankee cuteness' in cheating a few savages was not sufficiently uncommon to make any stir, and the affair was soon forgotten. Some time after, another captain of a Salem ship played a similar trick, and carried off a still larger quantity of stolen pepper. The Malays, exasperated beyond measure, resorted to lynch law, and murdered an American crew that landed there. The U. S. ship Potomac was sent out to punish them for this outrage; and, as I told you, we killed some 200 men and women. I sometimes think our retaliation was not more rational or more like Christians than theirs."

"Will you please," said I, "tell me what sort of revenge would be like Christians."

He hesitated, and said it was a hard question to answer. "I never felt pleasantly about that affair," continued he; "I would not have killed her, if I had known she was a woman." I asked why he felt any more regret about killing a woman than a man. "I hardly know why, myself," answered he, "I don't suppose I should if it were a common thing for women to fight. But we are accustomed to think of them as not defending themselves; and there is something in every human heart, that makes a man unwilling to fight those who do not fight in return. It seems mean and dastardly, and a man cannot work himself up to it." "Then if one nation would not fight, another could not," said I. "What if a nation, instead of an individual, should make such an appeal to the manly feeling, which you say is inherent?" "I believe other nations would be ashamed to attack her," he replied. "It would take away all the glory and excitement of war, and the hardest soldier would shrink from it as from cold-blooded murder." "Such a peace establishment would be at once cheap and beautiful," rejoined I, and so we parted. [L. M. Child.

AFRICAN OSTRICH.

In the family of birds, the Ostrich holds the same relative position which the Elephant does in that of the quadrupeds, being unequalled in point of stature or size. Its immense bulk deprives it of the essential attribute of the bird, the power of flyng. The medium weight of the Ostrich is estimated at about 80 pounds, and it is a native only of the torrid regions of Africa and Arabia, and has never been known to breed out of the country which first produced it. There have been instances, however, of its producing eggs in France, at the Royal Menagerie, Versailles; but all artificial or other means failed to hatch them, although there is no natural or continued incubation necessary for that result in Africa or Arabia, the warmth of the native sands, on which the Ostrich deposits her eggs, being necessary, and alone sufficient for that purpose. From the striking peculiarities in its form, and strong resemblance, when travelling, to the ruminating animals, it received, and was only known to the ancient Greeks and Romans, as well as the nations of the east, by the name of the "Camel Bird."

The rich and graceful plumes of the Ostrich are most eagerly sought after, as furnishing one of the most elegant among the countless vanities of savage and civilized life. Among the native Africans and Arabs its skin is used for leather, its egg-shells for drink cups—and from ancient writers we learn, that whole nations have acquired the name of Struthophagis, (Ostrich-eaters,) from the preference they had manifested for the flesh of this bird. The Ostrich is of all animals the most voracious; it will swallow leather, bones, straw, grass, hair, and, it has been said, iron and stones, or in fact, almost anything that is given it.

PERUVIAN LAMA.

The Lama inhabits Peru and Chili; and, before the conquest of those countries by the Spaniards, was the only beast of burden known to the Indians. Its disposition is mild, gentle and tractable; like the Camel, they have the faculty of abstaining long from water, sometimes four or five days, and, like that animal, their food is coarse and trifling. Graceful and agile in their movements, and docile in their temper, they interest by their gentleness and beauty of form, and a group of admiring spectators is always to be observed before their domicil. They lie down to be loaded, and when weary, no blows can excite them to quicken their pace. They neither defend themselves with their feet nor teeth. When angry, they have no other method of revenging injuries, but by spitting. They can throw out their saliva to the distance of ten paces; and if it fall on the skin it raises an itching, accompanied with a slight inflammation. Their flesh is eaten, and said to be as good as mutton.

I CAN'T BEAR TO BE LAME.

'Said a little girl who was thus afflicted, "I can't bear to be lame, and go hobbling about like nobody else. I wish I could walk like you, Julia."

"I wish you could, Ellen," replied her little companion; "but it is not good to say you can't bear to be lame, because God made you so."

"O no, Julia! it was not God, but the nurse, when I was a baby."

"Well, that is different, to be sure," said the child; "but," looking thoughtfully, "I don't think it is right to say so, is it, cousin?"

"I think not," replied her cousin, who had overheard the conversation of the little girls. "Ellen means, I suppose, that she was not born lame, by saying that God did not make her lame; but you know that nothing can possibly happen to us without the permission of God, for he tells us in his word, that 'the very hairs of our heads are all numbered,' and that even a little 'sparrow cannot fall to the ground,' without his notice. Come hither, Ellen, and tell me if you ever read in the Bible of a little boy, who, like yourself, was made lame by his nurse? His father was the son of a king."

"O! I know," said Julia; "but I cannot recollect his name, it is such a curious one. His father was called Jonathan, Saul's son; and when the news came that they were both killed in battle, the nurse took up the little boy, to run away, and let him fall, and that made him lame."

"Yes; his name was Mephibosheth, and he was lame in both feet all the rest of his life. But we hear nothing of his murmuring or complaining; he seems to have had a remarkably happy and contented disposition, and was very grateful to good King David, who was so kind to him. Think of that little boy, my dear Ellen; and it will help you to be contented and thankful that you are not, like him, lame in both feet.

"It is scarcely possible for us ever to be placed in circumstances so distressing, or to have any affliction so heavy, as not to be able to think of some persons who are worse off than ourselves. Remember, my dear child, that discontented people can never be happy; and pray to God to make you contented, that you may be a happy little lame girl."

SINGULAR SACRIFICE.

In the winter of the year 1776, the Count and Countess Podotsky being on their way from Vienna to Cracow, the wolves, which are very numerous in the Carpathian mountains, and when the cold is very severe, are more bold and savage than usual, came down in hordes, and pursued the carriage between the towns of Osweik and Zator, the latter of which is only a few leagues from Cracow. Of two servants, one was sent before to bespeak post-horses; the other, whom the Count particularly esteemed for his fidelity, seeing the wolves come nearer and nearer, begged his master to permit him to leave them his horse, by which their rage would, in some measure, be satisfied, and they should gain time to reach Zator. The Count consented; the servant mounted behind the carriage, and let the horse go, which was seized by the wolves, and torn into a thousand pieces. Meantime, the travelers proceeded with all the speed they could, in hopes to reach the town, from which they were not very distant. But the horses were tired, and the wolves becoming more savage now that they had tasted blood, had almost overtaken the carriage. In this extreme necessity, the servant cried out, "There is only one means of deliverance; I will go and meet the wolves, if you will swear to provide as a father for my wife and children. I must perish; but while they fall upon me, you will escape." Podotsky hesitated to comply; but as there was no prospect of escape, he consented, and solemnly vowed, that if he would sacrifice himself for their safety, he would constantly provide for his family. The servant immediately got down, went to meet the wolves, and was devoured! The Count reached the gates of Zator, and was saved. The servant was a Protestant; his master a Catholic, and conscientiously kept his word.

PARTICULAR PROVIDENCE.

The doctrine of a particular providence is a doctrine fraught with the greatest consolation to mankind, who are born to sorrow. Not only is it that nothing can happen but God permits—nothing can happen but what he enjoins. The notion of God should not be, that he has lit up the sun, and given the winds power to roam through the world; but rather that his glance is in every beam, and his breath in every breeze. The idea should not be entertained, that after having given life to men, God concerns himself no more with his creatures; but rather that through his special interference is it that breath follows breath, and in every joy—in every hope which rises to cheer, and in every doubt which darkens, the hand of God may be discerned, producing out of a thousand seeming ills, and a thousand apparent discrepancies, not only a general, but an individual good.

And how much of consolation is there to a heart when deeply stricken with sorrow, to be able to feel that all afflictions are sent for a wise purpose, and that there is a bright kingdom hereafter, where pain shall have no entrance! It would go far to dry a mother's tears, which the death of her child has caused to flow, if she could be thus persuaded to regard the dealings of God. It would be to take half the bitterness from sorrow, if she could be made to feel that in allowing death to take her child, God had been dealing both kindly and gently, in that he has removed it from the world when the heart was innocent, and pain and sorrow scarcely known. [Dr. Gregory.

ANECDOTE OF WESLEY.

Joseph Bradford was for some years the traveling companion of Mr. Wesley, for whom he would have sacrificed health and even life; but to whom his will would never bend, except in meekness.

Joseph, said Mr. Wesley, one day, take these letters to the post.

B. I will take them after preaching, sir.

W. Take them now, Joseph.

B. I wish to hear you preach, sir, and there will be sufficient time for the post after service.

W. I insist upon your going now, Joseph.

B. I will not go at present.

W. You won't?

B. No sir.

W. Then you and I must part.

B. Very good, sir.

They sleep over it. Both were early risers. At four o'clock the next morning the refractory helper was accosted with, Joseph, have you considered what I said—that we must part?

B. Yes sir.

W. And must we part?

B. Please yourself, sir.

W. Will you ask my pardon, Joseph?

B. No sir.

W. You won't!

B. No sir.

W. Then I will ask yours, Joseph.

Poor Joseph was instantly melted; smitten as by the wand of Moses, when forth gushed the tears, like the water from the rock.

MILK PAINT.—A foreign correspondent of one of our exchange papers says that a paint has been used on the Continent with success, made from milk and lime, that dries quicker than oil paint, and has no smell. It was made in the following manner:—Take fresh curds and bruise the lumps on a stone, or an earthen pan or mortar, with a spatual or strong spoon. Then put them into a pot with a quantity of lime well slacked with water, to make it just thick enough to be kneaded. Stir this mixture without adding more water, and a colored fluid will soon be observed as a paint. It may be laid on with a brush with as much ease as varnish, and it dries very speedily. It must, however, be used the same day it is made, for if kept till next day it will be too thick; consequently no more must be mixed up at one time than can be laid on in a day. If different colors are required, any of the ochres, yellow or red ochre, or umber may be mixed with it in any proportion. Prussian blue would be changed by the lime. Two coats of this paint will be sufficient, and when quite dry it may be polished with a piece of woolen cloth, or similar substance, and it will become as bright as varnish. It will only do for inside work; but it will last longer if varnished over with the white of an egg.

MORE HELP TO THE FARMER.—Sulphuric acid, invaluable for many purposes, is coming into common use among English farmers. Some buy whole cart-loads of it. The old price was eight cents per pound, but it can now be had in Liverpool for three—plantinum receivers, though they cost $5,000, effecting a great saving, when substituted for glass in the manufacture. The production of crops remove the phosphate of lime from the soil—bones dissolved in sulphuric acid produce this phosphate, and the phosphoric acid so produced has been brought to bear upon the land with the most beneficial effects. Professor Liebig gives it as his opinion, that the commercial prosperity of a country may be estimated by the quantities of sulphuric acid it consumes; and Mr. Pursey, M. P., declared, in a lecture on it, last month, that he considers it no inadequate criterion of the degree of civilization. In Wiley & Putnam's new edition of Liebig, page 284, it is remarked that Ingenhouss proposed dilute sulphuric acid as a means of increasing the fertilty of soil. Sprinkled on calcareous soils gypsum is formed, but this is a costly manure—100 lbs. of concentrated sulphuric acid diluted with 1,000 lbs. of water being equivalent only to 176 lbs. of gypsum.

CUCUMBERS.—A writer in Blackwood, alluding to this vegetable, says that it was regarded as a great luxury by Sultan Mahoud II., who cultivated it with his own hands in the Seraglio gardens. 'Having one day perceived that some of his cucumbers were missing, he sent for his head gardener, and informed him that, should such a circumstance occur again, he would ordor his head to be cut off. The next day three more cucumbers had been stolen, upon which the gardener, to save his head, accused the pages of his highness of having committed the theft. These unhappy youths were immediately sent for, and having all declared themselves innocent, the Sultan, in order to discover the culprit, commanded them one after another to be disemboweled. Nothing was found in the stomach or entrails of the first six victims, but the autopsy of the seventh proved him to have been the guilty one.'

CHEERFULNESS.—It is better to tread the path of life cheerfully, skipping lightly over the thorns and briars that obstruct your way, than to sit down under every hedge lamenting your hard fate. The thread of a cheerful man's life spins out much longer than that of a man who is continually sad and desponding. Prudent conduct in the concerns of life is highly necessary; but if distress succeed, dejection and despair will not afford relief. The best thing to be done when evil comes upon us, is not lamentation, but action; not to sit and murmur, but to rise and seek the remedy.

TO DRESS RICE.—A lady recommends the following:—"Soak the rice in cold salt and water for seven hours; have ready a stew-pan with boiling water, throw in the rice, and let it boil briskly for ten minutes; then put it into a cullender, cover it up by the fire for a few minutes and then serve. The grains are double the usual size, and quite distinct from each other.

A volume of the Boston News Letter, containing some fifteen or twenty odd numbers, published in 1717 to 1725, was sold at Leonard's auction room, for $14 50. The bidding for the volume was started simultaneously by a dealer in second-hand books, at 12 1-2 cents, and by an antiquarian, at $1 50. The competition for the volume was quite spirited.

VARIETY.

We find in an English paper an account of an invention called an Itenerarium or Railway Compass. It will, at all times, show the speed of the engine, the distance to the next station, and the position of the train on the line. A chronometer connected with it, shows the railway time. It will note the time occupied at each station, and the speed of each mile, on a paper, which can be taken off and filed. One index on the dial points to the place which corresponds to the one on the railway; another indicates the speed; a third revolves once in 10,000 miles, showing what distance the engine has traveled. This instrument is moved by a separate wheel running on the rail, is not effected by breaks, and being illuminated at night is easily seen by the engineer. The experiment has been successfully tried, fully realizing the anticipations of the inventor.

The Unitarian Church in Ware, Mass, was struck by lightning during the shower about 5 P. M. on Wednesday. The fluid struck the spire, which converged to a point more than a hundred feet high—shattered it to fragments, ran down the inside post of the tower, splitting it throughout, entered the basement, and followed the stove-pipe its whole length, and went out at the opposite end of the building. In the basement, which is used as a vestry, were some eight or ten ladies, who had met as a sewing circle, and though the fluid passed the whole length of the room, and within eight feet of them, none of them were seriously injured.

We should like to see the newspaper that would please everybody. Such a thing never did nor never can have a place among the things of earth, yet thousands are astonished that the paper to which they are subscribers does not contain just such articles as they like to read best. One expects moral essays; another love tales and miscellany; another mirth and anecdotes; another looks for a sermon; while all wonder that their particular taste is not suited—never for a moment supposing that an editor caters for the mental appetites of thousands.

Mr. Baker, in a lecture on insects, lately delivered before the London Farmer's Club, stated that the ravages of the common woollen moth may be entirely prevented, in the following manner:—He said, "you have nothing to do but to place shallow boxes in your drawers, with a little turpentine in them; and as the turpentine evaporates and penetrates the cloth, the larvæ will protrude and be found dead on the surface."

Ex-Governor Edwards died at his residence in New-Haven, Ct., on Thursday, in the 68th year of his age. He was the son of the late Judge Piermont Edwards, brother of Judge Ogden Edwards, and father of the present Judge Henry P. Edwards, of this City. He has filled many offices of honor and trust, and among them Governor of the State of Connecticut, Speaker of the State Legislature, Member of Congress, and of the U. S. Senate.

They have an excellent way, says a Massachusetts paper, of keeping the boys at school in Wiscasset. The select men have ordered the arrest of all boys who may be loitering around the streets during school hours, saying they must either attend school or devote their time with diligence to some lawful employment.

The Philadelphians have the promise of an arrival in their harbor of almost as great a curiosity as the Chinese Junk. One Capt. William Adams left Wilmington, it seems, on Thursday morning, in what is called a "passenger gum-elastic sea-safety trunk," bound to Philadelphia, with provisions sufficient for three days. The trunk is 38 inches long by 20 inches broad, and as many deep.

A child of Mr. Charles Chapman, of Danbury, Conn., was poisoned on the 5th instant, by putting a visiting card in its mouth, which its mother had given it to play with. It died in forty-eight hours after. An analysis of a card showed that the enamel or coating was composed of carbonate of lead.

The profligate Duke of Wharton being one day in company with Swift, recounted several extravagances he had run through. Swift kindly observed to him: You had your frolics, my lord; let me now recommend one more to you; take a frolic to be virtuous, and my word for it, that one will do you more honor than all the other frolics of your whole life.

Gallio, the most profound philosopher of his age, when interrogated by the Inquisition as to his belief of a Supreme Being, replied, pointing to a straw on the floor of his dungeon, that from the structure of that object alone, he would infer with sincerity, the existence of an intelligent Creator.

A schoolmaster in Cornwall, advertising his establishment, says: 'Every boarder must be supplied with a Bible and a Prayer book, a knife and fork, three towels, and a silver dessert-spoon; all of which, except the books, become the proprietor's perquisites on the pupils, quitting the school.'

A writer of the last century quaintly observed, that when the cannon of the princes began war, the canons of the church were destroyed. 'It was,' says he, 'first mitre that governed the world, then nitre—first St. Peter, and then salt-peter!'

Cobbett says—"Women, so amiable in themselves, are never so amiable as when they are useful; and, as for beauty, though men say to fall in love with girls at play, there is nothing to make them stand to their love like seeing them at work."

I never knew a scolding person that was able to govern a family. What makes people scold? Because they cannot govern themselves. How then, can they govern others? Those, who are generally calm. They are prompt and resolute, but steady and mild.

An Englishman named John Higman escaped from Plainfield, N. J., the other day, with Phœbe Morrison, a girl about 17 years old. Higman left a wife and three children—one of the children dangerously ill, and another only three weeks old.

Extensive privacy and constant retirement are apt to make men out of humor with others, and too fond of themselves.

Diogenes, being asked of what beast the bite was most dangerous, answered, "Of wild beasts, that of a slanderer; of tame, that of a flatterer."

THE DAILY NATIONAL WHIG is published in the city of Washington, every day, at three o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted, and served to subscribers in the City, at the Navy Yard, in Georgetown, in Alexandria, and in Baltimore, the same evening, at six and a quarter cents a week, payable to the sole agent of the Whig, G. L. Gillchrist, Esq., or his order. It is also mailed to any part of the United States for $4 per annum, or $2 for six months, payable in advance. Advertisements of ten lines or less inserted one time for 50 cents, two times for 75 cents, three times for $1, one week for $1 75, two weeks for $2 75, one month for $4, two months for $7, three months for $10, six months for $16, one year for $20, payable always in advance.

The "National Whig" is what its name indicates. It speaks the sentiments of the Whig party of the Union on every question of public policy. It advocates the election to the Presidency of Zachary Taylor, subject to the decision of a Whig National Convention. It makes war to the knife upon all the measures and acts of the Administration deemed to be adverse to the interests of the country, and exposes without fear or favor the corruptions of the party in power. Its columns are open to every man in the country, for the discussion of political or any other questions.

In addition to politics, a large space in the National Whig will be devoted to publications upon Agriculture, Mechanics, and other useful arts, Science in general, Law, Medicine, Statistics, &c. Choice specimens of American and Foreign Literature will also be given, including Reviews, &c. A weekly list of the Patents issued by the Patent Office will likewise be published—the whole forming a complete family newspaper.

The "Weekly National Whig," one of the largest newspapers in the United States, is made up from the columns of the Daily National Whig, and is published every Saturday, for the low price of $2 per annum, payable in advance. A double sheet of eight pages will be given whenever the psess of matter shall justify it.

The Memoirs of General Taylor, written expressly for the National Whig, are in course of publication. They commenced with the second number, a large number of copies of which have been printed, to supply calls for back numbers.

CHAS. W. FENTON,
Proprietor of the National Whig.

P. S. All daily, weekly, and semi-weekly papers in the United States are requested to insert this advertisement once a week for six months, noticing the price for publishing the same at the bottom of the advertisement, and send the paper containing it to the National Whig office, and the amount will be duly remitted. Our editorial brethren are also requested to notice the National Whig in their reading columns.

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25
EXTRAS PER TERM.
Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

EDITED BY GEORGE B. UTTER. "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD." PRINTED BY EDWIN G. CHAMPLIN.

VOL. IV.—NO. 8. NEW YORK, FIFTH-DAY, AUGUST 12, 1847. WHOLE NO. 164.

The Sabbath Recorder.

☞ In the letter from our missionaries, which we published week before last, allusion was made to a discussion of the Sabbath question which took place in the Bible Class established among the passengers of the Houqua. The question was: "Is there evidence in the Scriptures, that the Sabbath has been changed from the seventh to the first day of the week?" Mr. Lord, the Baptist missionary, took the affirmative, and advocated that view under the three general heads of the Legal argument, the Apostolic argument, and the argument or testimony from the Fathers. Mr. Carpenter, the Seventh-day Baptist missionary, replied; and we publish below that part of his reply which relates to the legal argument:—

REPLY

To that part of Bro. Lord's Argument for the Change of the Sabbath, which relates to the Divine Law.

It is contended by our brother, that the sabbatic institution is twofold in its nature—moral and positive; that the moral part is all contained in the injunction, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." This, he says, is binding on all men; while the positive part of the command is binding only on the Jews.

To make any good use of such a distinction as moral and positive in the fourth commandment, it devolves on our brother to point out definitely how much of it is moral, and how much positive. What is moral, according to the definition given, must be discernable from the light of nature. But the light of nature does not teach me that one day in seven, rather than one in six, or one in ten, ought to be set apart to rest and devotion. Indeed, it does not teach me that the whole of any day should be spent in this way. It merely teaches me that I ought to rest when weary, and devote some time, perhaps some stated time, to the worship of my Creator. This, it seems to me, is the utmost I could gain from reason, unaided by revelation. If so, then it follows that not only the particular day specified, but the proportion of time also, enjoined indirectly in the law, is positive in its nature. I object to the propriety of such a distinction; but if our brother insists upon it, let us see where it will lead him. He claims that the positive part is done away, and that the moral part is binding. I ask, What is the amount of that part which is binding? After taking away the positive part of the command, what is there left in the shape of a weekly rest? Verily, nothing at all! In casting away the positive part of the command, we have disannulled the law of the weekly Sabbath completely. And if we have disannulled it, why turn round from this sacrilegious act, and attempt to borrow its authority in order to enforce the observance of the first day of the week? If it cannot enforce the seventh day, which it seems to enforce, because it is so shorn of its strength, by losing its positive character, that it has no form, nor power, nor any thing definable left, then how can it enforce another day, to which it has not even the semblance of a relation? Thus it becomes evident, that the seventh day cannot be taken from the law of the fourth commandment without producing results sufficiently alarming, it would seem, to impose a check upon the presumption that would prompt to such an undertaking.

Again, let it be required to define the institution of the Sabbath. In what does it consist? In God's blessing and sanctifying the seventh day. The position taken by our brother seems to imply that God first set apart a weekly rest, and then, by a separate act, designated the day on which it should occur. But this was not the case. And how can he suppose that the institution can be retained, and the day changed, since God's blessing the particular day specified, constituted that day the institution in question? To make a very plain matter, if possible, still more plain, let us suppose that, in order to the existence of a public sanctuary, there must be, in the first place, a material building erected; then that building must be dedicated to the worship of the Most High. We have now before us the sanctuary of God. Now if any man will assert, that the material, gross building, being merely temporary in its nature, is not essential at all to the sanctuary, then we will suppose that the sacrilegious torch of the incendiary is applied to it, and it is consumed to ashes. What now becomes of the sanctuary? The building is gone, but is all that is essential to the sanctuary left? What becomes of the dedication? Does it remain? And can it be applied to a new building, erected on the same spot? No; the dedication is not the sanctuary. And if it was, it could not be applied to another building.

The impropriety of attempting to wrest from the sabbatic institution, the seventh day, will also appear from its commemorative character. This feature of the institution, our brother seems to have overlooked. The first day of the week is commended to our notice, with a reason assigned why it should be observed. That reason is the resurrection of our Saviour. The first day institution is based on such a foundation. Hence it is commemorative of the resurrection. As such, it is continually alluded to in the prayers and devotional exercises of those who observe it. The Sabbath also is a commemorative institution. God blessed the seventh day, because that in it he had rested, &c. He rested from all his work. Hence the sabbatic institution serves to commemorate, not only the rest of the Creator, but also the work from which he rested. It is an institution of weekly recurrence; hence its tendency is to keep continually before the minds of men, the great truth that God created the world. And as the contemplation of his works serves to impress the mind with a sense of the wisdom, goodness, and majesty of God, it is easy to see the fitness as well as the importance of the Sabbath, considered as a commemorative institution. It is not claimed that this is the only design of the institution, but it is the only reason which God saw fit to assign, when he gave it to our race. He doubtless foresaw, and he revealed it to his servant Daniel, that at a distant day a beast would rise up and speak great words against the Most High, and think to change times and laws. It is a notorious fact, that the Romish Church claims to have changed the Sabbath.

As God has seen fit to assign a reason why he set apart the seventh day, it is certainly wise for us to inquire whether that reason remains the same, or has ceased to exist. The reason embraces two important ideas: first, that God has set his creatures an example of sabbatizing; secondly, that He is the Creator of the world. In regard to the first, so long as there are circumstances which incline man to secularize the Sabbath day, so long there will be occasion for them to be referred to the example of the Creator in resting on that day. Foreseeing all the contempt that, in after time, would be heaped upon the day that He was pleased to honor, God, in his wisdom, saw fit to place upon it his own broad seal. He conferred upon it the high sanction of his own example—a sanction sufficiently conspicuous and authoritative, it would seem, to arrest the attention of all who inquire for his will, and not their own, on this subject. In regard to the second idea embraced in the reason upon which the institution is based, I remark, that the being and perfections of God, which are brought to view by this commemorative institution, lie at the very foundation of all true religion. As long, therefore, as it is profitable for men to contemplate the being and attributes of God, so long will this reason remain. And so long as there is a tendency in man to relapse into Atheism and Idolatry, so long it will be important that he should be frequently reminded of the fact, that God created the world. It is not easy to see how men could so far forget their Creator, as to become Atheists, or fall down before dumb idols, while they should pay respectful attention to an institution that would weekly remind them of the great First Cause of all things.

The Sabbath was instituted before Abraham was born; therefore it is not Jewish. It was instituted before the fall of our first parents; therefore it is not ceremonial. It did not result from the relation which God sustains to us, of Redeemer, but from the relation which he sustains to us and to all mankind, of Creator; therefore it cannot be classed with types and shadows, which belong to the remedial dispensation. And if it cannot be classed with them, we infer that it cannot cease with them. It is classed with those primitive, fundamental institutions, which are essential to all social order and happiness.

My brother objects to the view above given of the commemorative character of the sabbatic institution, because it was urged upon the Israelites for another reason, viz. their deliverance from Egyptian bondage. Before this objection can have any weight, it must be shown, that when we have two reasons for doing a thing, the second destroys the first!

My brother wishes to use the authority of the law of God, in order to enforce the observance of the first day of the week. But if the objections already considered were not in his way, still there would be another very prominent objection. The language of the fourth commandment is not well suited to his purpose. His pious feelings might be shocked ever so much by the secular use made of the first day of the week; but as often as he should attempt to reclaim his offending brother, and resort to the law for this purpose, if he should allow that law to speak out plainly, it would utter its deafening and terrific peals of condemnation in his own ears, while it would leave his brother untouched. For with the authority of God it would proclaim the decree, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work."

If the first day of the week had been proved to be the Sabbath under the present dispensation, then it would have been strictly a Christian ordinance, and not adapted to the exigencies of man. It could be properly enforced only on believers. A man would have no more right to compel his children, or the stranger within his gates, to observe it, than he would to compel them to be baptized, or to partake of the Lord's Supper. But men need to feel the force of some law upon this subject, before they become Christians; some law which should have a tendency to bring them within the reach of those influences which should lead them to Christ. Such a law is the fourth commandment. This can be enforced upon the consciences of all men, with the same propriety as can those other nine precepts with which it is associated.

In pleading for the original Sabbath, let it not be supposed, as is sometimes ignorantly affirmed, that we are under the same regulations in regard to it as were the Jews. Under the former dispensation, if a man cursed his father or his mother he was put to death. The same doom awaited the Sabbath-breaker. But now, God has informed us that he has appointed a day in which He will judge the world, and give to every man according to his work.

From what has been said, it appears—

1st. That, admitting the distinction insisted on by our brother, the moral part of the fourth command amounts to nothing that is tangible.

2d. If the positive part is ceremonial also, then the command is disannulled, and he should not attempt to use its authority.

3d. The command is not ceremonial in its character.

4th. The seventh day is essential to the institution of the weekly Sabbath.

5th. The Sabbath, being a commemorative institution, the reason on which it is founded, remains in full force.

6th. The Sabbath, and the day called the Lord's day, being both commemorative, and commemorating different events, cannot be identical.

7th. The language of the fourth command is not adapted to enforce the observance of the first day of the week.

8th. If the change contended for were proved, the new Sabbath, being strictly a Christian ordinance, like baptism and the Lord's Supper, could not be enforced directly on all mankind.

9th. In pleading the law of the Sabbath, we are not obliged to admit the whole Jewish ritual, nor any part of it.

10th. Our brother, who secularizes the Sabbath, can resort to the fourth command to justify his practice of sabbatizing, with the same propriety with which a worshiper of idols can resort to the second command to justify his idolatry.

ARABIAN TRADITION.

TERAH, the father of Abraham, was a vender of idolatrous images, and Abraham was brought up in that worship, but, discovering the true God, he asked the ages of those who came to worship the images. Upon receiving the answer to his inquiries, he was accustomed to remark, "How is it possible that a man sixty years of age (or as the case might be) should adore a God made but yesterday." On one occasion, an old woman brought an offering of flour to the images; Abraham took the flour, broke all the idols, with the exception of the largest, in the hands of which he placed a stick, and, on his father's return, said that an old woman had brought an offering to the gods, who, having disputed who should eat first, the largest had taken a stick and broken the smaller ones. His father, disbelieving the story, complained to Nimrod, the idolatrous king of Assyria, who ordered Abraham to be brought before him. Being conducted into his presence, Nimrod exclaimed, "Let us worship fire." "No," answered Abraham, "rather let us worship water, the quencher of fire." "Let us worship water," replied the monarch. "Rather," retorted the other, "the clouds, because they discharge the water." "Let it be so." "No," was the reply, "we ought rather to adore the wind, because it disperses the clouds." "So be it," replied Nimrod. "Ought we not to worship Him who rules the wind?" replied the son of Terah. Nimrod was so enraged at Abraham's sallies, that he ordered him to be thrown into a fiery furnace; but our ancestor came out unhurt, and without a hair of his head injured.

NAZARENE WOMEN.

Miss Plumly, in her journal of travels in Palestine, gives this description of the women in the city of Nazareth. There had been a wedding on the afternoon of her arrival; and in the evening the bride, with a bundle of clothes on her head, was escorted by a troop of girls, with music, round the town to the house of her husband, where they remained clapping their hands, and with the aid of a few drums, making a great noise until a late hour.

The Syrian Greek women are beyond comparison the loveliest in the world;—we saw many of those of Nazareth, who came down with their pitchers to the fountain Nahor for water, in whom were visibly united all that painters may endeavor to picture—all that poets dream. Their features combine the perfect proportion of the Greek model, with the character and expression of the daughters of Israel;—their figures, the united delicacy and voluptuousness of form, which the finest statue possesses. The costume of those we saw this evening, was well suited to their wearers. Their long hair, which was plaited, fell over their shoulders, and was in many instances ornamented with great numbers of gold sequins, and some pearls; in others, flowers of brilliant hues replaced the "pearl and gold." But all wore the full, blue trowsers, drawn tight at the ancle, (which not unfrequently was encircled with silver bracelets,) the petticoat reaching only to the knees, and the under vest open at the breast. It is neither bodice, tunic, or jacket, but something between each.

THE LOCKED TREASURE.

Pray, mother, just unlock this box,
  This is the tiny key;
And there's something here, you know,
  I long have wished to see.
Don't weep, mamma—I'll only look,
  Surely 'twill give no pain,
And then will lock the treasures up,
  And put them back again.

My dear, the contents of this box
  Most precious relics are;
For it contains sweet Jessie's locks,
  And likeness of Papa!

With trembling hand she raised the lid;
  The child in wonder gazed;
He smoothed the locks, and to his lips
  His father's likeness raised.
As gently down he drew the lid,
  He felt his mother's tear;
Again he asked, "Why, mother, weep?
  There's nothing living here.

You tell me I should never grieve
  For what God takes away;
You bid me say, "His will be done,"
  When I kneel down to pray;
So, mother, let me wipe your tears:
  Look at my pretty toy:
The mother felt the keen rebuke,
  And clasped her darling boy!

MUSIC AMONG THE BASSOOTOOS.

A friend of the Paris Society of Evangelical Missions, united in bonds of amity to many of our dear Missionaries in Africa, and in particular to M. Casalis, has been so kind as to send him an organ, as well to gratify the Bassootoos of his church and to contribute to the improvement of sacred music among them, as to give to the missionary a special proof of his Christian affection. Many friends of missions at Paris have aided in the purchase of this organ, and M. M. Keck and Lautre have been charged with its transportation to Africa, and its delivery to the missionary at Thaba Bassiou. We will now submit to our readers an extract from the letter in which the latter acknowledged the receipt of the organ, as it contains some interesting details respecting the effect produced by the instrument upon the natives, and also respecting the state of music among the Bassootoos. The letter of which we are speaking, is dated September 20, 1845:—

"The day when your organ arrived at Thaba Bassiou, was a veritable holy-day. Our Christians ran together to hear those harmonious notes, which resounded for the first time in my house. Madame Keck, knowing how to play upon it, executed successively some of my favorite airs, which were accompanied by the voice. The good Moussetse asked if this was the harp of which David speaks so frequently. Moshesh was dumb with admiration; and the profound sighs which escaped from his breast testified to the interior emotion which he experienced. Music has, indeed, great power over this people. Pushuli, a brother of Moshesh, being strongly opposed to the Gospel, has often said, 'I fear, above every thing else, the songs of the Christians. They are full of tears, and I can never listen to them without feeling unhappy; while I hear, at the same time, a secret voice, telling me that the Christians alone know the truth.' When any thing weighs upon the heart of Moshesh, he assembles the school-children, and makes them sing. At such a time it is very interesting to see this Chief, whose voice has been blunted by the war-cry of his people, beating time, and entering into the feelings of the little scholars!

"The natives attach so much importance to singing, that when reïnforcements arrive, they very soon ascertain whether the new missionaries have a good voice and love music. Those who reside at stations where the sacred music is not good, consider the defect as a great trial; and they have too much simplicity not to speak of it openly. Still the Bassootoos have not a very delicate ear. In this respect they are infinitely behind the Hottentots, whose musical taste you have doubtless heard greatly commended. It is with the utmost difficulty that we have been able to make this people perceive the difference between a full tone and a semitone. Nevertheless, this difficulty constantly grows less and less; and in the case of children it does not exist; which seems to prove that the ears of the adults have been spoiled by their national songs. And what songs! You would think you were hearing a concert of bears! Certain monotonous vociferations, accompanied by the most ungraceful gestures; and nothing which speaks to the heart, or expresses a feeling of humanity!

"The instrumental music is not more advanced. The women prize the moroupa very highly. This is a kind of drum, consisting of a calabash or an earthen pot, over which a skin has been tightly drawn; and they beat this skin with the back of their hands. The men have the lesiba and the toumo. The first is a small bow stretched by means of a cord, like the strings of a violin. At one extremity of the bow, this cord terminates in a flat piece of quill. When they play on the instrument, they place the end to which the quill is attached between the fingers, half shut, and the palm of the hand, in such a way as to form a cavity below. The player then applies his lips to his fingers thus disposed, and breathes strongly, which causes the quill to vibrate; and this vibration, communicated to the cord, produces a piercing sound, like that which a novice draws from a clarionet.

"The toumo is a bow, similar to the lesiba, but it has no quill, and the convex part of the bow is surmounted by a calabash, having a hole in it. In playing on this instrument, one end of it is held by the left hand, in such a manner that the thumb and fore-finger may be left free, and may seize the string at will. The other hand is armed with a small rod, for the purpose of striking the cord. The sound is doubled by the calabash, and the player can vary it up to a certain point by seizing the strings in different places. The tone resembles that of the guitar, when it is struck in the same way. The natives are extravagantly fond of this instrument. They tell a story of the old Chief Gaika, who one day heard an English lady play on the piano, and then told her, very soberly, that he had something which 'sung' far better. The lady was a little piqued at seeing her favorite instrument treated with such neglect by a savage, when she expected him to be thrown into ecstasies, and begged him to exhibit his wonder. The Chief went in search of his toumo, and returned with an air of triumph, saying, 'Here is something which beats your long box!' You see that we have made some progress at Thaba Bassiou, inasmuch as your organ has excited very great admiration." [Le Petit Messager.

CONFUCIUS.

The influence of this celebrated Chinese sage upon his country, which embraces one third part of the population of our globe, has been the subject of an elaborate article in the Bibliotheca Sacra, from the pen of Rev. Mr. Tracy, a missionary in that quarter of the world. The concluding paragraph, copied below, indicates that the influence of Confucius is not wholly adverse to Christian efforts for the diffusion of the gospel.

"1. It is probably owing to his influence, that education is so general, and reading so common among the Chinese. Schools are numerous, and their importance is appreciated. They are glad to have them noticed, and think it a work of benevolence to establish and support them. I have frequently visited schools established and taught by pagan Chinese, for the purpose of giving the scholars Christian instruction; and have always been well received, and permitted to address and question them as long as I pleased. Christian missionaries will be able to establish schools among the Chinese to great advantage; and probably may often bring those already in operation under their influence, at a small expense, and find them good places for preaching the gospel, both to the pupils and their parents.

"2. He inculcated universal philanthropy. All within four seas,' said he, 'are brothers;' and brothers, he insists, should live in harmony and kindness towards each other. This favors the residence of missionaries among the Chinese; and their conduct in seeking the welfare of their 'brothers' in China, may be shown to be in accordance with the teachings of the sage.

"3. He confined his instructions to things pertaining to the present life, and left unsupplied the wants of the soul. The Chinese have, consequently, adopted parts of the religious systems of other nations with which they have become acquainted; but their attachment to them does not appear to be very strong. They feel, though not very deeply, the need of some religion; and as they have none, either in the books of Confucius or the system of superstition, which have come in from other countries, that is pure or reasonable enough to satisfy them, we may expect that they will be, at least, less indisposed to consider the claims of Christianity, than they otherwise would have been."

PREACHING IN THE 16TH CENTURY.

It is a question whether the more homely manner of preaching in the sixteenth century should ever have been given up! Dr. Johnson, we are told by Boswell, predicted, that when the Scotch clergy should give up that manner, religon would soon decay in that country. As an illustration of this conjecture of our English oracle, a late writer assures us, "that such of the clergy of Scotland as have participated least in the literary progress of the country, and whose manner of preaching has more of the last age than the present, retain the greatest popularity, and (amidst an unprecedented number of seceders,) have suffered least by the desertion of their hearers. And it is also an inflexible truth, of which we may find many examples nearer home, that though no preacher should ever descend to the disgusting cant and coarseness of language which have often deformed the pages of our predecessors, yet the purest doctrines of the gospel, being too highly embellished by art, or divested of their more simple phraseology, are not received by common capacities as evangelical truth, or the oracles of God.

OPEN COMMUNION.—The following paragraph appeared originally, we believe, in the New-York Baptist Register. It strikes us as giving a somewhat overdrawn picture. But there is no doubt a great deal of occasion for similar complaints:—

"The plan of open communion is destructive to Baptist churches, as is abundantly proved by its effects in Great Britain. The views of Robert Hall have so spread in that kingdom as nearly to destroy the identity of the Baptist denomination. In many Baptist churches, once regular, but now open communion, the immersion of believers is despised and derided; and if a candidate for admission into any of them, conscientiously wishes to be immersed, he has to be baptized as stealthily as possible, and generally by twilight, for fear of offending the sprinkled members. While infant sprinkling is practiced openly to gratify the pedo-baptist members, believer's baptism has to be administered almost secretly, for fear that the church will be stigmatized as strict and bigoted. A pastor of one of the Baptist churches in England, himself a professed Baptist, but his wife a pedo-baptist, allows pedo-baptist members of the church to have their children sprinkled by pedo-baptist ministers in his own meeting-house, and even his own children are there brought forward and sprinkled. Even the church to which the Rev. Andrew Fuller so faithfully and successfully preached, is rapidly becoming pedo-baptist. The present pastor is unable to stem the current, and there is reason to fear that after his decease, the church may be easily induced to settle a pedo-baptist minister as pastor."

THE WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

[Prepared from a copy of the printed Minutes.]

The Seventh-day Baptist Western Association held its Annual Session with the church in Independence, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the 23d, 24th, and 25th days of June, 1847. The Introductory Discourse was preached by Eld. Thomas E. Babcock, from 1 John, 4: 10—"Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his son to be the propitiation for our sins." After the discourse, the Association was duly organized by the appointment of the following officers: N. V. Hull, President; E. A. Green and D. R. Stillman, Secretaries.

The Letters from the Churches gave a truly cheering account of their state. A majority of them have enjoyed revivals during the past year, which have resulted in not only an increase of their numbers, but of their zeal in the cause of God. A few, however, complain of spiritual death, and one or two of internal difficulties. From the statistics published in the Minutes, we learn that during the associational year 154 persons have been added to the churches by baptism, and 66 by letter. The Association now includes seventeen churches, with 1,769 members. A new church was reported as having been formed in part from the First Church in Alfred. Those who formed it left their old associates in perfect harmony.

Two delegates from the Central Association were present, viz. Russel G. Burdick and David Maxson. Eld. James H. Cochran, who attended the Central Association as a delegate, was also present, and made a report of his visit. He stated that the Central Association contemplated printing in a tract form a short argument addressed to the observers of the first day, in favor of our claims, presented by James Bailey. A collection was taken to assist in defraying the expense of such publication.

The Domestic Missionary Operations of the Association do not seem to have been carried on very extensively. Labor has been performed to some extent, however, by Br'n Rowse Babcock, Thomas E. Babcock, and Leman Andrus. Considerable has been done also within the bounds of the Association for the Foreign Mission. A sermon upon the subject of Foreign Missions was preached during the session of the Association, by Eld. N. V. Hull, and a collection was taken up.

The subject of Ministerial Education was brought before the Association, and after due consideration, a Committe of five was appointed to correspond with ministering brethren in other parts of the denomination, and secure if possible an Educational Course for the Ministry, suited to the entire denomination. This Committe consists of N. V. Hull, J. H. Cochran, W. C. Kenyon, L. Andrus, and T. E. Babcock, who are to report at the next meeting of the Association.

Eld. Daniel Babcock, from Wisconsin, was present, and stated that the churches in that Territory were about to establish an Association, to be called the Seventh-day Baptist North-Western Association, and desired delegates to meet with them for that purpose on the 8th of July. His request was complied with, and Br'n Thomas E. Babcock and A. W. Coon were appointed.

Several resolutions were introduced by a Committee appointed for the purpose, discussed by various members of the Association, and adopted. They are as follows:—

1. Whereas, we consider the Sabbath Recorder to be a valuable auxiliary in publishing and circulating the general truths of the Gospel, and especially for enforcing the claims of the Sabbath; therefore,

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend the Churches to take every measure which may be calculated to extend the circulation of that paper.

2. Whereas, in our opinion, Slavery, as it exists in the United States, is a violation of the laws of God and subversive of the natural and inalienable rights of men; therefore,

Resolved, That we consider it to be the duty of the Churches, and of individual Christians, to take such measures as to them may appear the most likely to result in its immediate and total overthrow.

3. Whereas, in the opinion of this Association, the institution of Odd-Fellows, and other Secret Societies, are opposed to the spirit of the Gospel and the perpetuity of the Church, and tend to the overthrow of civil government and social order; therefore,

Resolved, That this Association recommend to the Churches to solemnly protest against the union of any of their members with such Societies.

4. Whereas, we consider the spirit of war, (especially offensive war,) is in direct opposition to the principles of the Gospel, which inculcates love and good will to men; therefore,

Resolved, That we deprecate the anti-christian spirit which has involved us in war with a neighboring nation, and we earnestly recommend to the Churches to discountenance every measure which may be calculated to encourage such a spirit, and to use their endeavors to bring on that happy time when the "swords shall be beat into ploughshares, and the spears into pruning hooks, and nations shall learn war no more."

5. Resolved, That while we are using our endeavors to put a stop to the outward manifestations of the corrupt nature of man, we consider it absolutely necessary that we, as Christians, should cultivate spirituality and a deep and thorough work of grace personally, without which our efforts as Christians will be rendered to a great extent nugatory.

6. Resolved, That the Western Valley is an extensive field of missionary labor, and has claims on the missionary enterprise of this Association.

7. Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with our oppressed brethren in Pennsylvania, that we take a heart-felt interest in their struggle for liberty, and that we pledge ourselves to lend them pecuniary aid if it is necessary to carry their case up to the Supreme Court of the United States.

8. Resolved, That we respectfully suggest to this Association the propriety of specifying a course of preparatory studies for the Ministry, such as they can recommend and approve.

9. Resolved, That we consider it necessary to increase our exertions in missionary operations, if we expect or desire God's blessing to rest upon us as a people.

10. Resolved, That we do most heartily sympathize with those who, in different parts of our country, are devoted especially to the promotion of moral purity and the preservation of every virtuous emotion of the heart, and that we urge upon all the ministering brethren in the Association to make the seventh command of the Decalogue, a subject of explanation at least once each year before the congregations of their charge.

The first of the foregoing resolutions was advocated by J. H. Cochran, H. P. Burdick, and N. V. Hull; the second by J. H. Cochran, R. G. Burdick, L. Andrus, A. A. F. Randolph, D. Babcock, and N. V. Hull; the third by A. W. Coon, J. H. Cochran, L. Andrus, and E. A. Green; the fourth by D. E. Maxson, A. A. F. Randolph, J. H. Cochran, and S. Rider; the fifth by N. V. Hull and L. Andrus; the sixth by H. P. Burdick and A. W. Coon; the seventh by L. Andrus, J. H. Cochran, and R. Green; the ninth by J. H. Cochran, L. Andrus, H. P. Burdick, and R. Babcock; the tenth by W. C. Kenyon and E. P. Larkin.

After a session of three days, the Association adjourned to meet with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Wirt, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the fourth day of the week before the last Sabbath in June, 1848, at 10 o'clock A. M.

ELD. JONATHAN DUNHAM.

Jonathan Dunham, an early pastor of the Piscataway Seventh-day Baptist Church, was born in Piscataway, near the city of New Brunswick, N. J., in 1694. He was the son of Eld. Edmund Dunham, the first pastor of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in that place. Being the son of a minister of the Gospel, we may suppose that his early education was of a religious character, and from the ancient records, we find that he embraced religion when young, and received baptism and admission into the church by the administration of his father. In the year 1734, he was chosen and ordained to the office of Deacon, which station he filled for several years. While officiating in that capacity, the church called him to the improvement of his gift, by way of publicly explaining the Word. His father, their former pastor, being now dead, the little church was in a destitute condition. From 1734 until 1745 he continued to preach to them as a licentiate. The reason why he was not called to ordination sooner, is supposed to have been a diversity of sentiment in the church. In 1745, he was called to ordination, and to take the oversight of the church. He was sent for ordination to a Yearly Meeting held at a place called French Creek, in Pennsylvania, about twenty miles from Philadelphia. We learn from the church records, that he was ordained by Elders Williams and Noble. Although he was advanced in life before he received ordination, yet experience, a strong mind, a good store of acquired knowledge, and a robust constitution, enabled him, with the blessing of God, to be an able and useful minister of the New Testament. He preached much and wrote much. I have recently found in the possession of one of his descendants a bundle of his manuscripts, which have been presented to me, some of which I intend to copy for publication. They are letters which he had written to individuals upon different subjects, and sketches of sermons which have the appearance of having been used in the pulpit. Among the letters is one to Joseph Stennett of London, written in 1752. He published a work on the subject of the Sabbath, which some of our aged friends remember; but at present not a copy of it is to be found, although I have made much inquiry, wishing to obtain one to deposit in the Tract Society's Library.

In addition to his calling as a minister, he was a farmer, tanner, and shoemaker. Upon the farm he occupied may now be seen some of the remains of the old tan-yard. It is said that after he entered the ministry he was a close student, for a laboring and business man. Being a very conscientious Christian, and very tenacious of his own religious sentiments, he applied himself closely, that he might be enabled to defend himself against the attacks of the gainsayer, and impart the truths he loved to others. The church was considerably enlarged during his administration. Previous to his entering the ministry, they had always worshiped in private dwellings, but they soon after built them a comfortable meeting-house, which is still in existence, though used for a barn. Mr. Dunham lived to see his country redeemed from oppression's yoke, though not to see it enjoy national peace. God blessed him with a numerous offspring, including most of the present members of the church of which he was the worthy pastor. During his lifetime he selected a very handsome spot on his farm and fenced it in as a burying place for the dead. It occupies nearly one acre of ground. Many of his descendants lie in that peaceful spot. It is known by the name of the Dunham burying-ground. Having lived to see a numerous and respectable offspring around him, and having provided a resting place for them and himself after the toils of life are over, and after waiting patiently for his Master to call him home, yet the call came to him in an unexpected way. The British army being encamped near his house, and the small pox prevailing among them, he caught the disease, and died, and was buried in the spot he had selected; where his grave is now to be seen with a tomb-stone bearing the following inscription:—

REV. JONATHAN DUNHAM,
Who died March 10, 1777, aged 83 years.

Angels may speak him—Oh! not we,
Whose worth this congregation see,
But for our loss wer't in our power,
We'd weep an everlasting shower.

SABBATH-BREAKING.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Some twelve or eighteen months since, some of your Brothers of the Type in the Empire Metropolis, at that distance from the scene, trumpeted the drowning of two persons who attempted to cross the Susquehanna, at Harrisburg, in time of a high freshet, after the destruction of the bridge,—on a Snnday,—as a just punishment for "Sabbath-Breaking." Will any of the same itching prints return the compliment, and append the following extract from a late Harrisburgh paper, with the above caption superadded, that the public may form a correct judgment of these matters for themselves?

W. M. F.

Mournful Casualty—Two Persons Drowned.—On Saturday afternoon last, Messrs. John Sourbeck, Christian Kendig, Jonathan Novinger, and a Mr. Graham, went fishing in the Susquehanna, at Dauphin, in a skiff. They had not got far into the river before the skiff ran upon a rock. In getting it off, three, Messrs. Sourbeck, Kendig and Graham, got upon the rock, where Mr. Graham slipped, and endeavoring to save himself, he caught hold of Mr. Sourbeck, and pulled him into the water. A struggle ensued to save themselves by the boat, which was upset in the attempt, when all three of them were obliged to save themselves the best way they could. Mr. Sourbeck, who could not swim, immediately sunk. Mr. Graham could swim, and made for the shore, but sunk before he reached it. Mr. Novinger clung to the boat until he was rescued. Mr. Kendig remained on the rock until he was taken off by a boat from shore.

Two of the four were thus suddenly launched into eternity within a few moments after they had left their friends on an excursion more of amusement than of utility. Mr. Sourbeck was a man over fifty years of age, and extensively known, having for many years kept a tavern at the west end of the Harrisburg Bridge; he was keeping a public house at Dauphin at the time of his death. Mr. Graham was from Perry county, near Newport, we are informed, and was attached to the Engineer corps engaged in locating the Pennsylvania Railroad. They have both left families to lament their loss.

Put that and that together, too!

Just as I was folding the foregoing to dispatch it, the Philadelphia Ledger was laid on my table, and my eyes rested on the following announcement:—

Church Destroyed by Lightning.—Yesterday (Sunday) afternoon, about 4 1-2 o'clock, during the thunder shower, the German Lutheran Church, (St. Paul's,) at the corner of Brown and St. John streets, was struck by lightning and destroyed. The electric fluid attracted to the steeple passed into the interior of the church at its base, and the fire communicating with the organ, which was situated immediately under it, the whole of the southern portion of the building, with the steeple, was in a blaze in a short time. The wind at the time blew violently, and the roof, with the steeple, was soon enveloped in a mass of flame, the latter falling into the church, adding greatly to the conflagration and to the destruction of the interior. Very little of the inside has escaped injury or entire destruction, and of the very handsome church, with its bells and clock, but little remains except the walls.

Two organs, with the greater portion of the church furniture, were destroyed. There had been divine service during the afternoon, the congregation having been dismissed some ten or fifteen minutes previous to the catastrophe. We are informed that several persons, with the sexton, lingered behind, and had only quit the place a moment or two before the fluid took effect.

The church, with the furniture and the organs, cost between twenty-one and twenty-two thousand dollars. The loss is, however, partly covered by an insurance for $8,000 on the building, and $1,200 on the clock and bells.

Was this "act of God,"—to whom all casualties occurring on first day are attributed by the followers of Constantine,—a manifestation of His approbation of hallowing that day as holy time—as the "Christian Sabbath?"—or would it not be a legitimate deduction, from their own special pleadings, to ascribe it to the "direct and immediate interposition of Divine Providence to punish" the perversion of the Sabbath of the Lord thy God, which He declares is the seventh day—for changing times and laws, and substituting in the place of his own appointed institutions, the inventions of man.

The writer does not believe that in either of the above cases, the explanation of man's contracted notions of the operations of the Governor of the Universe, is of any material consequence; nor does he think that a thousand such occurrences will settle the question as to the true Sabbath; but he finds it well sometimes to administer as a remedy, a hair of the dog which inflicts the wound—just for what it is worth, and no more. That's all.

Still Another.

Destructive Fire in Rochester, New York—St. Paul's Church Destroyed.—We learn by an extra from the Rochester Advertiser, dated Sunday last, that the splendid Church of St. Paul, or Grace Church, was destroyed by fire in that city, on that day. The splendid organ of the Society, as also the massive bell, were both destroyed, the latter having been melted. The cost of the two was something like $2,000. The outer walls of the Church, which are of cut stone, are considerably injured, but remain standing. Every thing upon the inner portion was consumed. The loss to the congregation must be something like $20,000 or $25,000, $10,000 of which is covered by insurance; $4,000 in one company, and $3,000 each in two others. The church has been a very unfortunate one. Twice the immense tower, which was originally carried to a great height, has fallen to the ground; and this, together with other disasters, has rendered it peculiarly unfortunate.

If the Lord went to work to drown the two men at Harrisburg, on Sunday, it was no rest-day to Him; if He went to work to destroy the church at Philadelphia, on Sunday, it was no rest-day; and if he went to work to consume the Temple at Rochester, on the same day, dedicated to honoring first day, it is certainly no evidence that He hallows the day, or regards their veneration for a day He has not appointed. We rejoice not in these misfortunes, but sympathize with them in their loss; still it may be profitable to contemplate these matters in their varied aspects, that we may form a proper estimate of His doings, and not judge His acts by man's judgment.

Colonization of Free Negroes.—A Kentucky paper says that the Colonization Society of that State, in order to induce a more full emigration of the free negroes to Liberia, has determined to send out, in its expedition in November next, several free colored men, from different sections of the State, chosen by the free negroes in their respective neighborhoods, to go to the colony, and make a full examination of its condition and prospects, (remaining there twelve months for that purpose,) and return and make a report to their constituents. The free negroes of Lexington, Maysville, Danville, and Richmond, have chosen, in each place, one of their number; and the citizens of those places have raised the money to defray the expenses of the person chosen to go to the colony, to support him while there, and to bring him back again. The National Era, speaking of the matter, inquires very pertinently, "What kind of a report is to be expected from these poor people, who, already under the control of the slaveholders, are still further to depend upon them for all the expenses of their mission?"

Western Africa.—The London Missionary Society, the American Episcopal Board, and the American Board of Foreign Missions, have adopted a rule allowing their missionaries on the coast of Africa to return once in four years, as a means of preserving health and prolonging life. In accordance with this rule, a Mr. Wilson has recently returned to this country. Speaking of the miserable condition of that people, and the influence of New England rum upon them, he says that it is a painful fact, that the tribes on the western coast are gradually disappearing; and it is still more painful, as well as undeniably true, to reflect that the means of their destruction have been furnished by our own and other Christian nations. The great day of account will reveal, it may be, that the number of the victims of intemperance in Africa, greatly exceeds those of the slave trade. The intervention of missionary influence alone, it is believed, will avert these calamities.

Sunday Amusement in Havana.—A recent number of the Faro Industrial, a paper published in Havana, says that His Excellency, the Governor, has granted permission for six bull-fights to take place in the Plaza de Toros, on as many successive Sundays, the nett receipts of two of the performances to go to the expenses of a public exhibition of the products of Cuban industry—the others to be for the benefit of the managers of the Plaza. The chief of the bull-fighters and the members of his corps, full of enthusiasm for the purpose to which the two first-mentioned performances are dedicated, have offered their services for those occasions without compensation. From the exhibition in behalf of which they volunteer, much is expected.

National Convention of the Liberty Party.—The National Corresponding Committee of the Liberty Party, headed by Alvan Stewart, of New York, have given notice of a convention to nominate candidates for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States, to be held at Buffalo, N. Y., on Wednesday, the 20th day of October next, at 10 o'clock A. M., to continue in session two days.

Associational Messenger.—Eld. David Clawson, the Messenger of the Eastern Association to the churches in Connecticut and Rhode Island, spent the last Sabbath with the Church in Waterford, Ct., and expects to spend four or five Sabbaths to come with the Rhode Island churches.

Return of Missionaries.—Among the passengers in the Faneuil Hall, arrived at Boston from Calcutta, are Mr. and Mrs. Brayton, of the Mergui Mission, and daughter, aged six years; also two children (daughters) of the Rev. Francis Mason, of the Tavoy Mission.

Religious Liberty in Turkey.—The Christian Observer says that it appears by a recent letter from the Rev. Mr. Schneider, a missionary in Turkey, that the Turkish Government are taking measures to dissolve all connection between Church and State, so far as Christian sects in the empire are concerned. The Patriarchs are to be deprived of all political power. This measure will remove the greatest hindrance to the progress of the Gospel. And what is remarkable, the example of the United States is quoted by the Turks, to sustain this new doctrine of toleration.

Presidential Visit.—Mr. David Ames, now 86 years old, gives the following account of a visit of President John Adams to the public works of Northampton, Mass., nearly fifty years ago. It contrasts strangely with the parade which is made now-a-days whenever a President visits public works:—

"The writer of this remembers, well, he thinks in 1799, being then superintendent of the public works, that the elder Adams, then President of the United States, drove up to his office door, without any attendants but his servant, and inquired for the overseer of the public works, and wished to go through the shops on the Hill and at the water shops. The writer accompained him through all the works, after which he, together with the then Master Armorer, Col. Orr, received an invitation to dine with him and his lady at the hotel, then kept by Mr. Z. Parsons. After dinner the President went on his journey as any private gentleman would, without any ceremony."

Sunday Recreations in Mexico.—A letter writer at Puebla, Mexico, gives the following account of the way in which a part of the Sunday is spent in that place. It ought to be read in connection with the notices of Gen. Scott's worshiping at a Catholic Church in Vera Cruz:

"The Tivoli Garden is one of the fashionable resorts for Sunday evening, and it is quite a place of amusement. Ladies and gentlemen flock there in crowds, to see and to be seen, and as there is an entrance fee of 12 1-2 cents, it makes it somewhat aristocratic—the rabble not being able to afford that amount for pleasure. Bands of music enliven the scene, and different parties resort to various amusements, according to fancy—coqueting or flirting, promenading or dancing. Billiard-rooms, ball-rooms, ten-pin alleys, shooting galleries, flying horses, swings and sailing chairs, together with fine promenade walks among beds of roses and blooming violets, and a variety of 'other amusements, too numerous to mention,' all have their votaries, and Sunday evening and all holydays, with Pueblans, glide away happily and joyfully on the tide of time."

China, the Viceroy and the Missionaries.—The American Messenger says that a missionary writes, that on a visit of the Viceroy of Che-Kiang and Fuh-Kien to Amoy, as the missionaries were in the crowd among the common people, the Lord Mayor seeing them, came down from the forum to greet them, and stood in conversation with them for some time. Soon the Commandant of Amoy escorted them to an eminence where they could have a better view of the parade, and ordered his servants to supply them with tea in Mandarin cups. They were then invited by the great civil Judge, to take seats with him on a stage erected under a booth for his private convenience. Not less than a thousand persons gathered around, to witness the scene of four missionaries sitting and conversing with the highest Mandarin of Amoy.

The next day they were admitted into the presence of the Viceroy himself, who received them kindly, and spoke favorable of their work, and expressed the wish that they might always be as they then were, "brethren." In the evening the Viceroy sent each of them his card, and they presented him with a copy of the New Testament, Chinese Christian Almanac, and other books. The Viceroy has under his immediate jurisdiction about fourteen millions of people.

The Arracan Mission.—The Rev. Mr. Abbott is to start for his field of labor about the middle of August. He goes by the way of England and the overland route to Asia. Sixteen hundred converts are said to be waiting his return for baptism. In an address which he recently delivered at Hartford, Ct., and which is reported in the Christian Secretary, he gave the following account of the commencement of the work among the people for whom he labors:

"In the year 1837, Mr. A. made a journey to the North-west, beyond the Arracan mountains. He met with a young bandit chief on his journey, who, he was informed, had 300 men at his command. If this chief knew that a traveler had money in his possession, he would put him to the torture by placing coals on his back, sticking pins under his nails, or roasting him over a slow fire; in this way they could always succeed in extorting money if the victim had it. He went into this young chief's house in the evening, and with his Bible in his hand commenced preaching to those in the hut. Some two hundred wild, savage-looking men, had collected around the house. Mr. A. continued preaching till about 11 o'clock, during which time he was frequently interrupted by the young chief and others, who would take hold of his clothes, ask him where he got this or that article, &c., but they appeared to pay no attention to his preaching. About half past 11, something was said that arrested the attention of his audience, and its aspect became entirely changed. The young chief sat at his feet and listened with profound attention. The next day he held three services, which resulted in the conversion of some of his hearers, the young chief among the number, who subsequently became a preacher. Here the work of God commenced, and three thousand five hundred natives were converted,—seventeen hundred of whom Mr. A. baptized with his own hands. Fifteen hundred have been baptized since, by a trader, who was converted by reading a tract, and afterwards became a preacher."

General Intelligence.

WAR NEWS.

News has been received from Vera Cruz to the 23d ult., of which the following is the substance:—

The Vera Cruz papers of the 22d state that the Peace Commissioners failed in adjusting matters, notwithstanding the interference of the British Minister. This intelligence produced great excitement at Vera Cruz, and on all sides preparations were visible to prosecute the war with redoubled vigor.

Gen. Scott was to leave Puebla on the 13th of July, at the head of 12,000 men, for the Capital.

Santa Anna is said to have under his command 22,000 men; and is making active preparations for a determined and bloody resistance. He has taken advantage of the preconcerted delays of the Peace Commissioners to some purpose; and now finds himself in a position to give battle to the American General.

It is thought that Santa Anna will not await the attack of Scott at the Capital, but will advance to meet him at Rio Frio, where works of defense have been thrown up for some time.

Another skirmish has taken place between Gen. Pearce and the guerrillas. The Mexicans were defeated.

Santa Fé, a small town near Jalapa, has been totally destroyed by order of Gov. Wilson.

Noble Conduct and Hard Fate.—We heard, a day or two since, the story of a hard-working, industrious Irish servant girl, who, having amassed the sum of $100 from her scanty earnings, sent the whole of it to her father, mother, and sisters, in Ireland, with a message desiring them to come to this City, where she would provide for them a more comfortable home than their straitened circumstances would permit them to enjoy in their native island. Word came over to her that they would embark immediately. The noble-hearted creature rented a small, but comfortable tenement, and furnished it, to the extent of her limited means, with furniture, food, and fuel. In due time the parents and sister arrived, and joined herself and brother here; and the meeting, under such circumstances, of the reunited family was one inexpressibly joyful.

The most sanguine hopes, and the brightest wishes, of the affectionate, self-sacrificing daughter and sister, were fully accomplished. Those she loved were, through her single efforts, rescued from the combined miseries of pinching poverty and gaunt famine, and were all gathered about her at last, in an humble, but comfortable home, in a land of peace and plenty. But their happiness was short-lived, indeed. The parents had brought with them the seeds of the pestilence that rages in many portions of Ireland, consequent upon hunger, bad food, and exposure; and soon after their arrival here, one after another fell victims to its virulence, and the poor, heart-broken girl, in a few short weeks, has followed father, mother, brother, and sister, to the grave, and once more is alone in the land of her adoption, without a relative to condole with her in her bereavement.

Killing an Anaconda.—The Philadelphia correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, under date of August 4th, says that a young lady, residing in the upper part of the city, the daughter of a bank officer, when going to bed last night, was about closing her shutter, when she was horrified by laying her hand on an immense snake, which, with expaned jaws, was peering into the apartment sacred to maiden privacy and "meditation, fancy free." Dreadfully alarmed, she rushed down stairs, alarmed her parents, raised the hue and cry, and a number of persons, armed with all the implements known and described in an indictment for an assault and battery, went to attack the monster. One of the first blows knocked him from the window-sill, and he tumbled down through the branches of a grape vine into the yard. His pursuers followed, and soon completed the work of death. It proved to be an anaconda six or seven feet long and some six inches in circumference. Hardly had he been killed before a neighbor came rushing in breathless to reclaim his pet! But it was too late, and nothing now remains but his skin to grace some private collection or public museum. An anaconda hunt is not a subject of every-day occurrence in these latitudes.

Five Children Killed.—A large limestone fell from near the top of Coal Hill, above Sligo, on Monday afternoon. In its descent it rolled against a frame school-house, and instantly killed five children, besides wounding three others, one of whom it is feared may not recover. The names of the children killed were Oliver McAninch, John Cassidy, Morgan Richards, John Davis, and Charles Doran. It occurred during school recess, and the children were playing in the yard, and, seeing the rock rolling down, it is supposed they ran under the house, which was elevated on the lower side four or five feet from the ground, in order to escape the rolling stone. The teacher, Mr. Chiders, was the only one in the house at the time the accident occurred, and very narrowly escaped. An event like this, hurrying so many children from the very midst of their youthful sports to death itself, and from the play-ground to the grave, is almost unexampled for the promptness of the summons and the sting it leaves for those who mourn. Growth of Massachusetts.—In 1790, the whole personal property of the State of Massachusetts was estimated at $44,024,347. In 1809, it had increased to $97,949,616. In 1830, it was $205,856,422, and in 1840 it amounted to $299,880,338. The average in 1840, was $406 50 to each resident of the State, the number of inhabitants being more than 700,000, and in 1847, it will amount to about $3,884,000. From these facts it appears that wealth increases in Massachusetts three times faster than the population. Were the whole property of the State divided, every family consisting of five persons would have an estate worth $2,032. But the cost of living has kept pace with the increase, for the average surplus over consumption is only about $10 per head.

SUMMARY.

There have died on ship-board, on the passage from Great Britain to Quebec, over 2,500 emigrants; in Grosse Isle Hospital, 1,500; on board ships at Grosse Isle 750; and in Montreal, Quebec, the sheds, &c., over 3,500 more; in all, 8,250 deaths, besides the pestilence carried through Canada, destroying the clergy, physicians, nuns, benevolent householders, crews of boats, ships. &c., Over 70,000 persons have reached Canada from Europe this year, and of those some 5,000 are yet below Quebec. In all, 200,000 must have already been added to the population of North America from Europe since 1st of January last.

A letter quoted by the Gazette de Colonge, states that a Dane, long resident in New-York, has prepared a plan for a line of four steamships between this City and Gluckstadt, on the Elbe. The project is said to be warmly supported by the Kings of Denmark and Sweden, and by the City of Hamburg, which will secure prompt raising of the necessary capital, $1,000,000. It is expected that the passage to New-York will be made in from sixteen to twenty days. A company has also been formed for the purpose of establishing a direct steam communication between some port of Mexico, probably Vera Cruz, and Germany.

Robert Thom, British Consul at Ning-Po, died of dropsy, in China, on the 14th of September last, at the age of thirty-nine. He was a native of Glasgow, Scotland; went to Caracas in 1828, afterward to Mexico, next to England, thence to Bordeaux, and finally to China, the language of which, as well as French and Spanish, he spoke with fluency. He translated Chinese tales into English, and Æsop's Fables into Chinese, was the author of several works of great merit, and saved the lives of 500 Chinese at the battle of Chiuhai.

The Boston Courier describes a terrible accident that lately happened on the Norwich and Worcester Railroad. Two cars of the freight train, loaded with railroad iron, becoming detached at the Oxford depot, where there is a considerable inclination of the road, commenced a retrograde movement, soon reached a velocity of thirty miles an hour, and in a short time came into collision with the accommodation train from Norwich. The shock was awful. Joseph Adams, the engineer, and L. Stackpole, of Boston, were instantly killed, and two firemen were badly wounded.

We learn by a slip from the Charleston Courier, that a collision took place on Friday, on the Columbia railroad, near Gadsden, by which fifteen persons, nearly all colored men, were dreadfully crushed and mangled, several of whom cannot survive. The engineers, on finding the collision inevitable, reversed the engines, and then jumped off, when one of the locomotives started back at a fearful rate for some distance, and finally came in collision with another train, severely injuring many others. The locomotives were shattered to pieces.

As slaves decrease in Delaware, freemen take their place; and Wilmington, which in ten years, ending in 1840, increased its population only from 6,628 to 8,452, or 1,824, has increased, during the last seven years, from 8,432 to 12,532, or 4,080 souls. The increase has been most rapid the last two years, in which time the population has grown from 10,639 to 12,532. This cheering fact is doubtless to be explained by the substitution of free for slave labor.

At the Utica Steam Woolen Factory from 350,000 to 385,100 lbs. of fleece wool is required annually for manufacturing by this company, at a cost generally of about $125,000. The cloth manufactured daily, exceeds 450 yards. The amount of goods sold each year will amount to upward of $300,000—whereas the cost of buildings, machinery, lots, &c., does not exceed $75,000, the whole of the machinery being now in full operation. The wool purchased since 1st June last, by the company, is about 384,000 lbs. costing about $115,000.

In the Belgian Horticulturist, it is stated that "M. Houlton has communicated to the Medico-Botanic Society, of Louviers, the item that an onion, which he had found in the hand of an Egyptian female mummy, that had been entombed more than 2,000 years, on being planted in a garden, vegetated with great strength. It did not vary at all in appearance or qualities from our modern onion."

Dr. Ezra Green, of Dover, (N. H.) who completed the one hundred and first year of his age on the 28th of June last, died at his residence on Sunday; consequently the Hon. Timothy Farrar, of Hollis, who reached his one hundredth year on the 11th instant, is now the oldest living graduate of Harvard University. Dr. Green belonged to the class of 1765, and Mr. Farrar to that of 1767.

Charleston, S. C., fell off in population, from 1830 to 1840, one thousand souls. We should infer that the process is still going on from a fact stated by the Charleston Mercury. At the election for sheriff, in 1843, 2,354 votes were cast in the city and county, but in the late election the number was but 2,015.

We can scarcely look into an exchange without seeing the most cheering accounts of the crops. The papers of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, New Jersey, Indiana, and Illinois, as well as of the Southern States, all speak in the most encouraging terms.

The New York Tribune says that the city is dense with strangers, and the hotels are overflowed. One hundred and forty-two persons arrived at the Astor House alone on Tuesday, filling the utmost capacity of that noble structure "from turret to foundation stone."

The Great Britain, this mighty Leviathan of ships, was raised out of her bed on Dundram beach by the apparatus applied to her, on the spring tides, but the giving way of some of the tackling made it necessary to let the water into her hold again. No doubt, however, is now entertained of getting her off safely and with very trifling injury from the rock on which she struck.

Warren 'Lynes, the son of a widow Lynes, in Texas, has just returned from a ten years captivity among the Camanche Indians. He was captured at the age of 12 years, when the family had just settled in Texas from Vermont.

Mr. Duncan, an African traveler, presented a paper at a late meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, containing an account of a recent journey into the interior of Africa 460 miles, where no European had ever been. He was kindly treated by the king of Dehomey, who promoted his views. Among other things, Dr. Duncan gives novel details of this king's military establishment. His body guard consists of upwards of 6,000 women, armed with muskets, short sabres, and clubs. This guard is also officered by women, and the officers are selected principally on account of their height and bodily dimensions, corpulency being absolutely essential.

On Friday afternoon last, 25 miles S. E. by East of Fire Island, the Merchant's Pilot boat Nettle, fell in with a boat containing a seaman named Kelsey, who related that he had been attached to the schr. Sarah Strong, from Philadelphia, with a cargo of coal for Boston; that on the night previous, about 11 o'clock, the schooner, while lying to in a gale, was knocked down, and capsized, and he, discovering a boat about 100 yards from him, swam to it, and shortly after he saw the schooner sink with all the rest of her crew.

The Buffalo Commercial gives two cases of frauds upon emigrants. In one case a ticket was signed by P. Steele, 160 South st., corner of Dover, New-York, and directed to R. S. Spring, Buffalo, who was to forward them up the lake. But Mr. S. had no means to carry out the agreement, and the company (of nine persons) are penniless in the midst of their journey. What makes the matter worse is, they paid $30 more than any respectable house would have exacted!

A short time ago the curiosities of the Dead Letter Office were sold at Washington, among which were a number of books on various subjects, and a quantity of jewelry—such as gold rings, breast pins, guards, chains, ear rings, miniature cases, miniatures, models, silver watches, bracelets, silver rifle pistols, &c., A quantity of music for pianos, guitars, violins, flutes, &c., Dry goods of various kinds, coats, pants, shirts, children's dresses, medicines, pocket-books, razors and strops, gold plates and teeth, and many other articles, all together making a curious collection as need be looked at.

Mr. Clay, in reply to a letter from some gentlemen in Maine, who had sent him a present of some scythes, and referred in their letter to the Mexican War, says: "Yes, gentlemen, I certainly concur with you in deprecating this Mexican war, the causes which brought it about, and the manner of its commencement. I sincerely wish that every bayonet and sword employed in its prosecution, by both belligerents, were converted into scythes, ploughshares, and axes, and they dedicated to their respective uses in the innocent and peaceful arts of life."

A few days since a gentleman from Burlington County, discovered a whale in the brakers while bathing at Long Branch, the surf being very high they procured a gun forthwith, and shot him. The party present succeeded in securing the carcase, which required the strength of 24 men! It weighed from 1 to 2,000 pounds, and the tail was carried off by the captors, a company from Moorestown, as a trophy.

The "American Messenger," a monthly paper published in this City, by the American Tract Society, has gained a circulation of 98,000, and is said to be increasing. This is probably a larger circulation than is enjoyed by any other periodical in the world. The London "People's Journal," before the quarrel between its Editor, Mr. Saunders, and the Howitts, was said to circulate 93,000.

It is stated that the forests of Assam, in British India, are capable of producing India Rubber sufficient to supply the demands of the civilized world, and that it has already become an extensive article of export from that province.

Sir George Larpent, Chairman of the East India Association, recently testified before the British Parliament, that there was not a pound of tea brought to this country which did not undergo a coloring process to adapt it to the market; and that what was commonly called green tea was made so by artificial means, and might just as well be colored yellow or blue.

The Quebec Gazette, of the 2d inst., states that Rev. Mr. McMahan, pastor of St. Patrick's Chrurch, had announced 60 deaths among his congregation alone in the previous week; also, that the Board of Health had entreated the Government in vain for the use of the empty Cavalry Barrack No. 2.

The Pope has changed the method of calculating time at Rome. It has always been customary to count up to twenty-four o'clock each day, starting at a half an hour before sunset. The clocks are now arranged in the ordinary European manner.

Rev. Mr. Wilson stated at a recent Missionary meeting, that the wars on the coast of of Africa, which supply the Slave Trade, are kept up by New-England rum shipped from the port of Boston.

One ton of silver bullion was stored in a St. Louis warehouse. It belongs to Santa Fe traders, and is on its way to Philadelphia, to be converted into legal currency.

There are 350,000 seeds in the capsule of a tobacco plant. Roy, the celebrated Botanist, counted 32,000 seeds in the head of a poppy.

Prof. Morse has bought a country seat on the Hudson, near Poughkeepsie. For 100 acres of land he paid $17,500.

Dr. J. D. Pierce, of Troy, Pa., shot his wife by mistake on the evening of the 22d inst. Mistaking her for a robber breaking into the house, he seized his gun and fired. The whole charge of shot entered her breast, and she fell dead on the floor.

Among the passengers in the Switzerland, at Boston, from Liverpool, are Mr. Amos Abbott, wife and five children, of Andover. Mr. A. has been for the last thirteen years a Missionary at Bombay.

The Lutheran Church has now 1,000 congregations in the United States. 30,000 people belong to this denomination.

Chicago, twenty years ago, was the abode of wolves and wildcats. It is now a city of 20,000 inhabitants.

The Philadelphia Evening Bulletin states that another slave case is exciting attention in Camden, New Jersey. It is that of a colored man named Joseph Dudley, who was employed by a Mr. Minzer. Dudley had saved money enough to purchase the freedom of his wife, who is a slave at the South. To obtain her liberation he placed the money in the hands of another colored man, to go South, ascertain the whereabout of the woman, and purchase her freedom. The friend proved a false one, led a slaveholder there a few days ago, and Dudley has disappeared. It is reported that he was kidnapped and carried off to the South. A charge has been made against William Hugg, the pound-keeper, of having been concerned in the kidnapping.

A letter from Sterling, Worcester Co., Mass., gives an account of a malignant disease among the cattle upon the farm of a Mr. Smith, of that place. Six fine working cattle died in the course of a week. The symptoms were like the murrain. Several persons, among them the physician of the place, opened two or three of the cattle to ascertain what the disease was. One of the men cut his finger, and took the infection from the dead ox. He died in 20 hours. The physician also lay dangerously sick at the time the letter was written.

The largest farm in Vermont is said to be that of Judge Meech, at Shelburn, eight miles south of Burlington. A correspondent who has been over it, says this year he will mow over 500 acres, and cut 1,000 tons of hay. He keeps 3000 sheep, and has now four hundred head of neat cattle. A few days ago he sold fat oxen enough to amount to the sum of $2,460. He has also sold this season 1,000 bushels of rye.

The following comparison of the returns for the quarters ending June 30, of the years 1846 and 1847, shows a great increase of the business of the Salem Post Office:—

	Nett proceeds.	Letters mailed.

The Court of Appeals of Kentucky has decided the celebrated Maysville Methodist Church case, by which they give the entire property to the Church South.

☞ Important, if True.—The New York papers of Tuesday morning contain Telegraphic Dispatches from the seat of war, to the effect that Gen. Scott and his army took possession of the city of Mexico on the 17th of July. On their way from Puebla, our troops met the enemy eight miles from the capital, where a hard battle was fought, and the Mexicans routed, with immense loss; our loss about 300 in killed and wounded. As soon as the battle was decided, the civil authorities of the city came out to meet Gen. Scott, and capitulated.

DIED,

In Plainfield, Otsego Co., N. Y., August 1st, Dea. JONATHAN BURDICK, aged 75 years. When a good man dies, the community at large suffers a loss. Such is the case in the death of Deacon Burdick. He was a nephew of Elder John Burdick, formerly Pastor of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I., where Dea. B. was born. When young, he removed to the town of Burlington, Ct. When about 21 years old, he became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church, which at that time was established there. In 1822 he removed with his family to his residence in Plainfield, N. Y., at which he died. He there became a member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield, Madison Co. He was soon called to serve as a Deacon in the church, and was ordained to that office in 1824, which office he filled until disabled by infirmity. Deacon Burdick was a Christian of more than common firmness and stability in all that appertains to the Christian and the office which he filled. By his death, the church is deprived of one of her main pillars, and the community of a highly esteemed and useful member. But most of all, his widow, now advanced in life, and his children and relations, suffer in this bereavement. "The memory of the just is blessed."

In Bridgewater, N. Y., July 20th, Miss DESIRE BROWN' aged 94 years.

In Hopkinton, R. I., July 14, of consumption, MATTHEW S. BROWNING, in the 32d year of his age. Brother Browning died in hope of a blessed immortality.

In Hopkinton, on the 15th of July, of consumption, MARY ANN BARBER, wife of Geo. S. Barber, aged 28 years. Sister Barber was one whose life exhibited an unusual degree of growth in grace. She was fully prepared for her change, and peacefully fell asleep in Jesus.

In Sangerfield, Oneida Co., N. Y., of dropsy, July 27, 1847, Capt. ISRAEL P. LEWIS, in the 72d year of his age.

In Alfred, N. Y., July 21, THOMPSON BURDICK, in the 73d year of his age. He was a member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Alfred, and died in the full hope of eternal life.

TRACT SOCIETY NOTICE.

The Fourth Anniversary of the American Sabbath Tract Society will be held at DeRuyter, Madison Co., N. Y., on fifth-day, September 16th, at 10 o'clock A. M. Auxiliary Societies, agents, and tract distributors, are requested to communicate to the Corresponding Secretary, without delay, such facts connected with the circulation of Sabbath Tracts as are calculated to show the usefulness of that field of labor. Annual Members of the Society, Auxiliary Societies, or Churches, owing or having contributions designed to be included in the Treasurer's Annual Report, are requested to forward them to the Treasurer before the 5th of September, at which time he will make up his report.

PAUL STILLMAN, General Agent.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

PLUMBE NATIONAL DAGUERREAN GALLERY AND PHOTOGRAPHERS' FURNISHING DEPOTS; awarded the gold and silver medals, four first premiums, and two highest honors, at the National, the Massachusetts, the New York, and Pennsylvania Exhibitions, respectively, for the most splendid colored Daguerreotypes and best apparatus ever exhibited.

Portraits taken in exquisite style, without regard to weather. Instructions given in the art.

A large assortment of apparatus and stock always on hand, at the lowest cash prices.

New York, 251 Broadway; Philadelphia, 136 Chestnut street; Boston, 75 Court and 58 Hanover streets; Baltimore, 205 Baltimore street; Washington, Pennsylvania Avenue; Petersburg, Virginia, Mechanics' Hall; Cincinnati, Fourth and Walnut, and 176 Main streets; Saratoga Springs, Broadway; Paris, 127 Vieille Rue du Temple; Liverpool, 32 Church street.

THE NEW HYMN BOOK.

AT the last meeting of the General Conference, a Committee, consisting of Thomas B. Brown, Lucius Crandall, Wm. B. Maxson, Eli S. Bailey, Nathan V. Hull, and Sherman S. Griswold, was appointed to prepare and secure the publication of a Hymn Book suited to the wants of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Subsequently Mr. Brown, Chairman of the Committee, suggested a plan for the work, which received the unanimous and hearty approval of the other members of the Committee, and which he was requested by them to carry out. We are happy to state, that he has completed the duty assigned to him, and has prepared for the press a book which is believed by good judges to be equal in point of merit to any thing of the kind now extant. The copy is already in the hands of the printer, and the work will be published and ready for distribution on the 10th day of September next. It will contain above one thousand hymns, covering nearly six hundred pages of the size of the medium edition of "The Psalmist," now in use among the Baptists. It will be printed on fine paper, and upon stereotype plates prepared from entirely new type. In style of workmanship, it is intended that the book shall be inferior to none. To secure for it as general a circulation as possible, the price, in common leather binding, has been fixed at 75 cents per copy, or $9 per dozen. Copies will be put up in extra binding, with gilt edges, &c., to suit every variety of taste, at prices corresponding to the style.

The Publishers of the Book are desirous of learning what number of copies will be at once demanded, in order that they may regulate the size of the first edition by the demand. They request, therefore, that those in want of the work will give them as early notice as possible of the number they desire. Probably the best way to do the business will be for each society or church to appoint some person to ascertain how many will be wanted within its own bounds, and send on the order accordingly. The books will be ready for delivery, as before stated, on the 10th day of September, in time to supply at the Anniversary of the Missionary and Tract Societies in DeRuyter, all who may wish to obtain them in that way. To save uneasiness, no money will be required until the books are delivered; and to save loss, no books will be delivered except for the money or its equivalent. Orders for the books are now solicited, and should in all cases be accompanied with explicit information as to the way in which they may be sent. Those who wish to be sure of copies of the first edition, should send their orders as early as the 1st day of September. Address, "UTTER & CHAMPLIN, No. 9 Spruce-st., New-York."

CAROLINE E. WILCOX, Preceptress.
AMELIA R. CLARKE, Teacher of Instrumental Music.

Other experienced Teachers are employed the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8, will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First commencing Wednesday, Aug. 25, and ending Dec. 1
Second " " Dec. 15, " March 22
Third " " April 5, " July 12

TUITION, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
EXTRAS—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

REMEMBER ME.

BY BERNARD BARTON.

"Remember me!"—However brief
These simple words may seem to be,
In hope or fear, or joy or grief,
Who hath not said—"Remember me?"

The child, when first to school he goes,
The sire, who nursed him on his knee,
Each at the first sad parting knows
A thought which prompts "Remember me."

The lover, when he bids adieu,
From jealous doubts, however free,
May use, and fondly feel them too,
The tender words—"Remember me?"

The soldier, though by glory steeled
Against full many a soft'ning plea,
Will turn him from the tented field,
Homeward—and sigh—"Remember me!"

The sailor, as he ploughs the deep,
At midnight, on the star-lit sea,
Compelled his lonely watch to keep,
Breathes the fond words—"Remember me!"

Far more appealing is the power
In doubt and grief, than hope and glee;
And most affecting in the hour
Of death, one faint "Remember me!"

Would'st thou their holiest form declare?
Turn to Golgotha! turn, and see
The dying thief—and hear his prayer—
"In heaven, O Lord! remember me!"

Well may the heart this motto own,
Since grace and nature both agree;—
Feeling's full gush, thought's tenderest tone,
Find utterance in—"Remember me!"

From the Examiner.

DUELING.

The death of George C. Dromgoole, of Virginia, occasioned deep regret among a large circle of friends.

We knew him in other days. He was no ordinary man. His mind was unusually clear and strong, and, had no adverse circumstances occurred, he would have been an ornament to society, and an honor to the nation.

But it was in private life that he charmed. So simple, so kind, so true. We never knew a more generous man; he was wholly disinterested, and knew how to sacrifice self with a grace which won him the love of friends and the respect of acquaintances.

In an evil hour he was tempted, acting upon false notions of honor, to peril his life, and the life of another. His antagonist fell. From that hour he was an altered man; he knew no peace; and, to drown the bitter thought that he was a murderer, he sullied his soul still deeper in crime by drinking to excess. And in early life he was taken from us, a debased and self-blighted man.

Yet how like him was the last act of his life! This little paragraph below, inserted in newspapers without comment, and glanced at by the reader, possibly without thought, tells, at once, the rectitude of his intentions, and his own estimation of the depth of his crime.

"George C. Dromgoole, in his will, gave all his property to the children of the individual who fell by his hand in a duel."

It has fallen to our lot, in days when we thought dueling no sin, if we could be said to have thought about it at all, to meet with many, to know well some, who had killed their men. We never knew one who lived in peace after the murder; we know only two who survive, and they are sots.

The first time we were called upon to witness a duel was at Augusta, Georgia, in 1829. We were just entering manhood. The parties were from our native State. We knew them both well. They were stationed at their places, and at the word fire, the elder of the two, a man of promise and place, fell dead. We saw him, saw his brother, who gazed wildly into his pale face, just now so full of life; saw friends as they hurriedly took up his body, and bore him onward to his home. And we saw afterward the gray-haired father, as he bent over that body, hot tears falling down his cheeks, fall as one struck with palsy, for his prop, the boy of his hopes, was taken away, and there was no longer happiness for him on earth!

But the survivor! Business relations brought us together; we were his attorney; and we had to see him at his home, and our house. In company, we saw no change in him; he was light hearted, almost frolicsome in his gayety. He never spoke of the murder; by an unuttered but well understood compact, (and how terribly did this describe the deed?) none ever referred to it. But soon we learned that he never slept without a light in his room. Soon after we found that he was fast becoming a drunkard, and scarce three years had passed since the duel ere he was stricken down in early manhood, and laid near his antagonist in the earth.

But his death!—we were present at it, and never may we witness such another! That subject—so long kept sealed up by himself—so long untouched by family or friend—the murder of his school companion and neighbor, was at last broken by himself. "I could not help it," said he, as his eyes glared upon us, and his breathing became painful from its quick and audible action. We knew to what he referred; and endeavored to direct his thoughts into other channels. In vain. "I could not help it; I was forced into it; could I help it?" And all this was, in a dueling sense, true. He had every excuse a man could have to fight; but, when so assured, he exclaimed wildly, "It will not do—I murdered him—I see him now—I have seen him as he lay dead on the field, ever since I slew him. My God! My God!" And muttering these and like sentences, with a shriek, such as I never heard mortal utter, he died!

Another instance. A young Scotchman came to Charleston, S. C., and settled there. He gave offence to a noted duelist, and was challenged; fought, and killed him. He removed afterward to New Orleans; he was engaged in successful business, and was regarded the merriest fellow about. His intimate friends thought the murder had made no impression upon him; not one of his relatives believed he cared any thing about it.

In 1834 or '35 he was engaged in large cotton speculations. News of a rise in price reached New Orleans soon after he had shipped a large number of bales to New York. If he could sell or make some particular arrangement, he could realize a fortune. But it was necessary to go to New York. He jumped on board a steamer, went to Montgomery, (Alabama,) and pushed rapidly on by land for Washington City. Over-excitement brought on fever, and he was obliged to stop in the interior of South Carolina.

Full fifteen years, or more, had elapsed since he had killed his man. For the first time, he lay on a bed of sickness. He had fever, and delirium with it. And in that delirium, with terrible anguish and maniac fury, he spoke of this deed of death! It made those of us who heard him shudder as we listened! Was his laughter, all along, forced? Had his merriment been lip-deep—of the intellect, and not of the heart? He grew better, and his physician thought him convalescent. Now and then he would start in his sleep, exclaim, "Take him off me, don't tie his dead body to me;" but the fever had abated, and we all thought he would soon be well. He did grow better, but, watching his opportunity, he went to a chest of drawers, as if for some clothing, stealthily took from it a razor, and drew it rapidly across his throat! It was a dreadful gash that he made, and would have been fatal had not one who was near struck his elbow, as he was making the attempt upon his life!

Poor man! He knew, and had known, no peace since the day he killed his opponent. When he thought his end near, he made the confession. "He felt," he said, "as if he was a murderer, though no one charged him with the crime."

And our belief is, that no man who kills another ever feels otherwise. The mark of Cain is upon him, and he sees it, if no other eye does.

BUENOS AYRES.

The city of Buenos Ayres is large. It contains about 60,000 inhabitants. It is, I should think, one of the most regular cities in the world. Every street is at right angles to the one it crosses, and the parallel ones being equidistant, the houses are collected into solid squares of equal dimensions, which are called quadras. On the other hand, the houses themselves are hollow squares; all the rooms opening into a neat little court-yard. They are generally only one story high, with flat roofs, which are fitted with seats, and are much frequented by the inhabitants in summer. In the centre of the town, is the Plazza, where the public offices, fortress, cathedral, &c., stand. Here, also, the old viceroys, before the revolution, had their palaces. The general assemblage of buildings possesses considerable architectural beauty, although none individually can boast of any.

The great corral, where the animals are kept for slaughter to supply food to this beef-eating population, is one of the spectacles best worth seeing. The strength of the horse, as compared to that of the bullock, is quite astonishing: a man on horse-back, having thrown his lazo round the horns of the beast, can drag it any where he chooses. The animal ploughing up the ground with outstretched legs, in vain efforts to resist the force, generally dashes at full speed to one side; but the horse immediately turning to receive the shock, stands so firmly that the bullock is almost thrown down, and it is surprising that their necks are not broken. The struggle is not, however, one of fair strength; the horse's girt being matched against the bullock's extended neck. In a similar manner a man can hold the wildest horse, if caught with the lazo just behind the ears. When the bullock has been dragged to the spot where it is to be slaughtered, the matador with great caution cuts the hamstrings. Then is given the death bellow; a noise more expressive of fierce agony than any thing I know; I have often distinguished it from a long distance, and have always known that the struggle was then drawing to a close. The whole sight is horrible and revolting: the ground is almost made of bones; and the horses and riders are drenched with gore.

Machine for Turning Statuary.—One of the most remarkable inventions of the age, is that of Thomas Blanchard, of Boston, for turning busts, in a lathe. The art of turning any-thing of uniform circular form, in the common lathe, is familiar to every body. But the idea of turning in a lathe articles deviating from circular forms, appears, at first sight, absurd. And yet precisely such a machine has been invented for turning forms of various irregular shapes, such as gun-barrels, and gun-stocks, spokes of wheels, and shoe-lasts, wig-blocks, and last, busts of the human head. Machines for all these purposes have been invented by Mr. Blanchard, and one of the latter description is now in full and successful operation in Boston.

Imagine a steam engine, in rapid motion, whirling round, and turning out the human head and face divine, with nose, chin, lips, forehead, eyes, ears, neck, breast and shoulders, of perfect proportion and accuracy to nature! Imagine such an eccentric machine, and you will have some idea of the wonderful stretch of invention which conceived and completed such a faculty. Such a machine is now in successful operation in Boston, and if any person will take the trouble to search, he can see a bust of Daniel Webster rapidly revolving in one end of a lathe, and at the other he will see fac simile heads of the great expounder, of any desired sizes, turned out from marble, by machinery.

What is curious, busts and cameos may be turned after one and the same model, into imitations of any sizes, from a colossal bust, to a miniature face suitable for a lady's broach.

The Rhubarb.—The leaf of the common garden rhubarb is a fine display of the order of vegetable nature. It is common to find them about 2 feet square, and containing over 500 square inches. We noticed a lover of nature examining one a few days ago, and making a calculation, the result of which, for its curiosity, we will give. He found that on the suface of a single leaf could be traced more than two miles of distinct canals, through which the nourishment passed to give life and vigor to the leaf. These canals being about a sixteenth of an inch apart, divided the leaf into 130,000 fields, each as distinct to the eye as the divisions by walls of the grass and grain lands of the well cultivated farm. As lateral fibres more minute than the unaided eye can discover pass in close contiguity through these small fields, there is little doubt that could all the canals for circulation in a single leaf be extended in one line, they would reach a distance of ten miles.

Dress of the New Englanders.—"The boots and shoes worn by the earlier settlers of New England, were coarse, clumped, square-toed, and adorned with enormous buckles. If any boots made their appearance, prodigious was the thumping as they passed up the aisles of the church; for a pair of boots was then expected to last a man's life. The tops were short, but very wide at the top; formed, one might suppose, with a special adaptation to rainy weather; collecting the water as it fell, and holding an ample bath for the feet and ankles!

"The women, old and young, wore flannel gowns in the winter. The young women wore, in the summer, wrappers or shepherddress; and about their ordinary business, did not wear stockings and shoes. They were usually contented with one calico gown; but they generally had a calimanco gown, another of camlet, and some had them made of poplin. The sleeves were short, and did not come below the elbow. On holydays, they wore one, two, or three ruffles on each arm—the deepest of which was sometimes nine to ten inches. They wore long gloves, coming up to the elbow. Round gowns had not then come in fashion; so they wore aprons. The shoes were either of thick or thin leather, broadcloth, or worsted stuff, all with heels an inch and a half high, with peaked toes turned up in a point. They generally had small, very small muffs, and some wore masks."

Anecdote of Hume.—This distinguished philosopher was one day passing along a narrow foot-path which formerly winded through a boggy piece of ground at the back of Edinburgh Castle, when he had the misfortune to tumble in and stick fast in the mud. Observing a woman approaching, he civilly requested her to lend him a helping hand out of his disagreeable situation. But she, casting one hurried glance at his abbreviated figure, passed on without heeding or regarding his request. He shouted lustily after her; and she was at last prevailed on by his cries to approach. 'Are na ye Hume the deist?' inquired she in a tone which implied that an answer in the affirmative would decide her against lending him any assistance. 'Well, well,' said Mr. Hume, 'no matter; you know, good woman, Christian charity commands us to do good, even to our enemies.' 'Christian charity here, Christian charity there,' replied the woman, 'I'll do naething for ye till ye turn a Christian yourself—ye maun first repeat baith the Lord's prayer and the Creed, or faith, I'll let ye groffle there as I found ye.' The sceptic was actually obliged to accede to the woman's terms, ere she would give him her help. He used to tell the story with great relish.

Visiting in Havana.—The private houses at Havana, at least a great many of them, are magnificent. It is the custom here to leave all the windows to the street open at night; the visiting rooms are most commonly on the ground floor, and the passer-by is of course at liberty to enjoy the sight of many a gay soiree and tertullia. In other towns, where such things and sights are unknown, a crowd would speedily be collected; but here the practice is so universal, that no one thinks, from mere motives of idle curiosity, of stopping to look in. Acquaintances of the house, or of some of the guests, may occasionally peep in at the windows, in order to ascertain if any of those they would wish to meet are within; and if the results of the survey prove satisfactory, they enter without ceremony. This seems to me a very agreeable style of society; there are no formal reunions, and no person need enter a room with the chance of meeting a disagreeable or obnoxious person; it is, in my opinion, another great advantage attending this easy mode of visiting, that you are not compelled to remain a moment longer in any house than you find it agreeable.

Mahogany.—Dr. Gibbons, an eminent physician in the latter end of the 17th century, had a brother a sea captain, who was the first that brought from the West Indies some mahogany logs to London for ballast. The doctor was then building him a house in Covent Garden, and his brother the captain thought they might be of service to him, but the carpenters found the wood too hard for their tools, and it was laid aside as useless. Soon after Mrs. Gibbons wanted a candle-box, and got a cabinet maker to make it out of the useless wood lying in the garden. The box was made, and the doctor was so pleased with it, that he got the cabinet maker to make him a bureau of it, and the fine color and polish of it induced him to invite a great number of his friends to see it, and among them the Duchess of Buckingham. Her grace begged the doctor for some of the wood, and got Wollaston, the cabinet maker, to make her a bureau also, on which the fame of mahogany and Wollaston were much raised, and it became the rage for grand furniture. No other wood excels it yet.

Intellectual Precocity.—It once happened that an anxious mother asked Mrs. Barbauld, at what age she should begin to teach her child to read?

"I should much prefer that a child should not be able to read before five years of age," was the reply.

"Why, then, have you written books for children at three?"

"Because, if young mammas will be very busy, they had better teach in a good way than a bad one."

I have known clever precocious children at three years, dunces at twelve; and dunces at six, particularly clever at sixteen. One of the most popular authoresses of the present day could not read when she was seven. Her mother was rather uncomfortable about it, but said that as every body did learn to read with opportunity, she supposed her child would do so at last. By eighteen, this apparently slow genius paid the heavy but inevitable debts of her father, from the profits of her first work; and before thirty, had published thirty volumes!

Life in a Telegraph Office.—Mr. Botsford, the manipulator of the telegraph now exhibiting in this city, occupied the same position in the telegraph office in New York. He says that in holding communication with the writer at the other end of the line in Boston, it often happened that the two were total strangers, though constantly writing to each other. One morning, when there was nothing to do in the office, he inquired how the other was, and a mutual kind feeling sprang up between the two men, although they were distant from each other 220 miles. Mr. B. took occasion to go to Boston afterward, and went to the office as a stranger. He was allowed to send a message to the office in which he was engaged in New-York, in figures unintelligible to the writer in Boston, and in two minutes the telegraph gave him a formal introduction to his former correspondent and co-manipulator. The idea of giving an introduction by telegraph, one gentleman being 220 miles distant from his friend, strikes us as rather novel.

Signs and Firms.—Wait & Ketchum is the very appropriate name of a firm in New York, which makes patent medicines on a large scale.

Call & Settle have a tailoring establishment in Meadville. We presume they give short credits.

Neal & Pray is a business firm at Portland, Maine. It is superfluous to add that they belong to orthodox churches.

Luke Sharp is in the retail business in Cincinnati. As might be expected from the name, he is always wide awake whenever money is to be made.

VARIETY.

The Vienna journals publish the decree which was drawn up some time ago to prevent injury to railways. It provides that any damage of a nature to endanger the lives, safety, or property of individuals, shall be punished with from five to ten years, imprisonment, in the event of an accident. Any act causing any such injury is to be punished with the same penalties; and any employee of the railway causing accidents, whatever may be their consequences, by his negligence, is to be punished with from five to ten years' imprisonment; if the consequences of the accident are very serious, with from ten to twenty years' imprisonment; and if death be caused, with punishment of death.

At Harrisburg. (Penn.,) Mr. Wm. Root, whilst examining the bridge in process of erection over the Susquehanna, lost his balance, and fell a distance of twenty feet, when he struck a cross timber of the false works of the bridge; and from thence seventeen feet to the water below, striking upon the side of a gondola; and thence into the stream. He was immediately taken from the water in a state of insensibility, but was soon restored to consciousness, and continued to linger in dreadful agony until Sunday afternoon at half-past six o'clock, when death ended his sufferings.

A gentleman being once at a public entertainment where one of the party sat several hours without speaking a syllable, and was evidently silent from a contempt of the company, determined to resent it. Accordingly, when supper came, he studiously attended to the silent man, and before his plate was empty, loaded it with every thing at table. One of the company marking this, asked him why he was so assiduous. "Sir," replied he, "it proceeds from my humanity, and the tenderness of my disposition; I cannot bear to see a dumb creature want."

"Manners," says the eloquent Edmund Burke, "are of more importance than laws. Upon them, in a great measure, the laws depend. The laws touch us here and there, now and then. Manners are what vex or soothe, corrupt or purify, exalt or debase, barbarize or refine, by a constant, steady, uniform, insensible operation, like that of the air we breathe in. According to their quality they aid morals; they supply them or they totally destroy them."

The increasing or decreasing civilization of a nation, may be ascertained by the sites of its towns and its villages; as security and independence predominate, the towns descend from the mountains to the plains; but when tyranny and anarchy reign, they re-ascend the rocks, or take refuge on the high sands of the sea. In the middle ages, in Italy, on the Rhine, in France, the towns stood, like eagle's nests, on the points of inaccessible rocks.

A person who dined in company with Dr. Johnson, endeavored to make his court to him by laughing immoderately at every thing he said. The Doctor bore it for some time with philosophical indifference; but the impertinent ha, ha, ha! becoming intolerable—"Pray, sir," said the Doctor, "what is the matter? I hope I have not said any thing that you can comprehend."

Mr. Burke one day in the warmth of debate spoke some words rather disrespectful of the government. Mr. George Onslow called him to order, and said he would not sit silent and hear the sovereign insulted. Mr. Burke in explanation said, "That though he reverenced his majesty's own person, he saw no reason for respecting his majesty's man-servant, his ox, and his ass."

The first time that Mr. Pitt went to Cambridge, (Eng.,) after his election for the University, numerous clerical applicants were, as might be expected, gaping for "lawn sleeves," and other good things in the gift of their representative. Dr. —— preached before the young premier, from the following text: "There is a lad here, who hath five barley loves and two small fishes; but what are they among so many?"

Dr. Morley, one of Lord Clarenden's early friends, was, as the noble historian informs us, 'of the highest facetiousness; for once being asked by a grave country gentleman (who was desirous to be instructed what their tenets and opinions were,) what the Armenians held, he pleasantly answered that they held all the best Bishopricks and Deaneries in England.'

Smith, in his "Wealth of Nations," says that "the patrimony of a poor man lies in the strength and dexterity of his hands; and to hinder him from employing this strength and dexterity in what manner he thinks proper, without injury to his neighbor, is a violation of his sacred property."

A letter written from China, and addressed to a person in the city of Nantes, in France, by a French missionary, states that several captains of vessels, belonging to the marine of the three nations of France, England, and the United States, had been received into the presence of the Emperor of Japan, from whom they had solicited the opening of the ports of his kingdom to the commerce of Europe and America.

THE DAILY NATIONAL WHIG is published in the city of Washington, every day, at three o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted, and served to subscribers in the City, at the Navy Yard, in Georgetown, in Alexandria, and in Baltimore, the same evening, at six and a quarter cents a week, payable to the sole agent of the Whig, G. L. Gillchrist, Esq., or his order. It is also mailed to any part of the United States for $4 per annum, or $2 for six months, payable in advance. Advertisements of ten lines or less inserted one time for 50 cents, two times for 75 cents, three times for $1, one week for $1 75, two weeks for $2 75, one month for $4, two months for $7, three months for $10, six months for $16, one year for $20, payable always in advance.

The "National Whig" is what its name indicates. It speaks the sentiments of the Whig party of the Union on every question of public policy. It advocates the election to the Presidency of Zachary Taylor, subject to the decision of a Whig National Convention. It makes war to the knife upon all the measures and acts of the Administration deemed to be adverse to the interests of the country, and exposes without fear or favor the corruptions of the party in power. Its columns are open to every man in the country, for the discussion of political or any other questions.

In addition to politics, a large space in the National Whig will be devoted to publications upon Agriculture, Mechanics, and other useful arts, Science in general, Law, Medicine, Statistics, &c. Choice specimens of American and Foreign Literature will also be given, including Reviews, &c. A weekly list of the Patents issued by the Patent Office will likewise be published—the whole forming a complete family newspaper.

The "Weekly National Whig," one of the largest newspapers in the United States, is made up from the columns of the Daily National Whig, and is published every Saturday, for the low price of $2 per annum, payable in advance. A double sheet of eight pages will be given whenever the psess of matter shall justify it.

The Memoirs of General Taylor, written expressly for the National Whig, are in course of publication. They commenced with the second number, a large number of copies of which have been printed, to supply calls for back numbers.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON,
IRA SAYLES, } Principals,

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	.25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

NOTES OF A SEA VOYAGE.

☞ By the ship which brought the first news from our missionaries, Bro. David Dunn, of New Market, N. J., received a letter from Mrs. Carpenter, descriptive of some of the principal incidents of the voyage, and expressive of her own feelings and thoughts. The letter has been placed in our hands, with permission to make such use of it as we might deem best. We suppose the writer had no idea of its being published; but it contains so much matter of general interest, that we shall venture to lay it before our readers, and trust we shall be pardoned for so doing.

Ship Houqua, January 14, 1847.

Dear Brother,—I hasten to comply with a request which you made some time before our departure, for the particulars of the passage. With the circumstances of that departure you are already familiar. You witnessed the last looks of affection, and heard the last farewell tones and doubtless joined in the singing of that Hymn, which was to us as the last echo of a land, a country, a home, on which we might never gaze again. Long and earnestly did we watch the returning steamboat, as it bore forever from our sight those whose company had cheered the commencement of our passage; and when loved faces, and dear forms, could no longer be distinguished in the distance—when the steamboat itself became a speck against the sky—we turned away, calmly, but not sad, to the duties below, which began rapidly to accumulate upon our hands, Only a few moments were allowed us to arrange our state-rooms, before that, as yet, hardly expected intruder, sea-sickness, came upon us like an armed man, and took us all by storm. There was no appeal, so we submitted quietly to be set aside for a season. I had thought the weather mild and favorable; but if it had been, it was no longer so. The elements without harmonized with those within, and we realized most literally that we were like the troubled sea. There was no solitude in our suffering, yet I believe that even misery forgot for once the blessings of companionship, and no one minded the things of another. None but the experienced can fully appreciate the miseries of that night and the following day. For the benefit of The Profession, however, be it recorded, that not one of all the various remedies prescribed, were resorted to. We wisely concluded to leave nature to arrange the matter quietly with the Ocean King, in spite of sour apples, green tea, lemons, creosote, and kindred remedies. Every thing was left out of the question except the steward. The faithful steward! he, like a generous peacemaker, was ready with his offerings of crust-coffee, chicken-broth, arrow-root, roast-apple, and whatever his wisdom dictated, and strongly recommending the fine open air, and exercise on deck. That first day on deck! Although not more than 150 miles from New York, and that mostly east, yet the air was like summer. There we sat or lounged on the settees, sometimes only able to throw ourselves down on the mats, which the thoughtful steward had spread for us, yet basking all day in the warm sun, too sick to talk, and too inert to have a will of our own on any subject. Thus passed our first day at sea. The second was like unto it. But toward night the wind increased. We betook ourselves to our state-rooms. The breeze stiffened, the clouds gathered, the barometer fell suddenly, and every needed warning was given to prepare for a storm. It increased every moment. All hands were called; the captain and crew kept watch on deck; the passengers kept watch below. The rolling and plunging of the ship; the dashing of the billows against its sides; the creaking of the timbers; the rattling of cables; the clatter of the rudder against the wheel, as it shook and trembled unceasingly; the measured and mournful voices of the men, as they kept time to their own labor; and, higher and stronger than all, the clear, firm voice of the Captain, distinctly heard above the roar of waters and the rush of winds, and even the thunder itself, (for the frequent flashes of lightning told us there must be thunder;) the prompt and scrupulous response of the men to the word of command; the rapid tread of footsteps hastening from one post of duty to another;—all was too exciting to admit of aught like repose among us, who for the first time realized the perils of the deep—for the first time witnessed a storm at sea! What a consolation to us now was the privilege of prayer! That sweet promise, "Lo, I am with you," was an anchor to the soul. We could trust Him who said it, and felt that should he call us to pass through the waters, he would be with us, and in death would his hand save us.

Friday, 8th.—The sea continued very rough all day, too much so to admit of writing or reading. Quite well myself, but most of the others sick yet. Mr. C. worst of any. The weather colder, and no means of heating the cabin, the stove, which had fallen down during the storm, having been by universal consent banished from among us. By the way, what a fright the falling of that stove gave us. It was full of burning coal, and a tea-kettle of boiling water on the top. We had become familiar with the plunging of various other articles, in fact of whatever was not closely confined to its place, but when the stove leaped across the cabin, what with the crash of the iron, the rattling and hissing of the coal, the steam of the boiling water, and the zeal of the steward and cabin boy to gather up the fallen heaps, no wonder that for the moment, every state-room door gave out its pair of wo-begone, yet frightened countenances, staring wildly at the ruin before them, and forgetting for the moment that such an evil as sea-sickness ever had existence. Yes, the perils of that night are past, but not so their memory. The stove is gone, but we no longer need its warmth; the sun, a universal friend, is smiling warmly upon us, and in the quiet possession of those smiles, we too drive dull care away. Yet there is one left us; the care of ourselves. The ship still rolls so badly, that it is almost impossible to sit or stand. Passed most of the time in our berths, where, by holding on to the sides or window-shelf, we could manage to stay. Comforted ourselves at evening with thinking and talking of the friends we have left behind us, counting up the number of those who would meet in their various little praying circles, and in whose petitions we knew we should be remembered; and rough as was all without, yet there was peace within. And ardently, but vainly, did we wish that our friends at home could know how the thought of their employment strengthened our hearts.

The Sabbath found us still driven of the winds and tossed. But when the hour came, that we knew our friends on shore were gathering for worship, we too assembled, in brother W.'s room, it being larger than ours, that we might send up our devotions with theirs, one in spirit, although far sundered in the flesh. The blessed Word was read, and sweet were its comforts to us; and while we bowed together in prayer, and lifted up our hearts to Him who "holds the winds in his fist, and the waters in the hollow of his hands," I believe we felt, that that little hour of communion with our God, and with each other, was worth all the sacrifices we had yet made. At the close we sang that beautiful, and with me favorite Hymn—

> "Jesus, I my cross have taken,
> All to leave and follow thee," &c.

10th.—Attempted to write, but soon gave it up. The ship still rolls and tosses so violently, that the very effort to keep still is labor enough of itself. Whether we would stay in our berths, sit on the settees, or stand upright, all our attention and energy must be in exercise, to keep the position desired. Still we cannot give up our airings on deck; and then the kindness of every gentleman who happens to be near, is laid under requisition. By their help, we stumble along to a seat; or to the sides of the vessel, where, steadying ourselves by the ropes, we stand and make remarks, or ask questions, fully indicative of the untold wonders of our own ignorance about winds and waves. But all our auditors were landsmen once, and they listen to our crude speeches, with all the forbearance of trained disciplinarians.

14th.—The steward is untiring in his efforts to please us, yet our perverse appetites make but poor acknowledgments for all his kindness. Only yesterday for the first time did Mr. C. or myself partake, with aught like a relish, of the good things he prepares for us. Perhaps it is well, for such sitting at the table as we have is enough to overthrow the last item in the calender of uprightness. At every meal, there is a continual rush of dishes from side to side, within the limits of the racks; and this, when one hand is always requisite to hold the drinking cup, makes rather busy times for the other. Such a rattling of spoons and plates; such splashing of gravy; such crowding of meat and sauce dishes; such rueful looks from disappointed patrons of all the good things on the board, as they repeatedly realize how "many a slip" they are doomed to experience. "O, it is pitiful." Very slight indeed has been the change in our circumstances up to this date, except that we are now all quite well.

January 15, latitude 30° North longitude 38° West. We are to day fairly in the influence of the trade winds. Nothing seems as I had anticipated. There is a want of vastness in the open ocean which surprises me. The horizon is more circumscribed, the swells are not so uniformly high, and have a strange land-like appearance, entirely unlooked for. True, there are exceptions, as for instance after the storm. Then the face of the surrounding country seemed one regular succession of mountains. Dark, rocky hills, with here and there and every where, gushing from their heaving sides, the swollen torrent or the sparkling rill; jets of spray foaming and dashing down the sides, and leaping away to the valley below. Nor are these mountains all destitute of vegetation. They are literally, and truly, moss-covered hills. Acres of this aquatic vegetable have we past. They say it is common in this latitude, and still more abundant, farther south. Not one fish have I seen yet, except some smoked herring which came the other day to table apparently from a very different element than that in which I had been watching for the finny tribes. Birds have been almost as rare, except some ill-fated members of our own feathered community on deck, which, persecuted beyond endurance by the storms and waves that beat upon them, were, at last, "glad to be hurled, any where, any where, out of the world."

16th.—Another Sabbath has passed, with its holy light. And while we met, a solitary four in our little room, I thought I felt in my own heart a clear evidence that many in our beloved churches at home, worshiping at the same hour, were already in their own souls enjoying the blessed fruits of their sacrifices for this projected Mission. I doubt not, could the secret workings of all hearts have been this day revealed, many would have testified to an increased joy in their own breasts. The Lord bless and reward them a hundred fold even in this life, with the assurance of an inheritance in the life to come. Our own faith is strengthened, our confidence increased. [To be continued.

PEACE AND WAR.

BY AN UNLETTERED YOUTH.

WAR.

Town deserted; burning village;
Murder; rape; destruction; pillage;
Man compelled man's blood to shed;
Weeping; wailing; want of bread;
Commerce checked; grave citizens
Armed with swords instead of pens;
Harvests trampled; homesteads burned;
This is War! why is't not spurned?

PEACE.

Busy town and happy village;
Fruitful fields by careful tillage;
Smiling wife and children gay;
Labor singing through the day;
Bounteous harvests; busy farms;
Rusty swords, disused fire-arms;
War's vain glory set at nought;
This is Peace! why is't not sought?

SO MANY CALLS.

BY H. E. BEECHER STOWE.

It was a brisk clear evening in the latter part of December, when Mr. A—— returned from his counting-house to the comforts of a bright coal fire, and warm arm chair, in his parlor at home. He changed his heavy boots for slippers, drew around him the folds of his evening gown, and then lounging back in the chair, looked up to the ceiling and about with an air of satisfaction. Still there was a cloud on his brow—what could be the matter with Mr. A——? To tell the truth, he had that afternoon, in his counting-room, received the agent of one of the principal religious charities of the day, and had been warmly urged to double his last year's subscription, and the urging had been pressed by statements and arguments to which he did not know well how to reply. "People think," soliloquized he to himself, "that I am made of money, I believe. This is the fourth object this year for which I have been requested to double my subscription, and this year has been one of heavy family expenses—building and fitting up this house—carpets—curtains, no end to the new things to be bought. I do not see really how I am to give a cent more in charity. Then, there are the bills for the boys and girls—they all say they must have twice as much now as before we came to this house; wonder if I did right in building it?" And Mr. A—— glanced unceasingly up and down the ceiling, and around the costly furniture, and looked into the fire in silence. He was tired, harrassed, and sleepy; his head began to swim, and his eyes closed. He was asleep. In his sleep he thought he heard a tap at the door; and there stood a plain, poor looking man, who, in a voice singularly low and sweet, asked for a few moments conversation with him. Mr. A—— asked him into the parlor, and drew him a chair near the fire. The stranger looked attentively around, and then turning to Mr. A——, presented him with a paper. "It is your last year's subscription to missions," said he, "you know all the wants of that cause that can be told you; I came to see if you had any thing more to add to it."

This was said in the same low and quiet voice as before, but for some reason unaccountable to himself, Mr. A——, was more embarrassed by the plain, poor, unpretending man, than he had been in the presence of any one before. He was for some moments silent before he could reply at all, and then in a hurried and embarrassed manner he began the same excuses which had appeared so satisfactory to him the afternoon before,—the hardness of the times, the difficulty of collecting money, family expenses, &c.

The stranger quietly surveyed the spacious apartment, with its many elegancies and luxuries, and, without any comment, took from the merchant the paper he had given, but immediately presented him with another.

"This is your subscription to the Tract Society, have you any thing to add to it? You know how much it has been doing, and how much more it now desires to do, if Christians would only furnish means. Do you not feel called upon to add something to it?"

Mr. A—— was very uneasy under this appeal, but there was something in the still, mild manner of the stranger that restrained him; but he answered that though he regretted it, exceedingly, his circumstances were such that he could not this year conveniently add to any of his charities.

The stranger received back the paper without any reply, but immediately presented in its place the subscription to the Bible Society, and in a few clear and forcible words reminded him of its well-known claims, and again requested him to add something to his donations.

Mr. A—— became impatient.

"Have I not said," he replied, "that I can do nothing more for any charity than I did last year? There seems to be no end to the calls in these days. At first there were only required moderate—now the objects increase every day, and call upon us for money, and all, after we have given once, want us to double, and treble, and quadruple our subscriptions. There is no end to the thing. We may as well stop in one place as another."

The stranger took back the paper, rose, and fixing his eye on his companion, said in a voice that thrilled to his soul,

"One year ago, to-night, you thought that your daughter was dying—you could not rest for agony—upon whom did you call that night?"

The merchant started and looked up—there seemed a change to have passed over the whole form of his visitor, whose eye was fixed on him with a calm, intense, penetrating expression that subdued him, he drew back, covered his face, and made no reply.

"Five years ago," said the stranger, "when you lay at the brink of the grave, and thought that if you died then you would leave a family unprovided for, do you remember how you prayed? Who saved you then?"

The stranger paused for an answer, but there was a dead silence. The merchant only bent forward as one entirely overcome, and rested his head on the seat before him.

The stranger drew yet nearer, and said in a still lower and more impressive tone, "Do you remember fifteen years since, that time when you felt yourself so lost, so helpless, so hopeless; when you spent day and night in prayer; when you thought you would give the world for one hour's assurance that your sins were forgiven you. Who listened to you then?"

"It was my God and Saviour," said the merchant, with a sudden burst of remorseful feeling, "O yes, it was he."

"And has he ever complained of being called on too often," inquired the stranger in a voice of reproachful sweetness: "say," added he, "are you willing to begin this night and ask no more of Him, if he from this night will ask no more from you?"

"O never, never, never," said the merchant, throwing himself at his feet; but as he spake these words, the figure seemed to vanish, and he awoke with his whole soul stirred within.

"O God and Saviour! what have I been doing!" he exclaimed. "Take all—take every thing—what is all that I have, to what thou has done for me." [N. Y. Evangelist.

PERSECUTION.

The following is an appalling specimen of persecution, perpetrated during the early stages of the Reformation in England. It is from the pen of the author of the Lollards. The victim was Agnes Morton. The scene was in Smithfield, where so many other victims met a similar fate.

"A chair was brought, in which Agnes was permitted to seat herself, and then Dr. Shaxton, who had accompanied the sheriffs, passed to the pulpit. He preached of mercy and repentance, but withal enforced the necessity of firmly performing the solemn duty imposed on the guardians of Christ's church, by extirpating those whose wilful obstinacy tended not only to their own perdition, but also to the undoing of millions who, were it not for them, would be 'safely gathered into the fold of the good shepherd.' Agnes listened attentively to his discourse; to those parts which seemed to her in accordance with the Scriptures, she bowed assent; but when some of the tenets of the Catholic faith were insisted upon, she shook her head, or breathed her conviction that there was displayed the vain bigotry of Rome.

"The sermon ended. It was intimated to her that, having heard the cogent and unanswerable reasonings of a learned doctor, well calculated to dispel the errors into which she had been betrayed, if she had happily so profited by his labors as to be content to yield her opinion, her pardon, already signed, should be forthwith given into her hands. To this she replied, that, having been guilty of no crime against religion, she could profess no repentance. The grand charge against Agnes, was, that she had denied the real presence of the Deity in the bread used for the sacrament. Her opinion she again defended. The bread so used, if put away for a time, would become mouldy; and this she urged as a proof that it could not be God. When reminded of the words of the Saivour, declaring it to be his flesh, she insisted that his language was figurative; as when stating that he would raise the temple again in three days, he had spoken of the temple of his body.

"In vain the churchman argued—in vain the lover prayed—the martyr was resolute. The executioner bound Agnes to the stake. He deposited a bag of powder on each side of the victim. The wood was piled around her, reaching up to her neck. One of the officers drew near, and again required her to renouce her errors. 'My errors,' said Agnes, 'I have already renounced, and therefore am I brought to this.' 'She refuses pardon!' cried the sheriff. The bishops looked at each other in astonishment, and with apparent horror, in which the chief magistrate fully participated; the latter then proceeded to give the last awful command. 'Enough,' said he, 'has been done for mercy. Now'—he paused for a second, to give more impressive force to the mandate which was to follow—'now, Fiat Justitia!' Prompt to perform his dreadful task, that instant saw the executioner apply the lighted torch to the straw and tarred shavings which formed the base of the pile prepared for the immolation of Agnes. The crackling flame rose rapidly, and completely encircled the sufferer. Her hair was in a blaze, and her face, already scorched, presented a frightful contrast to what it had lately been. It was now veiled by the ascending smoke, and then displayed by the vivid light which succeeded. Amid the roar of increasing fire, the accents of thankfulness and prayer were heard to ascend. The powder exploded, and enveloped her in its frightful glare, but it had not the effect of extinguishing life. She continued aloud her appeal to the Deity.

"Withdrawing her thoughts for a single moment from prayer, Agnes thought of her lover. 'I feel it not,' she exclaimed: 'I am wonderfully sustained; now, Edwin, can you doubt?' 'That these are fiends—that you are a martyr?' 'No: this constancy must be from Heaven! A convert to thy faith, I pant but to follow thee, and die for the truth!' 'It is finished!' Agnes sighed. Her limbs were consumed: she sank, and ceased to exist!"

ANECDOTES OF DR. CHALMERS.

A correspondent of an English exchange, noticing a visit of the late Dr. Chalmers to a relative in Bristol, gives us a picture of that great man among children:

"I thought, as the children ran up to greet him on his arrival, he seemed entirely and at once at home. The scholar, the divine, the philosopher—chief perhaps of his day in one or other department—were all in a moment merged in the kind, warm-hearted, affectionate old man. There he sat, with his large eyes, and his noble visage graven throughout with lines of high intellectuality, yet beaming with cheerfulness and vivacity. The children are on his knee, and they have to be amused; various are the devices; one while he seems to be engaged in grave deliberation, and pops suddenly down upon them, taking them quite by surprise; one while he draws his finger through his mouth, producing a sharp report, and exclaiming, in his broad Scotch, 'There, did you ever hear sic a noise as that?' while each report would be greeted by shrieks of laughter, and the exclamation, 'Do it again, do it again.'"

The same correspondent relates another pleasing incident, indicative of the Doctor's refinement of feeling:

"It has been remarked, that a high order of intellect is inconsistent with much softness and tenderness of feeling. What is meant by this, I presume, is, that it is inconsistent with its display—that philosophy is competent to check the tide of feeling, and to make a man a sort of transcendental abstraction; but on more occasions than one, in my privileged interviews with Dr. Chalmers, there were some beautiful displays of greatness and tenderness of feeling. Thus, for instance, after parting from our friends, 'I fear,' he said, with considerable earnestness, 'I did not shake hands with Mr. G.' On his recurring again and again to the omission, I said that probably all that was necessary in the formality of the matter, I could supply. 'No,' he said, 'it is not a mere matter of formality; it is a matter of deep feeling with me.' On our return, however, by Mr. G.'s house, the omission was explained—for our worthy friend, before leaving us, had quietly ordered the carriage to drive around by his door, that he might have the opportunity of presenting Dr. Chalmers with a book, as a token of his reverence and regard. 'Ah,' said the Doctor, as we again drove off, 'that is a man of an effusive nature; he overflows with kindness; he has given me many books already.' The question was proposed, whether old age had the effect of numbing the feelings. 'No,' he observed, 'not when supported by the healthful exercise of the mind.'"

A SUNDAY SCENE.

The Albany Evening Journal of Monday, says:—Yesterday a German boy led his aged and blind father from the wharf up through State street to the Capitol Park. From their appearance, it was evident that they had just arrived from the Faderland, and were seeking a home in this country, to which all exiles flee. Sorrowing and infirm, the parent suffered his cheerful son to guide his tottering steps. Time had dealt severely and frostily with the one—the other he seemed to touch only to invigorate and adorn. The blossom of the Spring with the ripened fruit of the Autumn. Under the shade of a large tree the boy seated the old man on the railing, and wiping the moisture from his face, sat down. He then took a well-worn book from his pocket, and as the venerable man drew nearer to the youth, he read to him the Word of Life from the New Testament. Alone, far from their native land, and far from their kindred, they worshiped God in his own Temple.

The numerous bells were inviting the citizens to the churches. A fashionable audience was collecting in a fashionable House of Worship. Wealth and Beauty were there. The Matron and the Maid condescended to devote a few moments of a Sabbath morning to slander or sleep. Does the listening Cashier tremble for his securities or for his soul? Can the meek and devout man in the pulpit bring his hearers to realize the folly of this world or the next? Does the man of half a million, with a whited neckcloth and cadaverous cheeks, who boasts of saving all that he pinches—does he realize the source or destination of his wealth?—are not his descendants already chewing the scanty crust of penury and want—when winter chills, and the rude winds pierce their tender frames, as the miser counts his warm and sordid treasure, or laughs mechanically at an unappreciated jest, are they not destitute of a garment that he is too penurious to bestow?

From these reflections we turned again to the Pilgrims in the Park. They were kneeling on the turf with their faces resting upon the railing. The exiled Patriarch, with one hand raised toward Heaven, and the other resting on the head of his boy, was at prayer!

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, August 19, 1847.

SUNDAY RAILWAY TRAINS IN SCOTLAND.

The Glasgow Argus, of April 29, contains a long account of a public meeting convened at the City Hall by the Lord Provost, in compliance with a numerously and respectably signed requisition, for the purpose of considering the propriety of petitioning Parliament to pass a law making it imperative on all railway companies carrying passengers, to afford the public adequate and proper facilities for traveling along their lines on Sundays, at reasonable and convenient hours. The Hall, which is capable of containing upwards of five thousand people, was crowded in every corner, long before the hour of meeting, and thousands were afterward unable to obtain admission. For several days prior to the meeting, great exertions were made by a number of clergymen, principally connected with the Free Church, and other gentlemen, to get up an opposition to the views of the promoters of the meeting, which were believed to be in favor of the running of Sunday trains; and so zealous were some of them, that on the previous Sunday, they urged and besought their congregations, by every thing that was sacred, to be present at the meeting, and to vote against any motion in favor of a resumption of the trains. The walls, likewise, were placarded for some time previous to the meeting, with bills of various descriptions, by the Anti-Sunday Train party, denouncing the running of Sunday trains in the most unmeasured terms, and designating the originators of the meeting, and all who supported them, as enemies of the working man, inasmuch as the object which they had in view would encroach upon the rights of labor. The following is a specimen of these placards:—

"Let all who love the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of Man, and Lord of the Sabbath, be at their posts, and show a bold, determined front to Anti-Sabbatarian Magistrates or Town Councils, and others of whatever rank or denomination, who dare to advocate the running of railway trains on the Sabbath day. * * Oh, for magistrates and rulers of the old school, like Nehemiah!"

Before the hour of opening the meeting, a considerable number of the Anti-Sunday-train party took their seats on the left of the Chair, thus preöccupying a large part of the platform previous to the entering of those who had made the requisition upon the Lord Provost. When a gentleman friendly to the object of the meeting rose to propose a Chairman, he was receiv-with a perfect storm of shouting, hooting and yelling, from one party, and great cheering from the other. A Chairman was apppointed, however—a member of the Town Council—who made a short speech, amid cheers and uproar. The meeting having been thus organized, the following resolutions were presented for its consideration:—

"Resolved, 1st, That this meeting consider the resuming of a moderate number of railway trains on Sunday, as a convenience absolutely required by the wants of the great communities of Edinburgh and Glasgow, and adjoining districts; and whilst anxious to farther every movement for bettering the condition of the working classes, at the same time look upon the incessant attempts of Sabbatarians to stop all means of cheap locomotion on Sunday, under the pretext of love for the interests of the operatives, as tyrannical and unjust, that class being, in fact, the greatest sufferers by the stoppage.

"2d. That we regard with indignation the encroachments on our liberties, which have of late years been attempted by a section of the clergy, in reference to what they term a proper observance of the Sabbath; and express our conviction that the method in which they recommend it to be wholly employed is irrational, unchristian, and subversive of sound morals; and that we will embrace every lawful means to counteract their influence in this matter—influence which, as they employ it, is incompatible with the rights of conscience, and would render their opinion superior to the law.

"3d. That the conduct of the present Directors of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway, and those of the Company who have supported them by their votes, in the stopping of the Sunday trains, is in the highest degree censurable, as an invasion of civil rights and an encroachment of religious liberty; and that it is not only unjust but hypocritical, inasmuch as the same parties who convey letters, call it a sin to carry passengers on Sunday.

4th. That a petition from the meeting be sent to both Houses of Parliament, praying that a law may be enacted, rendering it imperative on all passenger railway companies in Scotland to run, at least, one morning and evening train on Sundays, at reasonable and convenient hours."

Mr. Andrew Patton was the first to advocate these resolutions, which he did in a speech setting forth his own views and the views of those who had called the meeting. He cordially approved of cessation from labor, as far as the interests of the community would admit, during the entire twenty-four hours of Sunday, and thought it beneficial to be engaged on it in the various exercises of moral and religious instruction and devotion, in private, in the family, and in the public assembly. He would, however, as a Christian and a citizen, withstand all attempts to coerce the observance of Sunday. For guidance in religion, he would go to the Bible alone. In examining the New Testament, he found that, wherever the Sabbath day is spoken of, it refers exclusively to the seventh-day Sabbath, and that the first day of the week is never called the Sabbath day. In every instance where the first day is mentioned, it is incidental to the narrative, and there is not the slightest allusion to any sabbatical observance enjoined regarding it. It was the practice of the early Christians to pursue their occupations on that portion of the first day not occupied in devotion, and to deny that the peculiar strictness of the seventh-day Sabbath was transferred to the first day. Some of the greatest names in Christendom, he claimed, have held these views—Luther, Melancthon, Calvin, the martyr Cranmer, Milton, of the Reformation era, Paley, and in our own times, Dr. Arnold and Dr. Whateley, the present Archbishop of Dublin, (whose work on Logic is a standard with all parties, even the Secession,) hold these views. The Protestants of all denominations of England, Holland, and Germany, and the Society of Friends throughout the world, hold, and have always held, these views. The Patriot and Nonconformist newspapers, the acknowledged organs of the English Dissenters, particularly of the Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists, have very recently written strong editorial articles in favor of Sunday trains, and against their stoppage on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway—the entire newspapers of Scotland and of Britain, save those which are the avowed organs of the Free Church, are with them on this question. In view of such considerations, he thought the religious argument against Sunday trains was not worth much.

Mr. Patton then reviewed the argument urged against Sunday trains on the ground that they render it necessary for the railway servants to work on Sunday. He endeavored to show, that on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway they would be required to work about two and a half hours before, and two and a half hours after church service, not interfering with their attendance, and that their turn of employment would come round only once in six weeks. He also introduced facts to show that the relinquishing of Sunday trains had led to a great increase of travel by public and private carriages, which was not discountenanced by the loudest denunciators of Sunday trains.

When the shouting, cheering, and groaning, which hailed the conclusion of Mr. Patton's speech, had subsided, Mr. W. S. Brown attempted to address the meeting. But he was so much interrupted by the mingled cheers, groans, and yells of the assembly, that he could not be heard. After occupying the floor for nearly two hours, either in speaking or waiting for the uproar to cease, he was compelled to take his seat. A large portion of the meeting seemed determined that the business should not proceed, and they took such means to prevent it, in which they partially succeeded.

—The foregoing is truly a sad picture of the state of feeling which prevails in Scotland relative to Sunday railway traveling. The opponents of such traveling have carried their opposition so far as to rouse a hostile party; and then they endeavor to prevent the free discussion of the subject, by interrupting the meetings appointed for that purpose. Who needs to be told, that they are pursuing a course exactly adapted to defeat their own purposes?

THE WISCONSIN ASSOCIATION.

The Wisconsin Seventh-day Baptist Association convened with the Church in Milton, according to previous arrangemet, July 8th, 1847. Prayer was offered by Eld. Stillman Coon; after which Adin Burdick was appointed Chairman, and Abel D. Bond and Wm. M. Clarke, Clerks.

Letters from the several churches were called for and read; from which the following statistics were taken:—

Milton.—Z. Campbell, Pastor; Stillman Coon, Daniel Babcock, Elders; Wm. P. Stillman, Deacon; Julius M. Todd, Clerk; number of members, 97; constituted, 1840; communion, first Sabbath in August, and once in two months. Delegates—Z. Campbell, Daniel Babcock, Wm. P. Stillman, George N. Coon, Julius M. Todd, Abel D. Bond, John Stillman.

Albion.—O. P. Hull, Elder; James Weed, Alvan Ayres, Deacons; David M. Stillman, Clerk; number of members, 79; communion, second Sabbath in May, and once in two months; constituted, 1843; Post Office address, Albion, Dane Co., W. T. Delegates—D. M. Stillman, Alvan Ayres, Stephen Maxson, Duty J. Green, Thos. F. West, Adin Burdick; Benj. F. Collins.

Walworth.—Alfred Maxson, Wm. S. Clark, Deacons; Nathan L. Bassett, Clerk; number of members, 15; communion, first Sabbath in each month; constituted, 1847. Delegates—Alfred Maxson, Stillman Coon, Wm. M. Clark.

Thos. E. Babcock and A. W. Coon, on presenting a letter from the Western Association, were received as delegates from that body.

All brethren present, members of sister churches, were invited to a seat and to participate in the deliberations.

A draft of a Constitution was presented, received, and referred to a committee for revision.

A committee was then appointed to draft Rules of Order for the Association.

The Afternoon Session was opened with prayer by Eld. D. Babcock.

The Committee to revise the Constitution reported, and their report was adopted,

The Committee to draft Rules of Order made a report, which was adopted.

Julius M. Todd was appointed Recording Secretary; Eld. Z. Campbell, Corresponding Secretary; and Duty J. Green, Treasurer, for the ensuing year.

The following Standing Committees were then appointed:—

On the State of Religion—Duty J. Green, Julius M. Todd, and Stillman Coon.

On Resolutions—T. E. Babcock, Z. Campbell, and D. Babcock.

On Petitions—Stillman Coon, Alfred Maxson, and A. W. Coon.

Wm. H. Redfield was appointed to write the Corresponding Letter.

At the opening of the Morning Session, July 9th, a Discourse was preached by A. W. Coon, from Prov. 4: 23—"Keep thy heart with all diligence," &c.

The Committee to write the Corresponding Letter reported, the report was adopted, and the letter is given below.

At the Afternoon Session, Eld. Z. Campbell was appointed to preach the Introductory Discourse at the next session, and W. H. Redfield his substitute. It was determined to hold the next session of the Association with the church in Albion, to commence on the fifth day of the week before the second Sabbath in July, 1848.

Resolutions.

The Committee on Resolutions reported the following, which were unanimously adopted:—

1. Whereas, we consider the Sabbath Recorder an ably-conducted paper, and the interests of our denomination intimately connected with its success: therefore,

Resolved, That we recommend to the brethren of this Association, to extend to it their liberal patronage.

Sustained by Thos. E. Babcock, and W. H. Redfield.

2. Resolved, That whoever interests himself in multiplying and circulating the publications of the American Sabbath Tract Society, is a benefactor of mankind; and that future generations will rise up and call him blessed.

Sustained by Julius M. Todd, Dea. Alfred Maxson, Thos. E. Babcock, and S. Coon.

3. Resolved, That in view of the natural resources of this country, favorable to political, scientific, and religious importance, and the rapid increase and enterprise of its population, we are called upon to take high and decided ground in the cause of education.

Sustained by B. F. Collins, A. W. Coon, and T. E. Babcock.

4. Whereas, we consider American Slavery a violation of the laws of God and the rights of man, and calculated to involve our nation in disgraceful feuds and wars, and sap the foundation of our free institutions; therefore,

Resolved, That we believe it is the duty of every lover of God and humanity, to use all reasonable efforts for its immediate abolition.

Sustained by John W. Stillman, Z. Campbell, D. Babcock, and Alfred Maxson.

5. Whereas, several of our brethren and their wives have foregone the delights of home, kindred and country, and gone to bear the tidings of salvation through Christ to the degraded heathen,

Resolved, That we feel bound by the obligations of duty, and the ties of brotherhood, to sustain and encourage them by our prayers, our sympathies, and our temporal substance

Sustained by Abel D. Bond, A. W. Coon, S. Coon, D. Babcock, and W. P. Stillman.

6. Resolved, That in accordance with the request of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, we recommend to the churches of this Association, upon the first Sabbath in each month, to hold a concert of prayer in behalf of the Foreign Mission.

Sustained by A. W. Coon and W. H. Redfield.

7. Resolved, That among all our efforts to promote those principles of which the gospel is the great embodiment, we ought by no means to overlook the cultivation of vital piety in our own hearts, without which, all those efforts will be rendered comparatively nugatory.

Sustained by D. Babcock.

Corresponding Letter.

The churches and brethren composing the Wisconsin Seventh-day Baptist Association, to the churches and brethren composing our sister Associations:—

Dear Brethren,—It has been the good pleasure of our Heavenly Father, to permit us in this country to unite ourselves in an Association, and to enjoy a pleasant and interesting season in our first session. His goodness and mercy to us, demand our warmest gratitude and love. We rejoice in the opportunity which is thus afforded us, of corresponding with you, and of uniting our efforts with yours in carrying out the great enterprises of benevolence and love, which the gospel enjoins on us, and in which you are so heartily engaged. We are encouraged and strengthened by the interest which the Western Association, in particular, has manifested in our prosperity, by sending delegates to attend with us in our first session, whom we joyfully received, and request a delegation from all our sister Associations in our future sessions. May the great Head of the church unite all our hearts in the love of the truth, that so we may be one, and labor heartily and zealously to spread his truth in the world. There are indications of good around us, by which we are encouraged to persevere in our efforts to spread light in respect to the Sabbath of the Lord our God. Some have lately embraced the Sabbath, and others are inquiring. Brethren, pray for us. Grace be with you. Amen.

Churches in Massachusetts.—According to an article in the Christian Observatory, it appears that in 1696, which was seventy-six years after the landing at Plymouth, the churches in Massachusetts were, one Episcopalian, one Baptist, and seventy-four Congregationalist. In 1767, after a hundred and forty-seven years, the Episcopalians numbered 10 assemblies; the Friends, 13; the Baptists, 16; the Congregationalists, 280. Twenty-three years later, in 1790, the Roman Catholics had 1 church; the Universalists, 1; the Friends, 6; the Episcopalians, 11; the Baptists, 83; the Congregationalists, 332. At the beginning of this century, the Roman Catholics were still but 1; the Universalists, 4; the Friends, 8; the Episcopalians, 14; the Methodists, 29; the Baptists, 93; the Congregationalists, 352. The present number of churches connected with the several denominations, is estimated thus: Freewill Baptists, 7; Swedenborgians, 10; Friends, 14; Christ-ians, 30; Episcopalians, 55; Roman Catholics, 58; Universalists, 145; Unitarians, 164; Methodists, 181; Baptists, 233; Congregationalists, 439; in all, 1,336. From this it appears that the Orthodox Congregationalist churches comprise about one-third of all the churches in Massachusetts; the Baptists, one-sixth; the Methodists, one-seventh; the Unitarians, one-eighth; the Universalists, one-ninth; the Roman Catholics, one twenty-third; and the Episcopalians, one twenty-fifth.

Appointment of Baptist Missionaries.—On the 28th of June, according to the Baptist Missionary Magazine, Messrs. A. H. Danforth and I. J. Stoddard, members of the Senior Theological Class of Madison University, Hamilton, N. Y., were appointed missionaries to Assam, the former to be stationed at Gowahati, with Mr. Barker, and the other with Mr. Bronson at Nowgong. At the same meeting, Miss Harriet H. Morse, formerly of the Ojibwa mission, was reäppointed an assistant missionary in the Siamese department of the Siam mission. Mr. William Moore, of Butler Co., Ohio, and late graduate of Covington Theological Institute, Ky., was appointed missionary to the Karens, July 12. His particular destination is to the Sho Karens in the neighborhood of Maulmain, the field just vacated by Mr. Bullard. The Rev. T. W. Greer, pastor of the first Baptist Church in Salem, Columbia Co., Ohio, with Mrs. E. H. Greer, was at the same time appointed to the Burman Mission, to labor at Akyab or Ramree. The above are expected to take their departure about the middle of October, except Miss Morse, who will sail for Siam, if an opportunity offers, soon after the first of September. Rev. J. and Mrs. Johnson, appointed to the China Mission last year, and Rev. J. T. Jones, of the Siam Mission, will probably sail at the same time.

American Bible Society.—The Board of Directors of the American Bible Society, held their monthly meeting on Thursday, when it appeared that during the month of July, more than 79,000 copies of the Bible were issued, in nineteen different languages. The expenses of the Society, for the same time, were $25,000, while the receipts were only $22,000; this leaves the Board in want of money, while there is a greater demand for Bibles than ever. The Society is in debt for paper already, of which it needs a good supply, as it works more than a ton a day. At the same meeting, fourteen new auxiliary Societies, one in Mississippi, two in Alabama, one in Georgia, two in Wisconsin, four in Illinois, one in Indiana, one in Virginia, and one in New Jersey, were recognized. A letter was read from Ohio, written by a former officer of the army in Mexico, who now desires to carry the Bible to that country. A communication from France was also read, calling for means of printing and distributing the Scriptures among the poorer Catholics of that country.

Missionary Intelligence.—The Missionary Herald for August, mentions several of the mission stations of the American Board, which are enjoying precious seasons. Communications have been received from the Nestorian mission, and the contents are highly interesting. Mr. Perkins says, under date of April 15th, "It is impossible to communicate to you and the churches a full impression of the cheering incidents and aspects around us, which betoken the advancement of Christ's kingdom among this people." From Constantinople the intelligence continues to be very animating. On the 6th of June, seventeen persons (twelve of them being females,) were received into the church. "This is a larger number," says Mr. Dwight, June 7th, "than were ever before admitted at any one time, and we bless the Lord for it." Four of the males and three of the females are members of the seminaries under the care of the station.

Progress of Religious Liberty.—The Missionary Herald says that the Protestants of Hasbeiya, a mountain village in Syria, where they have suffered severely from the intolerance of Armenian ecclesiastics, some time since sent one of their number to Constantinople, with an interpreter, to lay their trials and grievances before the Sublime Porte. After presenting a statement of their case, the agent was informed, in due time, that the business had been attended to, and that the Pasha of that district had been instructed to protect the Protestant portion of the community.

Rev. Orange Scott, one of the founders of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection, died at his residence in Newark, N. J., on Sabbath night, July 31. He was at one time the editor and publisher of the True Wesleyan; and afterwards the Agent of the Wesleyan Book Concern. The debility of which he died is supposed to have been produced by his anxieties and severe labors to advance the interests of the denomination to which he is attached.

Deputation to visit the Free-Will Baptists of America.—The General Baptists of England have appointed Rev. Jabez Burns, D, D., and Rev. J. Goadly to attend the Triennial Conference of the Free-Will Baptists of America, to be held in the State of Vermont in October next. The Deputation expected to leave Liverpool by the steamship Cambria, August 4th.

Query.—I learn that an article is going the rounds of the papers, stating that a dead man has been baptized. I should like to know why we may not as well baptize a dead man, that has no repentance, faith, or knowledge of the matter, as to baptize an infant, that has no repentance, faith, or knowledge of the matter. Will some man who has light upon the subject tell us the difference?

C. C. Burleigh, the man who was fined and imprisoned in Pennsylvania for selling books on Sunday, is about to visit England. He will be in less danger of persecution for such practices there than in this "land of the free, and home of the brave."

Declination.—Elihu Burritt, in a letter, dated London, July 19, 1847, published in the Christian Citizen, declines the nomination for the Vice Presidency, tendered him by the Liberty League. After expressing his regret at the former divisions in the Anti-Slavery ranks, he says:—

"I cannot but deprecate any movement which must result in a new division of the friends of the Slave in the United States; especially in a division upon points extraneous to the great and mighty idea, that all men are born free and equal in a legal sense. I therefore must beg that my name be withdrawn from the connection in which it has been placed by the new Liberty Party in New York."

Union of Presbyterians in Scotland.—At the anniversary of the Foreign Missionary Society of the Free Church of Scotland, Rev. Mr. Redpath, of the Secession Church, expressed a hope that the very slight barrier which separates the Free Church from "the United Presbyterian Church," will be speedily broken down, and all become one. The United Presbyterian Church of Scotland consists of the Secession and Relief Churches, which have lately been united; and there is really nothing between them but the abstract principle of the right and duty of the State to establish and support the true religion. The Free Church still holds to the doctrine that the State ought to support the true religion, although they are not willing to receive the support of the Establishment on the terms on which the Government offers it to them, whilst the United Church holds that the church should be protected by the State, but supported by voluntary contributions—in other words, the American doctrine on the subject. It is hoped that the Free Church will soon cease contending for an abstraction, and fall in with their united brethren, and thus become one great Presbyterian Church—presenting an unbroken front in favor of the voluntary principle.

Expense of Publishing a Religious Paper.—The Editor of the Christian Mirror has had some twenty-five years experience in publishing a religious newspaper. In a recent article upon the subject, he says:—

"A common mistake prevails in the community, that it is an easy thing, and but slightly expensive, to publish a paper. It is thought even, that the gratuitous bestowment of a paper is no gift; in other words, it costs nothing. We have even received a letter, containing some paragraph for insertion, and one cent in addition, with a request that we would return "as many copies of the Mirror as a cent would pay for!" This, to be sure, is an extreme case, but not so unlike many other occurrences, as to be wholly a strange one. Others seem to think that they do no wrong by withholding payment year after year. Sometimes, we know, this is the result of necessity, real or imaginary; as the debtors remember us, and send explanations and apologies, and the expression of hopes that they shall soon be able to square accounts. Such thoughtfulness is not without its comforts, and gives us a very different impression of character, from that which is received from a course of silent neglect.

"The publishing, and sustaining a religious newspaper, is indeed a very costly enterprise. The printing apparatus is all a cash expense—the furnishing, the rents, the labor, are all subject to cash payments. The paper used for printing is wholly a cash article, and in our little establishment to the cost of more than $1,200 a year. And nothing short of the utmost industry, and economy, and vigilance, could keep our little concern alive. Many local papers, conditioned somewhat like our own, have given up the ghost. Others have been kept alive by the process of changing hands—bankrupting several proprietors in succession. We assure our friends and readers that it is an extremely laborious business to keep a religious paper alive."

Life in Rangoon.—The wife of Rev. Mr. Judson, writing from Rangoon to a friend in Utica, N. Y., gives the following account of the state of things in that city:—

"It is half past 9, and I hear the cry in the street, 'Hi! give us a man, give us a man, Hi!' We have expected this, and all the front of the house is darkened, so they will not yell before our house long. The occasion of the call is to keep up a watch in the street on account of robbers, and if the watch were worth one straw we would gladly pay a man to go. But they get around a fire and carouse until toward midnight, then lie down and go to sleep, and then the robbers come. The first of these robberies occurred about a week ago, only a few doors from us. A man who lived in the house next to the one they were robbing, heard the noise and looked out, when they shot him through the heart. Last night they ran a woman through with a spear, and the night before split a man's head open. There have been four killed at as many different times, and several wounded. We are obliged to sleep with our windows open (the thermometer has been at 94 to-day) but we are not in much danger of molestation, as they could reach us only by a ladder. Our one outside door is very secure, yet when any noise awakes me in the night, instead of springing from my bed, as is most natural to me, I lie without stirring or opening my eyes but very little, until I assure myself that I am not watched. It is by waking that people have lost their lives, and there is no use in giving the alarm or attempting resistance. The robbers are a dozen or fifteen armed men. The Governor has tried ineffectually to prevent their depredations, and what do you think is his last resort? He has given orders, or rather permission, to all citizens, to shoot down any man whatever, who may be seen in the streets after ten o'clock in the evening! Is not this a wise way of managing!"

General Intelligence.

WAR NEWS.

The daily papers have been engaged for nearly a week past in debating the question whether the report of the capture of Mexico was "founded upon a fact." They have decided, we believe, that it was not. The opinion now seems to prevail, that there will be hard fighting before the city is taken. It is said to be well fortified, and defended by twenty-five thousand men.

THE MURDER OF MRS. WILLIAMS.—The Delaware Express gives the following particulars of the late horrid murder of the wife of Rev. Gersham Williams, in Wayne Co., Pa.:—

Mrs. Williams was engaged in conducting a Sabbath School, and had started on foot some half hour before her husband for the school, having to pass through a copse of woods on the way. When Mr. Williams and family arrived at the school-house, they were alarmed upon learning that Mrs. W. had not yet arrived, and commenced an immediate search, first among the neighbors, then the road-side. They soon found her, lying some 20 feet from the highway, dead, and bearing evidence that her person had been violated. Suspicion was at once attached to Bell, an Englishman, and who had been in the vicinity for some days, and but the day previous had been at the house of Mrs. W, begging, she having furnished him with a coat and other articles of clothing. He was found within half a mile from the murdered woman, strolling about, and when taken and charged with the murder, carelessly stated that "he guessed she was not dead—that he did not mean to kill her, but that she fought so hard and screamed so loud that he was obliged to choke her to stop her voice."

The villain says he came from England some six years since—that in the old world his parents brought him up to stealing and robbing—that he has been five years during his stay in America in the Penitentiary in the city of Philadelphia—that he started from there some weeks since to practice his business in these parts. He appears perfectly indifferent as to his fate. The neighbors of the lady were so much excited by his indifference, that it was almost impossible to prevent them from hanging him up upon the spot; better counsel, however, prevailed. He was examined and confined safely in the Honesdale Jail.

The following description of the murderer is given by the Honesdale Democrat:—

"Bell is from twenty-five to thirty years old, dark complexioned, of medium height, thick set, straight and well built, has a slight scar on his forehead, a distinct one on his upper lip, and a large scar on each arm just above the wrist, produced by scalding, his nose is uncommonly small, and appears to be wholly destitute of bone, head large, forehead full, look repulsive and brutal, general appearance that of a hopeless outcast and vagabond."

SUPPOSED MURDER AT MILLVILLE, WEST JERSEY.—The Telegraph, printed at Bridgeton, has the particulars of an occurrence, which is singular from its fatal result, and the extreme youth of the parties concerned. On Saturday morning two lads, one named Polston and the other Dilks, left home together, for the purpose of going out of town, a short distance, to gather blackberries.

Polston returned home some time during the day, and when questioned as to the whereabout of Dilks, said that they had some dispute and separated before reaching the blackberry field, and he knew nothing of him afterward. No search was made for the boy until Sunday afternoon, when a number of persons proceeded to search the surrounding country, but did not find the body until Monday evening, about 1 1-4 miles from town, and near where the two boys were seen together.

He had been shot, several shot having entered his face and head; he had been otherwise beaten and seriously injured. It would seem almost impossible, from Polston's age, (he being only about ten years old,) that he should commit the horrible deed; but the evidence is much against him. The deceased was about eight years of age.

SHOCKING ACCIDENT.—The Buffalo Courier relates a case of extraordinary fortitude under suffering. Mr. John A. Johnson, of Clarence, in that county, a cooper, aged about 63 years, went into a swamp about three-fourths of a mile from home, to cut timber. He cut a tree so that it fell lengthwise of a log and lodged against another tree. He then stepped on the log for the purpose of cutting the tree off. On striking the second blow, the tree fell, knocked the ax out of his hands, and throwing it some four or five feet, knocked him down, and caught his left leg between its trunk and the log, and broke it in three places, between the knee and the ankle, crushing the ankle as low as the heel of the boot would permit. He lay in this situation some time, crying for help, but none came to his assistance. At length, reaching out his hand, with much difficulty, he got hold of a stick, and with that succeeded in getting his ax within reach. With one hand he cut the tree in two, and liberated himself. He then crawled to the top of the tree and cut a limb for a crutch, and with that and his ax he hobbled nearly half a mile, when his cries brought assistance and he was carried home. Great doubts are entertained of his recovery.

COLORPHOBIA—QUITE A MISTAKE.—A correspondent writes to us, telling rather a ludicrous mistake made by two persons in this city, a few Sundays ago. One of our clergymen had by exchange or otherwise a stranger in his desk, whose complexion was not the most delicate. One of the congregation immediately hastened out of the house, and meeting another, just about to enter, said, "You may hear a nigger, if you please, but I wont." And lo! his eyes also rested upon the dark complexioned servant of God—the fit seized him, and they both went off together. In vain did the sexton expostulate, telling them he was not a "nigger," but a white, respectable, congregational clergyman. The testimony of their senses was not to be set aside, and away they went to worship "where light did not make darkness visible.

RESUSCITATION OF THE DROWNED.—The vulgar method of rolling drowned persons on barrels, and other equally absurd methods of restoring suspended animation, no doubt more frequently kills than cures. Dr. Mott, of the American Shipwreck Society, gives the following directions, which cannot be too extensively promulgated:—

"As soon as the body is removed from the water, press the chest suddenly and forcibly downward and backward, and instantly discontinue the pressure. Repeat this without intermission until a pair of common bellows can be procured; when obtained, introduce the nozzle well upon the base of the tongue. Surround the mouth with a towel or handkerchief—close it. Direct a bystander to press firmly on the projecting part of the neck, called Adam's apple, and use the bellows actively. Then press upon the chest to expel the air from the lungs—to imitate natural breathing. Continue this an hour at least, unless signs of natural breathing come on. Wrap the body in warm blankets and place it near the fire, and do every thing to preserve the natural warmth, as well as to impart artificial heat, if possible. Avoid all friction until respiration shall be in some degree established.

DREADFUL AFFRAY.—We are informed, says the Little Rock (Arkansas) Banner, of the 19th ult., that on the 15th, in attempting to serve a process, Deputy Sheriff Berchfield, of Saline County, was killed by the elder of two brothers named Allen, upon whom the writ was to be served. As the Allens had threatened that they would not be arrested, the Sheriff summoned a posse, and entering the house, attempted to execute the process, when one of the Allens, both of whom were armed, lowered his rifle and shot the Sheriff through the body, killing him upon the spot. Upon this, one of the posse, Mr. Law, drew a pistol and killed Allen, while the younger Allen fired upon Law, which was also fatal. Some one of the posse then shot the surviving Allen, the ball passing through his arm, shattering the bone, and into the breast. The wound in this case was not mortal, and he made his escape, but the officers of justice are in pursuit of him, and he will no doubt be overtaken.

THE BIBLE.—In 1804, according to the calculation of Dr. Gregory, the whole world did not contain over 4,000,000 of Bibles. In 1847, by the exertions of the British and Foreign Bible Society, the American Bible Society, and kindred associations, there are over 30,000,000 in circulation. In 1804 the Bible could be read but in forty-eight or forty-nine languages. In 1847 it is legible in one hundred and thirty-six languages—one hundred and fifty-eight lanuages and dialects. In 1804 the Bible was circulated to some extent among 200,000,000; and now it is circulated among 600,000,000 of people.

MUNIFICENCE.—Amos A. Lawrence, Esq., of Boston, pledged some time since, through Rev. Reeder Smith, the liberal sum of $10,000, on condition that $10,000 more should be added to it, in lands or otherwise, for the purpose of founding an Institution of Learning in Wisconsin, to be under the control of the M. E. Church. The Legislature has given a charter for the Institution, the requisite $10,000 having already been raised. It has been located most eligibly, and Rev. Mr. Smith has returned to the East, to consummate the arrangement with the munificent founder.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.—From fourteen Theological Seminaries in the United States, 1885 ministers have been sent into the field during the last nine years, of whom 97 have gone to heathen lands. It is estimated that we expend about 100 dollars on our own country for religious purposes, to one on heathen lands.

SUMMARY.

The Boston Chronotype has heard it suggested that such detentions as have occurred on the Sound by the fog might be prevented by a system of fog bells on the headlands and light-house points, bells of different tone being placed on different points and kept constantly ringing during fogs. If it is practicable in this way to prevent the present detentions, which amount to a great sum of time in the course of a year, a very slight tax on the vast pecuniary interests concerned, would serve to pay the expense and leave an immense saving.

Accounts, via Rio Janeiro, have been received from Monte Video to the 17th of June, and Buenos Ayres to the 18th. Affairs in Buenos Ayres were looking better, and it is hoped and expected that a settlement of the River Platte question would soon be effected. Intelligence from Maldonado to the 5th of June, announces that Col. Silveira had attacked a body of 300 men under Laprida, belonging to Gen. Oribe's forces, at Garzon, and totally defeated them. Only two men escaped, the remainder being either killed, wounded, or taken prisoners.

A lad of thirteen, named Charles Hubbard, came to his death, in East Henriett,a N. Y., a short time since, under the following circumstances. He was loading hay and his brother of about eighteen was pitching to him. As he leaned forward to secure a large fork full of hay, he struck his eye against a prong of his brother's fork, which penetrated the brain.

A fine sloop of war, named the "Amazone," and bearing the Prussian flag, arrived in our harbor the other day, and attracts much attention. She is the only naval vessel owned by Prussia, and is consequently the first and only war ship of that country that has ever visited our shores.

In Constantine, Michigan, a gentleman was shooting birds with a rifle, when one of the balls glanced, and, entering a window at the distance of fifty rods, struck a young lady on the cheek, split her tongue, and knocked out several teeth; but she will probably survive the wound.

The Sandwich Observer states that a daughter of Thomas Jefferson is a slave to a widow who belongs to a Baptist congregation in Starksville, Mississippi. Miss Jefferson is about 50 years old, and is pretty, moral, and intelligent. She cost $1,000; but, being a first rate seamstress, is very profitable money stock to her mistress.

The Mobile Herald of the 1st inst. says that a magistrate has committed to jail eleven free men of color, composing the crew of the Ambassador. The captain was obliged to pay the costs, and give bonds in the sum of $2,000 to carry these men away from the State, according to the laws made and provided in such cases. The crews of two other vessels have also been sent to prison under similar circumstances—the whole number of men in the three cases comprising 29. Heavy penalties will, according to law, be inflicted on these men if they return to the State.

Information has been received at the Department of State, from the United States Consul at Singapore, that the ship "Mary Ellen," of Boston, Capt. T. W. Dearborn, was wrecked and totally lost, with her cargo of teas, on the Island of Subi, South Natunas, on the 9th of February last, on her passage from Whompoa, in China, to New York. The captain succeeded in reaching Subi with all his crew, except two, (James Mullen, of Belfast, and John Burton, of Philadelphia,) who were drowned among the reefs and breakers.

Swedish emigrants, to the number of 400, lately arrived at Chicago, on their way to Henry Co., Illinois, where 500 of their countrymen located themselves a year ago. The community, about 1,000, have purchased nearly the whole of Henry County, and hold their property in common. They are linen manufacturers. Their religion is a modification of Lutheranism, rejecting, however, the forms and ceremonies of that church, and acknowledging no spiritual guide but the Bible, and no spiritual authority but God's.

The Grand Jury of Camden County have found two bills of indictment against Wm. Hugg, for participating in the kidnapping of Joseph Dudley, an alledged fugitive slave, and for the assault and battery committed upon him. It appears that Dudley was captured after a strong resistance, and then gagged, and tied hand and foot, placed on the bottom of the wagon belonging to William Hugg, and that it was driven by him.

The Montreal Pilot says: "By the latest intelligence from Grosse Isle, we learn that the prevailing disease is on the increase, there being at present a greater number of patients in the hospitals than heretofore.

The splendid viaduct which carried the railway over the river Neurthe, in France, has fallen; damage $500,000. A viaduct is in progress near Harrowgate, England, the masonry of which is one-third of a mile in length, across the Crimple Valley. It consists of 32 arches of 50 feet span, and the loftiest 130 feet high. It is for the railroad.

The Richmond (Va.) Republican says that Henry T. Elms, master of the schooner Fountain, of Boston, was fined $20 for permitting a slave to go on board his vessel without the written permission of his master. Elms, ignorant of the laws of Virginia in this respect, was in want of help to unload his vessel, and the slave presenting himself for hire, was employed. Elms was afterwards informed of his trespass of the law, when he promptly discharged the negro, but was obliged to pay the fine.

From a statement made by the Post Office Department, it appears that there will be a probable increase of the revenue for the year 1847 over that of 1846, of a little more than 17 per cent. A little farther reduction of postage would help the revenue—and the people.

The Jersey machine for making bricks is said to be in successful operation in Boston. Ten of them in one yard make a hundred thousand bricks daily, the clay being prepared by a steam engine, and each machine being operated by four men. Mr. Alfred Hall, the patentee, resides at Perth Amboy.

The Christian Witness gives a list of 20 living Episcopal ministers, who are natives of the good ancient town of Newburyport, among whom are Dr. Dorr, of Philadelphia, Dr. Benj. Hale, President of Geneva College, New York, Dr. Tyng, of New York, and his son, of Newark, New Jersey.

Mrs. Cornelia Speer, wife of Rev. Wm. Speer, Missionary in China, and daughter of Alexander and Mary Breckenridge, of Pittsburgh, died at Macao, China, on the 16th of April last. She sailed in company with her husband, to join the Presbyterian mission in China, on the 20th of July, 1846.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

TRACT SOCIETY NOTICE.

The Fourth Anniversary of the American Sabbath Tract Society will be held at DeRuyter, Madison Co., N. Y., on fifth day, September 16th, at 10 o'clock A. M. Auxiliary Societies, agents, and tract distributors, are requested to communicate to the Corresponding Secretary, without delay, such facts connected with the circulation of Sabbath Tracts as are calculated to show the usefulness of that field of labor. Annual Members of the Society, Auxiliary Societies, or Churches, owing or having contributions designed to be included in the Treasurer's Annual Report, are requested to forward them to the Treasurer before the 5th of September, at which time he will make up his report.

PAUL STILLMAN, General Agent.

MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

The Fifth Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association will be held at DeRuyter, Madison County, New York, on the sixth day of the week, September 17th, at 9 o'clock A. M. Sermon by Rev. L. Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J.; N. V. Hull, of Alfred, N. Y., his alternate

"Any person contributing one dollar annually to the funds is a member." "Societies, Churches, or Associations, may become auxiliary by contributing to its funds, and shall be entitled to one vote for every five dollars." "Each subscriber of twenty-five dollars, at one time, shall be a member for life." Churches, Societies, or Associations, would do well to make some of their members life members, by the payment of twenty-five dollars, especially the Pastors of their Churches.

THE NEW HYMN BOOK.

AT the last meeting of the General Conference, a Committee, consisting of Thomas B. Brown, Lucius Crandall, Wm. B. Maxson, Eli S. Bailey, Nathan V. Hull, and Sherman S. Griswold, was appointed to prepare and secure the publication of a Hymn Book suited to the wants of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Subsequently Mr. Brown, Chairman of the Committee, suggested a plan for the work, which received the unanimous and hearty approval of the other members of the Committee, and which he was requested by them to carry out. We are happy to state, that he has completed the duty assigned to him, and has prepared for the press a book which is believed by good judges to be equal in point of merit to any thing of the kind now extant. The copy is already in the hands of the printer, and the work will be published and ready for distribution on the 10th day of September next. It will contain above one thousand hymns, covering nearly six hundred pages of the size of the medium edition of "The Psalmist," now in use among the Baptists. It will be printed on fine paper, and upon stereotype plates prepared from entirely new type. In style of workmanship, it is intended that the book shall be inferior to none. To secure for it as general a circulation as possible, the price, in common leather binding, has been fixed at 75 cents per copy, or $9 per dozen. Copies will be put up in extra binding, with gilt edges, &c., to suit every variety of taste, at prices corresponding to the style.

The Publishers of the Book are desirous of learning what number of copies will be at once demanded, in order that they may regulate the size of the first edition by the demand. They request, therefore, that those in want of the work will give them as early notice as possible of the number they desire. Probably the best way to do the business will be for each society or church to appoint some person to ascertain how many will be wanted within its own bounds, and send on the order accordingly. The books will be ready for delivery, as before stated, on the 10th day of September, in time to supply at the Anniversary of the Missionary and Tract Societies in DeRuyter, all who may wish to obtain them in that way. To save uneasiness, no money will be required until the books are delivered; and to save loss, no books will be delivered except for the money or its equivalent. Orders for the books are now solicited, and should in all cases be accompanied with explicit information as to the way in which they may be sent. Those who wish to be sure of copies of the first edition, should send their orders as early as the 1st day of September. Address, "UTTER & CHAMPLIN, No. 9 Spruce-st, New-York."

AMELIA R. CLARKE, Teacher of Instrumental Music.
Other experienced Teachers are employed the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847-8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First commencing Wednesday, Aug. 25, and ending Dec. 1
Second " " Dec. 15, " March 22
Third " " April 5, " July 12

TUITION, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to $5 00
EXTRAS—for Drawing 1 00
" Painting 2 00
" Piano Music 8 00
" Use of Instrument 2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture, 1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

A MORNING CAROL.

BY M. F. TUPPER.

Open the casement, and up with the sun!
His gallant journey has now begun;
Over the hills his chariot is rolled,
Bannered with glory and burnished with gold;
Over the hills he comes sublime,
Bridegroom of earth, and brother of time!

Day has broken, joyous and fair,
Fragrant and fresh is the morning air,
Beauteous and bright are those orient hues,
Balmy and sweet those morning dews;
Oh, there is health, and wealth, and bliss!
In dawning nature's motherly kiss!

Lo! the wondering world awakes,
With its rose-tipped mountains and gleaming lakes,
With its fields and cities, its deserts and trees,
Its calm old cliffs and its sounding seas,
In all their gratitude blessing HIM
Who dwelleth between the cherubim.

Break away bodily from sleep's leaden chain,
Seek not to forge that fetter again;
Rather, with vigor and resolute nerve,
Up, to bless man, and your Master to serve,
Thankful, and hopeful, and happy to raise
The offering of prayer, and the incense of praise.

CONNECTICUT GENIUS.

A correspondent of the Boston Recorder gives a running description of some of the manufactures which may be seen on a journey through Connecticut. Starting from the N. W. corner of the State, he sees furnaces smelting down iron ore at the rate of two or three tons of pig iron a day; a shop manufacturing the best and most delicate cutlery, another making large anchors and chain cables. Fifteen miles eastward, the business of scythe-making is driven to a great extent; and in the same county, that of making brass kettles, an article made no where else in the nation, the art having been stolen from England. Two contiguous towns have become rich by the manufacture of brass clocks, sold all the world over at 400 to a thousand per cent above cost. Reaching Hartford Co., you find a gang of hands digging copper ore. The next village is supported by making axes. Reaching the neighborhood of the Talcott mountains, you find a village of 1,500 inhabitants, sustained by weaving carpets; and a still larger one 15 miles farther N. E., in the same employment. These villages are inhabited by Scotchmen, and have three Presbyterian churches. Farther on, a Shaker community raises garden seeds and brooms. Hazard's powder mills come next. Then a growing village, where are made paper, various kinds of cloth, iron wire, card teeth, and cards. Passing Hartford, you find a town of three thousand inhabitants manufacturing all sorts of brass ware, (kettles excepted, of course, if a former assertion is true.) In Tolland County you find numerous cotton and woolen mills, turning out the diversified fabrics made from these materials —besides four or five silk factories, where Italian sewing silk and twist are manufactured. In Windham Co. are cotton manufactories—there being not less than 12 in the valley of a single stream, within a space of 20 miles. In New London Co., India rubber is manufactured in numerous forms. In Norwich, woolen and cotton mills abound; one paper mill turns out $260,000 worth of paper a year. Stonington and New London have grown rich by the whale fishery. Lime (and he might have added Saybrook) furnishes sea-captains for the Liverpool packets. Meriden manufactures ivory ware; near by thirty men are employed in working patent ink-stands. Next you find a shop turning out axe-helves—then a screw factory. On the bank of the river you come to a quarry of gneiss which splits with the facility of chestnut timber, whence great quantities have been transported to other parts of the Union, and the West Indies. A quarry of red sand stone employs 300 Irishmen. A whole town near by has been made rich by the manufacture of bells of all kinds, sleigh, horse, clock, and cow bells included.

MEXICO IN THE TIME OF MONTEZUMA.

Mr. Brantz Mayer, in his work on Mexico, says that at the time of the conquest, the books or rents of property belonging to Montezuma, occupied an entire house. The monarch had two buildings filled with every kind of arms, richly ornamented with gold and jewels. He had two splendid palaces, the gardens of which were adorned in the most beautiful manner. He also had menageries that contained every species of wild beasts, venomous serpents, and curious fish, which were watched by many superintendents.

Soon after the arrival of Cortez, the emperor took his future conqueror to the top of the great temple, whence he beheld the splendor of the Indian capital.

Streets, canals, shrines; large and beautiful houses, amid groves and gardens; markets, where every luxury of fruit and vegetable was to be found; aqueducts which brought sweet water from the hills; streets filled with artists who wove the most beautifully pictured garments from the plumes of birds, or fashioned the precious metals into gorgeous ornaments; palaces where the nobles dwelt in all the magnificence of barbaric wealth; all these lay in splendor beneath him, while the land and water swarmed with an active but superstitious people —and the lanes beyond bore them across the silvery surface, dotted with floating gardens, to the foot of the mountains, where the sunshine forever warmed the fruits and flowers into vigorous life.

Such was the city of Mexico, and the style of the emperor, but it was not alone in externals that the nation was great and powerful. It was regulated by good laws, well and speedily administered; the relations of life were recognized and guarded; it fostered a good system of education; the arts were cultivated and encouraged; architecture had advanced to a degree of excellence; the knowledge of astronomy and of the calculations of time, was exact and scientific. The Aztecs were bold in war; they had built a vast empire, springing from a sparse tribe which found its home among the reeds and marshes of the lake, where they had hidden for safety from their foes; and although their religious rites were brutal and bloody, they still had some faint and glimmering ideas of an invisible and omnipotent God. It was a nation of splendid contradictions, where social elegance and comfort were almost unequalled, and their religious brutality was quite as unparalleled.

The sight of this splendid city was too tempting for Cortez. "The kingdoms of the world were at his feet." He had resolved before, to attempt the entire subjugation of this people; and the view of this wealth only stimulated his resolution, while the bloody rites of the Temple aided in exciting his ambition to give another land of idolatry to the control of the Holy Cross.

He soon after seized the king, as some assert, caused him to be put to death, or to be so exposed that his death was inevitable; yet when the wounded spirit of the Mexicans was aroused, his troops were driven from the capital.

He returned with Indian allies. He invested the city with a sort of mimic navy, which he launched on the lake from Tezcuco; and at length, after a severe struggle, the capital fell into his hands.

NEWSPAPER ACCOUNTS.

Some people have a horror of house-breakers. A strong fellow, in a fustian jacket, with a piece of crape over his face, and a pistol in his hand, is certainly a disagreeable visitor to a country gentleman in the the middle of a dark night in December; a coarse whisper, conveying a delicate allusion to your money-bags or your life, is far from a pleasing method of carrying on a conversation; and, therefore, without descending to any more minute particulars, and pluming myself upon my personal immunity from such visitations, on the score of having no house, I agree at once that a house-breaker is a detestable character, and worthy of condemnation. A murderer, also, I am not prepared to vindicate. A knife forced into the stomach of an elderly gentleman, in a half sleepy state, after a bottle of old port, a razor drawn across a beautiful bar-maid's throat, or a bullet scientifically inserted through the earhole of a deaf old lady engaged in secreting her half-year's dividend in a black trunk in the garret, are disagreeable objects of contemplation to the philanthropic mind; and therefore I at once coincide in the fervent execration in which a murderer is held by every person I have conversed with on the subbject, except the students of anatomy, and two or three popular authors of the convulsive school. But there is another miscreant for whom I have no commiseration; a wretch, compared with whose atrocities, house-breaking becomes meritorious, and murder innocent; before whose negro-like blackness, to borrow the language of Charles Philips, the darkness of annihilation becomes white as snow; whose benediction is a curse; whose breath is pestilence; whose name is infamy; over whose sunless memory shall settle the conflagration of a fury, and whose soul shall shudder beneath the appalling convulsions of a fathomless doom forever. After this description, need I say, the unhallowed monster who neglects to pay his newspaper bill?

DEATH OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.

Some incidents happened which revived her tenderness for Essex, and filled her with the deepest sorrow for the consent which she had unwarily given to his execution.

The Earl of Essex, after his return from the fortunate expedition against Cadiz, observing the increase of the Queen's fond attachment toward him, took occasion to regret that the necessity of her service required him often to be absent from her person, and exposed him to all those offices which his enemies, more assiduous in their attendance, could employ against him.

She was moved with this tender jealousy; and making him a present of a ring, desired him to keep that pledge of her affection, and assured him that into whatever disgrace he should fall, whatever prejudices she might be induced to entertain against him, yet if he sent her that ring, she would immediately, upon sight of it, recall her former tenderness, would afford him a patient hearing, and would lend a favorable ear to his apology. Essex, notwithstanding all his misfortunes, reserved this precious gift to the last extremity; but after his trial and condemnation, he resolved to try the experiment, and he committed the ring to the Countess of Nottingham, whom he desired to deliver it to the Queen. The Countess was prevailed on by her husband, the mortal enemy of Essex, not to execute the commission; and Elizabeth, who still expected that her favorite would make this last appeal to her tenderness, and who ascribed the neglect of it to his invincible obstinacy, was, after much delay and many internal combats, pushed by resentment and policy, to sign the warrant for his execution.

The Countess of Nottingham falling into sickness, and affected with the near approach of death, was seized with remorse for her conduct; and having obtained a visit from the Queen, she craved her pardon, and revealed to her the fatal secret.

The Queen, astonished with this incident, burst into a furious passion; she shook the dying Countess in her bed; and crying to her that God might pardon her, but she never could, she broke from her, and thenceforth resigned herself over to the deepest and most incurable melancholy. She rejected all consolation; she even refused food and sustenance; and throwing herself on the floor, she remained sullen and immovable, feeding her thoughts on her afflictions, and declaring life and existence an insufferable burden to her. Few words she uttered; and they were all expressive of some inward grief which she cared not to reveal; but sighs and groans were the chief vent which she gave to her despondency, and which, though they discovered her sorrows, were never able to ease or assuage them. Ten days and nights she lay upon the carpet, leaning on cushions which her maids brought her; and her physicians could not persuade her to allow herself to be put to bed, much less to make trial of any remedies which they prescribed to her. Her anxious mind at last had so long preyed on her frail body, that her end was visibly approaching; and the council being assembled, sent the keeper, admiral, and secretary, to know her will with regard to her successor. She answered with a faint voice, that as she had held a regal sceptre, she desired no other than a royal successor. Cecil requesting her to explain herself more particularly, she subjoined that she would have a King to succeed her; and who should that be but her nearest kinsman, the King of Scots? Being then advised by the archbishop of Canterbury, to fix her thoughts upon God, she replied that she did so, nor did her mind in the least wander from him. Her voice soon after left her; her senses failed; she fell into a lethargic slumber which continued some hours, and she expired gently, without farther struggle or convulsion, (March 24,) in the seventieth year of her age, and forty-fifth of her reign.

BE COMPREHENSIVE.—Talk to the point, and stop when you have reached it. The faculty that some possess, of making one idea cover a quire of paper, is not good for much. Be short and comprehensive in all that you say or write. To fill a volume upon nothing is no credit to any body, though Lord Chesterfield wrote a very clever poem upon Nothing. There are men who get an idea into their heads, and but one, and they make the most of it. You can see it and almost feel it when in their presence. On all occasions it is produced, till it is worn as thin as charity. They remind one of a twenty-four pounder discharged at a humming bird. You hear a tremendous noise, see a volume of smoke, but you look in vain for the effects. The bird is scattered to atoms. Just so with the idea. It is enveloped in a cloud, and lost amid the rumbling of words and flourishes. Short letters, sermons, speeches, and paragraphs, are favorites with us. Commend us to the young man who wrote to his father, "Dear sir, I am going to be married;" and also to the good old gentleman who replied, "Dear son, go ahead."

A CURIOUS DEATH.—The Trenton News says: 'On Sunday evening, an interesting child of Wm. S. Hutchinson, of this city, met its death in a singular and extraordinary manner. The mother had carefully laid her infant to sleep on the bed, up stairs, placing chairs in front, to protect it against the chances of rolling off. At the foot of the bed stood a bureau a few inches from the rail of the bedstead, which was deemed a sufficient protection in that quarter; and with these ample guards the child was left for about an hour, while the mother attended to her household affairs below. On returning to look after her infant, she found that it had slipped down, feet foremost, between the foot of the bed and the bureau, where it was hanging with the back of its little head against the bureau, and its chin resting on the rail of the bedstead. Life was already extinct. No noise had been heard by any of the family, and it is probable that the death struggle was very brief.'

SPOTS ON THE SUN.—A correspondent of the Newark Daily Advertiser asserts that the sun's disc, for more than a year, has seldom been seen without spots. During the two months past, (April and May) spots have been more numerous and of greater magnitude. It is reasonable to suppose that these spots have had some influence in effecting and varying the temperature of the weather. A comparison of the sun's image and spots, as they appear on a screen, magnified, have at various times shown dark patches enough, if placed together, to cover a circular area 50,000 miles in diameter; and it is worthy of remark, that some of these spots, or rather clusters of spots, burst forth suddenly and appear for a day or two, and as quickly disappear, indicating changes in the luminous envelop upon a magnificent scale. There were on the 29th of May, six spots on the disc of the sun, varying from 5,000 to 12,000 miles in diameter.

HOW TO PRESERVE GIRDLED TREES.—Mr. Pliny H. Babbitt, of this town, showed us, a few days since, an apple tree in his orchard, which two years last winter, was completely girdled by mice, for the space of about ten inches around the trunk, which was a little less than a foot in diameter. Soon after the snow was gone, Mr. B. took several thrifty little sprouts from the tree of sufficient length to span the girdled part, and chambering off the ends, inserted one in the bark below the girdle, and the other above with wax, and left them. One of these sprouts lived, and the tree bore as usual the ensuing summer. This year the tree is again in full blossom, drawing its entire sustenance through this sprout, which has grown to above 3-4 of an inch in diameter. The tree has a heavy top, and the girdled part, or about one foot of its trunk, close to the ground, is entirely dead. [Barre Patriot.

AN ARGUMENT WELL PUT.—A subscriber to the N. Y. Commercial, who has taken that paper for fourteen years, makes the following sensible remarks in a letter enclosing a remittance for another year's subscription :—

"My means are small—but I abjured wine, alcohol, and all other strong drinks, in June 1842, and have kept honorably to my pledge; the saving under this head more than pays for my newspapers, and the gratification which the perusal of them gives me, is beyond calculation in dollars and cents. When I look around among my neighbors, and see many smart, intelligent men, who seem to take an interest in the welfare of their beloved country, and yet from false economy deny themselves and their families the advantage and pleasure of a newspaper, I feel sorry on their account."

THE SWEET POTATO.—We apprehend that, in a few years, the sweet potato will be cultivated to considerable extent in New-England. It is already well acclimated to New Jersey, and the young plants may be transplanted as easily as cabbages or tomatoes. In Ohio, persons make it a business to start plants early, and sell by thousands in the market. All, then, that is necessary here to make the culture successful, is to have the plants well started in hot beds, so that they will be strong, and in good condition for transplanting by the first of May, when they may safely be removed to the spot where they are to be grown. Sandy plain land suits them admirably, and they will thrive well in any situation that is favorable for watermelons, or even for Indian corn. [Worcester Spy.

MINES IN MEXICO.—It is stated that the number of mines in Mexico, already known, is between three and four thousand. The largest yield in any one year, was $25,644,566, in 1806; and for some years previous to 1810, the average annual yield was $24,000,000. In 1842, the value of the gold and silver exported, was $18,500,000, exclusive of what was smuggled out of the country, to avoid the export duty of six per cent., and which, it is supposed, could not have been less than three millions more. Gold mines are rare in Mexico; the only ones known are those in Oajaca, gold being found in combination with silver. [N. O. Delta.

VARIETY.

The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser publishes a table showing the average price of beef and pork in the New-York market for the last 24 years. The highest average price of pork was in 1836, when the average price for mess was $23,13, and prime $17,62. For beef the highest average price was paid in 1838, when the average was $14,98 for mess, and 11,40 for prime. The lowest average price paid for pork was in 1842, when $9,27 was paid for mess, and 7,23 for prime. The lowest average price paid for beef was in 1844, when $5,75 was the average quotation for mess, and 3,75 for prime.

Semmes, the young man who shot Professor Davis, some years ago, at the Virginia University, recently committed suicide at the house of his brother, in Washington, Georgia. He shot himself with a pistol, the ball entering his left eye, and penetrating the brain. He lingered in a state of total insensibility about five hours. When his room was entered, he was found in a chair, placed at a table. A pistol was lying across his lap, and on the table an open razor. On the table was found an epen note, stating, in the form of a certificate, dated July 9, 1847, that his death was occasioned by himself, and was brought about either by pistol or razor.

Two boys were playing in the garret of a mill at Allentown, (Penn.) with a piece of rope; the eldest slipped it around the neck of his brother, and by some means or other let go of the rope, which became entangled in the cog-wheels, that work the elevators, drawing the rope so tight around his neck as to stangulate and shockingly twist him, in which position his leg above the knee was fractured, and his body otherwise severely bruised. He survived but a few moments after being released from his awful situation.

Agriculture, says Socrates, is an employment the most worthy the application of man, the most ancient and the most suitable to his nature; it is the common nurse of all persons, in every age and condition of life; it is the source of health, strength, plenty and riches; and of a thousand sober delights and pleasures. It is the mistress and school of sobriety, temperance, justice, religion, and in short, of all virtues, civil and military.

It is perhaps not generally known, that a piece of blotting paper, crumpled together to make it firm, and just wetted, will take ink out of mahogany. Rub the spot hard with the wetted paper, when it instantly disappears; and the white mark from the operation may be immediately removed by rubbing the table with a cloth.

A mother teaching her child to pray, is an object at once the most sublime and tender the imagination can conceive. Elevated above all earthly things, she seems like one of those guardian angels, the companions of our earthly pilgrimage, through whose administration we are inclined to do good and turn from evil.

There is a willow tree in the door-yard of Mr. Samuel Reed of Woolwich, which, seventy years ago, was the riding stick of the Rev. Mr. Winchell, but which now measures at the ground 19 feet in circumference; the other measures 8 1-2 feet. The height of the tree is 60 feet; its branches cover a circle of 95 feet diameter. Good judges estimate that the whole tree contains seven cords of wood.

The steamer, Empire on a single trip from Buffalo to Chicago, consumes six hundred cords of wood. Calculating that she performs thirteen trips during the season, she will consume two hundred and thirty-four acres of timber, and employ forty wood-choppers, at an expense of over $10,000. This is a small item in the expense of this mammoth steamer; yet she clears from $20,000 to $30,000 a season.

Mr. Timme, of Brooklyn, has constructed a clock which can play twenty-four tunes, commencing a new one every hour. It is six feet high, and occupies a space eighteen inches wide. The dial is ten inches in diameter, and it has the twelve signs of the zodiac painted on it. The face is cased with beautiful and elegant carved work, and the cost is only $130.

The Second Regiment of Mississippi Rifles has suffered severely from disease. When the regiment was mustered into service, it numbered, including officers and men, 884. The whole number, according to the latest returns, now amounts to 537. Of the remaining number, 167 died, 134 were discharged, 38 deserted, or resigned, 1 disgraced, and 6 promoted.

The Keokuk Register states that the sale of the Mormon Temple at Nauvoo to the Catholics, has failed, in consequence of some defect in the title. The Catholics have purchased Parley Pratt's house, with the intention of converting it into a church.

To make rancid butter sweet, heat two pounds of it in a sufficient quantity of water, into which drop thirty drops of chloride of lime, and after washing it well, let it stand about two hours in water, and it will be fresh and sweet. This is a French recipe; safe and simple.

The Baravian Government has decided that no foreigner shall be permitted to reside in Rhenish Batavia unless he can show that he has the means of living, or can induce a person residing in the palatinate to give security to that effect.

George Selwyn once affirmed in a company, that no woman ever wrote a letter without a postscript. 'My next letter shall refute you,' said Lady G. Selwyn soon after received a letter from her Ladyship, when after her signature stood, 'P. S. Who is right now, you or I?'

A farmer's description of the effect of the present favorable weather and the progress of the crops: "We could not," said he, "have managed it better ourselves, if we had the sun in one hand and a watering can in the other."

The cultivation of coffee has been so much increased in the Sandwich Islands, that considerable quantities have lately been exported to California and the western coast of S. America.

THE DAILY NATIONAL WHIG is published in the city of Washington, every day, at three o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted, and served to subscribers in the City, at the Navy Yard, in Georgetown, in Alexandria, and in Baltimore, the same evening, at six and a quarter cents a week, payable to the sole agent of the Whig, G. L. Gillchrist, Esq., or his order. It is also mailed to any part of the United States for $4 per annum, or $2 for six months, payable in advance. Advertisements of ten lines or less inserted one time for 50 cents, two times for 75 cents, three times for $1, one week for $1 75, two weeks for $2 75, one month for $4, two months for $7, three months for $10, six months for $16, one year for $20, payable always in advance.

The "National Whig" is what its name indicates. It speaks the sentiments of the Whig party of the Union on every question of public policy. It advocates the election to the Presidency of Zachary Taylor, subject to the decision of a Whig National Convention. It makes war to the knife upon all the measures and acts of the Administration deemed to be adverse to the interests of the country, and exposes without fear or favor the corruptions of the party in power. Its columns are open to every man in the country, for the discussion of political or any other questions.

In addition to politics, a large space in the National Whig will be devoted to publications upon Agriculture, Mechanics, and other useful arts, Science in general, Law, Medicine, Statistics, &c. Choice specimens of American and Foreign Literature will also be given, including Reviews, &c. A weekly list of the Patents issued by the Patent Office will likewise be published—the whole forming a complete family newspaper.

The "Weekly National Whig," one of the largest newspapers in the United States, is made up from the columns of the Daily National Whig, and is published every Saturday, for the low price of $2 per annum, payable in advance. A double sheet of eight pages will be given whenever the psess of matter shall justify it.

The Memoirs of General Taylor, written expressly for the National Whig, are in course of publication. They commenced with the second number, a large number of copies of which have been printed, to supply calls for back numbers.

CHAS. W. FENTON,
Proprietor of the National Whig.

P. S. All daily, weekly, and semi-weekly papers in the United States are requested to insert this advertisement once a week for six months, noticing the price for publishing the same at the bottom of the advertisement, and send the paper containing it to the National Whig office, and the amount will be duly remitted. Our editorial brethren are also requested to notice the National Whig in their reading columns.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Instittnion, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

NOTES OF A VOYAGE TO CHINA.

By Mrs. L. M. Carpenter, of the Seventh-day Baptist Mission.

January 17th.—To day we had our first public service. Met on deck, to accommodate the crew. Mr. C. preached from the words, "Except a man be born again," &c. A very interesting season. I cannot but think our crew a remarkably orderly one, all moves on so quietly. Yet I am sure no ordinary specimen of humanity could be disorderly under such a captain as ours. He is at once the commander and the gentleman. Kind, polite, yet energetic, and firm. The first mate is in high estimation among the crew as well as passengers. The second mate is also a fine fellow; and it is difficult to realize, with such a specimen of seafaring life before us, that a "life before the mast," could be what Dana describes, or that such scenes as those described by J. Rosse Browne, ever had existence out of a disordered brain.

I have not yet mentioned that we have a Chinese on board, a cabin boy, named Khoo-a. He is a real addition to our social comforts, understands English sufficiently to make himself intelligible, but still preserves much of the genius of his mother tongue. He talks without reference to tenses of verbs, or inflections of nouns, speaks very rapidly, and is very pleasant and affectionate, and remarkably fond of kindly notice; says his age is "Merican 20, China 21," although he has not the appearance of being more than 16; dresses and wears his hair after the Chinese manner, and seems to have no thought of changing. During our sea-sickness he was very attentive, and I observed that whenever he passed us, or had occasion to bring us aught, he would look mournfully in our faces, until we would smile, when he would seem so happy, and bound away with a smile on his own kind face, which would have done your heart good. Sister W. has asked and obtained permission to spend a season with him every evening, after his work is done for the day, to instruct him in reading and spelling our language. In conversing with Mr. Carpenter about our going out to China, he thought it was very "nice," for us to go to teach little children to read, and tell them about Jesus, but that those who are grown up "have too much bad," and are hopeless cases. But enough about Khoo-a.

The deep blue sea! Now I have seen it, as I never did before, of the purest, deepest indigo, varying from that in every possible shade to that of the azure sky, and so clear that a white object dropped into it, can be followed by the eye, down, down, down, until it becomes a mere point in the distance. Truly it is for "those who go down to the sea in ships, who do business in the great waters, to behold the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep." We are now nearly under the tropic of Cancer, in long, 34° 30′ W., rapidly leaving forever the home of our love, yet we say in the sincerity of our hearts,

> "Bear us on, thou restless ocean;
> Let the winds our canvass swell."

Jan. 21st.—Last evening a flying fish came aboard with such violence as to dash its own brains out. It is the first live tenant of the deep that has greeted my eyes since coming aboard. Poor thing—this once, ignorance could not be bliss. The sailors gave it to the steward, who added it this morning to the luxuries of our already overloaded board. The variety and excellence of our food is truly astonishing. But our perverse appetites still refuse to do it honor. We have made 2,300 miles in the last 10 days.

Sunday, 24th.—Heard again the sound of the "church-going bell;" met on deck, listened to a sermon by Mr. Lord—(the brethren take turns in the order of their ages)—and returned to our several duties at home. I hope these meetings may be blest to all, but to me they are not like our dear little Sabbath exercises, when in the quiet retirement of our own state-rooms, we four kneel together and pour out our souls before God. Most deeply and sensibly have we been permitted to feel his presence; and our softened hearts flow more and more closely together, while they burn within us, as we commune in spirit, and talk of His goodness. There is a spirituality, an earnestness, in the devotions of our dear brother and sister, that does our hearts good. We feel that they are indeed fellow helpers. We still endeavor to fix our hour of worship at the same time with our brethren at home, but now it brings it late in the afternoon. Are we indeed so far removed from them all? Within 6 1-2 degrees of the Equator; our atmosphere is like summer. We have laid aside all our winter clothing, and can hardly find a cool place even in the shade. Thermometer at 82. Spent the evening on deck. Mr. L. and Mr. W. entertained us with their flutes, and most earnestly did the wish go round, that our dear absent friends could behold us, and the pleasant scene which we enjoyed so much. The noble ship, with sails brilliant in the bright moonlight, moved quietly on to the music of the breeze; the stars one by one came out from their strange high chambers, and seemed to say, "who hath appointed us a place where ye sought us not." We often wonder at the rapidity with which they change their location, until they have almost become strangers to us. The great height of the zenith, too, compared with the diminished circle of the horizon, has often surprised me. Argo Navis has become quite a near neighbor of ours. But I missed our own dear polar star. I advanced to the mate, who stood leaning over the side of the ship: "Where is the North Star to-night, Mr. Low?" "You will not see it again until you cross the Equator to the North." "But, Mr. Low, we are not at the Equator yet; I thought we could always see the North Star, while in the Northern Hemisphere." "O no; we lose sight of it about five degrees North, near our present position." And so I must be content to say farewell for a season to that dear star which fugitives in happy America love so much, and poor wanderers on the stormy deep love equally well. No, never did I love the stars as I do now. They have familiar faces; they are the friends of my childhood. True, in the rapidity with which their location changes, they sometimes "lead to bewilder and dazzle to blind;" yet it is very difficult to realize that the fault is all in my own untraveled eye. They are forever the same, and their years fail not. I do not wonder that sailors are proverbial for kindness of heart. It is not in nature to withstand all the appeals that come to us unmingled with the earthiness of the rude, cold world. I feel my own heart warm, expand, and flow out to the whole human family; God is my father, and all they are my brethren.

Still none but flying fish seem to live here. We see them often flying about like swallows, for which they have been more than once mistaken by our land-wise-men. But we are growing in knowledge now, and I hope, by the time we reach the Indian Ocean, we shall be in no danger of mistaking a whale for a steamboat, or a porpoise for an omnibus.

January 26th.—I will not wait for the passing away of this beautiful shower before telling you how much I enjoy it. A real equatorial shower! I have sat and looked out upon the waves, and listened to the falling of the drops, and dreamed of home and all familiar things, until I am almost weary through excess of mournful delights. The falling of those great drops! Willis says, truly as poetically, "It is like the playing of musical glasses. The drops ring out with a clear bell-like tinkle, following each other so closely that they resemble sometimes the winding of a distant horn; and then, in the momentary intervals, the bursting of the thousand tiny bubbles, comes stealthily on your ear, more like the recollection of a sound, than a distinct murmur." Yes, truly, the recollection of a sound, the sound of those same great drops that used to fall before my father's door, whence a happy group of children were peeping out, and only anxious lest the ephemeral pond by the way-side should pass away with the shower that gave it birth, and so deprive a dozen little eager feet of their anticipated dabble in the mimic lake. The rain subsides, and the ocean, like a desert of sand, which it most resembles, is calmer for the shower that has fallen upon its surface, and wears for the first time that glassy appearance with which, in my land dreams, I had always invested it. What changes come over the spirit of one who for the first time is "out to sea." And now the steward comes along, and with his best smile, congratulates himself, us, and his protogees on deck, for the fine shower, which was so much needed. "And you have caught a quantity, have you not, steward?" "Yes, ma'am, about 500 gallons; enough to last the ducks and geese for some time." O those same poor fowls! I would you had enjoyed with us the luxury of witnessing their bath. Such a gabbling and quacking, such a dipping and diving, such a soaking of dry plumes and shaking of wet ones; even the poor pigs, (for all our aquatics were brought out to enjoy it together,) were in high glee, which, alas, was soon turned to mourning, when, like over-indulged children, they were obliged to be sent back to the unwelcome restraints of the nursery.

Feb. 4; lat. 21° 30′ south, long. 29° west.—I cannot yet accustom myself, when I go on deck in the evening, to looking far away to the north for those same constellations whose familiar faces have hitherto looked down upon me from a southern sky. They are no longer there. Surely it is not for us to "bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion." Orion! we stand at his feet now, and in the direction of his old home we find only strangers. There is the sword-fish, (Dorado,) the southern cross, (Crux,) and many a twinkling gem until now hidden from our eyes. And there too are the "Clouds of Magellan," strangely bright nebulous bodies, which mark at their zenith the latitude of the straits whose name they bear; and, as if to deepen the impression of our total expatriation, the sun even is throwing our noonday shadows to the south, while our friends, whom we so recently left in all the chilly discomforts of mid-winter, are casting many a wishful glance toward this his southern gate, (the tropic of Capricorn,) chiding his slow progress, and wondering "why his chariot is so long in coming." Ah, these are facts which make one realize the distance passed over, which a mere blue sky and blue sea could never do. These are our way-marks, and rapidly do we tell them. These are continually saying to us, "so far from home."

A pleasant episode in our life this morning. At half past three the Captain called at our door, and told us we could see land by coming on deck. We needed not a second summons; and there, just abreast of us, on our left, seven or eight miles distant, was the Island of Trinidad, so distinct in the bright moonlight that even "Nine Pin Rock," was distinctly visible. This rock is on the west side, almost detached from the Island, and is described by Horsburg, as of a cylindrical form, 850 feet high, with trees on it, called also, "The Monument." The Island is uninhabited, except by some wild animals; and is so difficult of access, owing to the high surf that breaks upon it on all sides, that vessels seldom stop there except in cases of extreme necessity for water. It was in sight until nearly eight this morning, but owing to the heavy rains which enveloped it, and which were as visible as the Island itself, the view was not as good as by moonlight, it being also far in the distance. This was the first land we had seen since leaving New York, and the last we expect to see until we make Java Head. Yet the time does not seem as tedious as one might suppose. The passage has been made rapidly thus far, and we have strong hopes for our speedy arrival out. Yesterday we had a pretty fair trial of our speed. A ship hove in sight ahead of us about seven in the morning, going the same way. In two or three hours we passed her, and at noon she had disappeared in our rear. This is the second ship we have passed sufficiently near to exchange signals, report numbers, and pass the usual compliments of the times. We have seen several others, but too far off to "compliment." None near enough to speak them.

Southern Ocean, Feb. 11.—Albatroses and gulls, cape hens and stormy petrels abound here, and it affords a delightful variety to our somewhat monotonous manner of life, to watch their graceful motions, sometimes "wheeling their airy flight" away up to the very clouds, as if they would rest upon their snowy summits, then suddenly turning seaward, perform their descending gyrations as easily, until they will dip their various colored plumage in the white sea foam, or, alighting, sit gracefully upon the heaving billow, rising and falling with its restless swell. Yet what are all these to the delights of a home on land? There is nothing in the novelty or sublimity of sea life, to compensate for its peril, its tediousness, except the hope that it will lead us to a field of usefulness—that it is the path which our Redeemer would have us tread. Still we have found fewer annoyances than we anticipated, and enjoy better health perhaps than when on land.

RETIREMENT.

How necessary and how valuable, to a thinking, intelligent and moral being, is the opportunity of withdrawing from the noisy, exciting and tumultuous scenes of life, and in the quiet of rural scenes, in the secresy of the closet, at the still evening tide, or in the hushed midnight hour, to engage in the sober, but profitable meditations, so appropriate to those seasons. For such moments, who will not respond with Young—

> "Hail! precious moments, hail!
> The world excluded, every passion hushed,
> And opened a calm intercourse with Heaven.
> Here the soul sits in council, ponders past,
> Predestines future actions, sees nor feels
> Tumultuous life, and reasons with the storm.'

By such a course, the highest and best principles of the soul are called forth and stimulated; the wisest and best resolves are formed, and we return to the world like Moses from the mount, having the countenance 'illumined with a heavenly radiancy, and manifesting to all that the presence of the Divine One has indeed been with us. How pure and holy then are the heart's aspirings, aiming at what is only worthy of its pursuits, the attainment of wisdom, virtue and celestial happiness. In the land of the good and just, does it seek for its home and reward, where all is purity, peace and love. Having the mind thus raised, he fails not to invoke that

> 'Blest Spirit,
> Who, studious of our peace, dost turn the thoughts
> From vain and vile, to solid and sublime;'

and may well hope to be led by Him to

> 'Delicious draughts
> Of inspiration, from a purer stream,
> And fuller of the God, than that which burst
> From fam'd Castalia.'

THE MISSIONARY'S FAREWELL.

Home of my happy childhood, one last, one sad adieu;
Too long, too fondly cherished, I go, sweet home, from you.
There is a clime more lovely—its glory who can tell?—
It is for that I bid thee, my much-loved home, farewell.

Mother, dear mother, say not this heart can love you less,
E'en though my vagrant footsteps a distant soil should press;
Can love like ours be broken, though seas between us swell?
By tears, alone, is spoken for you the last farewell.

Father, no earthly treasure could ever make me go—
No fading crown could win me, from thy embrace below;
But thy dear voice has bid me obey my Father's will,
And is not God my Father?—Guide of my youth, farewell.

Sisters, my gentle partners in life's young playfulness,
I go—and in your gladness one bounding heart you'll miss;
Then what shall cheer the wanderer, when life's rough surges swell?
The hope to meet beyond them;—sweet sisters, all, farewell

Brothers, the hour is coming, when we shall meet no more;
My tears for you shall henceforth fall on a foreign shore;
But Oh! to part forever—the anguish who can tell?
Avert it, blessed Saviour—we could not say, farewell.

Friends, when the pangs of parting shall all have passed away,
Where life's star knows no setting—the spoiler finds no prey—
Shall each dear voice the anthem of sweet deliverance swell:
Then I in peace can bid you, my friends, a short farewell.

Church where my vows were plighted, be every blessing thine,
And many a fair plant brighten thy undecaying vine;
Be heaven's sweet dew upon thee, and love thy temple fill,
And every blessing crown thee—Church, Kindred, Home, farewell.

AN INSTANCE OF PERSECUTION.

At Adar Bazan and Nicomedia, near Constantinople, infant churches have been gathered by missionaries of the American Board, which are visited occasionally by brethren from Constantinople. Rev. Mr. Schneider, in an account of a recent visit to them, gives the following instance of persecution:—

During the visit of the late native pastor of the Evangelical church of Constantinople to this place, an individual attended his preaching a single time. The poor man was at once imprisoned by a creditor for debt. Though the pecuniary demand was the ostensible object of the imprisonment, the real and only one was his attendance on the Protestant service.

He was retained in confinemet sixty-three days, during twenty-four of which his feet were in irons; (the swelling of his feet had not subsided when I was there;) and all this, though it is contrary to the laws of the land to put a man in irons for debt!

During his confinement, he was often urged by the enemies of the truth to retract, they offering him money, or promising to pay his debts, or to make some arrangements in regard to them. When they found him immoveable, they reproached and reviled him, and even spat upon him, and struck him. The Governor likewise, doubtless incited to it by the Armenian primates, labored to persuade him to return to his church; and, on one occasion, one of the officers of the Governor threatened to beat him, if he would not yield. He told him to strike; but the man had not courage enough to attempt so unrighteous a deed.

But though this persecuted and suffering man, who has a family dependent on him, was in this condition for two months, plied by every means in the power of his opposers, he remained firm to the end. To some of them he said, that if they should tear the flesh from his body, he would not return to them. And what is peculiary interesting, is the fact that he learned to read in prison. Before his confinement, he could not distinguish one letter from another, but knew simply their names, and the order in which one follows the other; and with this knowledge, slightly aided by a fellow prisoner, he learned to read, so that he can now peruse the Scriptures with considerable ease. He is a man of ready speech, and promises to be a valuable acquisition, if he persevers.

POWER OF CASTE.

You may have heard, or have read, of what the caste of India is. You may have read of Brahmins; but I fear, from all that I have been able to ascertain since my arrival in this country, that it is as yet comparatively little that people know about these things in England. In reference to caste I will give you an illustration, and you will see how it bears on the conversion of the heathen to Christianity in one solitary case. I baptized a man some years ago, and I took the pains to ascertain how many individuals were placed out of caste by that one conversion. You will be astonished to hear that the number was four hundred and sixty-one! The Brahmins took good care to ascertain all the ramifications of this man's family connections, and found them out even to the extent of his very Scotch cousins. There is nothing left untouched; and it is not merely the man himself that is put out of caste, but it is every one of his connections.

I will relate more briefly a case that occurred a few years ago, in connection with the conversion of one of our native converts. now living and adorning the Gospel. This young man was about 16 years of age, the legal age at which a Hindoo can be baptized. In his own country he was in point of rank equal to an earl in England. He had four large landed properties, and was possessed in his own person of fifty-five thousand pounds. We placed his position before him in every light of difficulty we could conceive. We said, "Here are enlightened and educated Brahmins, as they call themselves. They are adopting all the habits of Europeans, rolling in their barouches, and living like princes. You can imitate that example, if you remain a liberal Hindoo. But if you put on Christ, all this must be sacrificed. Look at it." His father was dead, but he had a mother who loved him with all the tenderness of which a mother's heart is capable. Indeed, I have seldom seen more tenderness gushing from a mother's heart than from hers. She loved him as a mother will love her only son. When we placed before him all these difficulties, he said, "I put the whole into one scale, and I put Christ in the other, and they are lighter than vanity. If you," addressing himself to me, "if you will not baptize me, I will go to another." He was baptized, and he is now a common writer in the treasury of Calcutta, in the receipt of about thirty rupees (fifteen dollars) a month.

When I was leaving Calcutta, I shook hands with him upon the beach for the last time; and when I looked upon him I wept, and he wept too. He said, "After all I have sacrificed, are you going to leave me?" I looked at him and said, "Is it come to this then? Did you make those sacrifices for me? He replied, "It is enough; I sacrifice them for the Master." Ah! how few are there in England who have made such a sacrifice for Christ as that! We talk of our guineas, as we put them on the plate, as a sacrifice. We talk of our ten pounds and twenty pounds as munificent donations. But look at this. Fifty-five thousand pounds and four estates! Look at the loss of all rank and title. The day only before his conversion, he would have been worshiped by the highest Brahmin in the country; the day after, the meanest servant in my house would not have performed the meanest office for him!

A MISSIONARY'S DEATH-BED.

The following account of the death of Mrs. Speer, of the Presbyterian Board of Missions, at Macao, is given in the Presbyterian Advocate:—

"She suffered much during her last illness; but she had many comforts; scarcely feeling the ordinary privations of the missionary lot. 'And now, my dear parents,' said she in the closing paragraph of her last letter, 'I have every comfort around me; and I trust you will be resigned to the weakness under which I labor. This seems to be the way in which God sees fit that I should glorify him, and not in an active manner. I am made willing, by his grace, to suffer, to get well, or to die.' Her husband writes to the same parents, since her decease: 'It must be a great source of consolation to you, that your daughter had a number of American and English friends here, who did all in their power to render her declining hours comfortable and happy. Her gentleness and sweetness of disposition, and her piety, filled all with admiration and affection, which was expressed in the strongest terms.'

"She was exercised intensely, with the Christian's conflicts and anxieties. After a few moments of deep reflection, or silent prayer, she remarked, 'It is a strange thing to die.' 'In what sense strange?' I asked. 'It is a dreadful thing to die; we do not know what death is.' But a moment after, as if the wing of faith had shaken off natural doubt, she said, in a tone of assured triumph, 'But I look beyond death; I sometimes doubt, but I think I can trust in Christ to save me.' A little before her death, she spoke of Heaven, desiring to be with Christ, in happiness. 'But you leave me here broken-hearted and alone.' She seemed affected, and replied: 'No, you will not be broken-hearted. God will be with you. I am going to be at rest and happy, but I will often think of you, alone and suffering. You soon will follow.' She had no particular messages to any of her friends; but wished me to beseech all our dear relatives and friends to turn to God and repent, repeating, 'O, tell them to repent.'

"Yet see how serenely she dies. 'The pulse continued to sink, and her face began to assume a rigid expression, gradually, and to become cold. I said, 'My dear wife, do you recognize me?' She replied, 'Yes; I feel like sleeping some.' Then she seemed to become conscious that she was departing, and said, 'I feel that I shall soon leave you—I soon shall leave you—I am going home.' This was very faintly. She continued to sink. I thought her beyond consciousness, and said, 'Are you still conscious?' She replied, very inarticulately, 'I think I am.' Encouraged, I asked, 'Is your hope still fixed on Jesus?' She said, more faintly, 'Yes'—her lips refusing to articulate clearly. She then sighed or moaned a few times, though not from pain apparently, gave a few heaves of the breast, and was no more.'

"And now, mark the spot where our beloved missionary sleeps—where her decaying body 'rests in hope.' The spot, selected for her rest, is beside the graves of the great and devoted Morrison, and his noble wife, Mary; close to those of his son, the lamented John R. Morrison, and the Rev. Samuel Dyer, an eminent missionary to the Chinese, who died in 1843. It is a beautiful and quiet spot. What a happy company they will be, on the judgment day, as they rise together to glory."

DEISTICAL HISTORIANS.

Gibbon, who, in his celebrated history of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, has left a memorial of his enmity to the Gospel, resided many years in Switzerland, where, with the profits of his work, he purchased a considerable estate. This property has descended to a gentleman, who, out of his rents, expends a large sum annually in the promulgation of the very gospel which his predecessor insidiously endeavored to undermine.

Voltaire boasted that with one hand he would overthrow that edifice of Christianity, which required the hands of fifteen apostles to build up. The press which he employed at Ferney, for printing his blasphemies, was afterwards actually employed at Geneva, in printing the Holy Scriptures; thus the very engine which he set to work to destroy the credit of the Bible, was employed in disseminating its truths.

It is a remarkable circumstance, also, that the first provisional meeting for the formation of an auxiliary Bible Society at Edinburgh, was held in the very room in which David Hume, the infidel, died.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, August 26, 1847.

☞ The last English steamer brought letters from our missionaries in China, containing intelligence some three weeks later than that received by the Sea Witch. The letters are dated at Hong Kong, May 20th, at which time the missionaries were in good health and spirits. Mr. Carpenter sailed on the day previous, in a Persian vessel, for Shanghai, the principal port in that part of China to which the missionaries were designated. His object was to learn the facilities of Shanghai as a missionary station, and, in case it should be determined upon, to make the necessary arrangements to accommodate the mission. The rest of the company were to remain at Hong Kong until they should hear from him. They acknowledge gratefully the many acts of kindness and attention which they have received from missionaries and others since their arrival. Mr. Dean, of the Baptist Mission, is particularly mentioned, and is spoken of as "decidedly a superior man and Christian, as well as missionary." One letter closes, "I must say adieu, commending ourselves and our labors to the prayers of our dear brethren. Forget not also to praise our kind heavenly Father on our behalf, who has brought us safely across the wide waters, and given us so many comforts in this land of strangers. Truly He has been good to us, and we desire to devote to his service the lives that he has thus graciously preserved. May you all be blessed at home, and gain with us admittance into the house prepared for those that love God." Farther extracts from these letters, adapted to give the reader a true picture of life in China, will be made in due time.

OUR ANNIVERSARIES.

The Anniversaries of our Tract Society and Missionary Association are drawing near, and it is hoped that our brethren in all parts of the denomination will feel sufficient interest in them to attend, or at least to help those attend whose influence may give importance to the proceedings. The prosperity of the denomination depends very much upon the vigor with which these institutions are sustained, and yet, strange to say, our people have not as yet fairly taken hold of them. Some of us, who have been actively concerned in them from their origin, have gone up from year to year, each time feeding ourselves on the pleasing hope that we should greet a large company of brethren, but each time doomed to be disappointed. At our last anniversary in Berlin, we expected to see a numerous delegation; but what was our chagrin on arriving there to find only the same little company that had put their shoulders to the work from the beginning?—a chagrin which was still farther increased by the want of interest manifested by a considerable portion of the church itself. Indeed we were left almost without spectators, many of the inhabitants having strangely imagined that our meeting was of a private nature, and that they had no business there! A few, however, came in, and, by an effort made at the time, others were induced to attend, so that there was an increase of interest to the last. Those who did attend had their souls refreshed, and it is believed that before we left, a good impression was made in behalf of the objects for which we were assembled, and that there was a general regret with all, that they had not, from the beginning, availed themselves of the opportunity to be present. But, notwithstanding past disappointments, we still indulge the hope that our brethren will all come up to the work. This year we meet in DeRuyter, a very central spot. We shall go with the expectation of meeting a large company gathered from all parts of the denomination. Heaven grant that we may not be disappointed. Nothing is more chilling to the zeal of those who attend for the purpose of doing good to our common cause, than to find on arriving there a house almost empty, and to learn that brother A., whom we expected, will not be present; that brother B. has some secular business that keeps him away; that brother C., upon whose aid we relied, cannot attend; that brother D. forgot all about it, until his business was arranged so as to prevent his coming, and, in short, that the very brethren of the place, perhaps, are so absorbed in their farms and their merchandize that they have no time for these objects of general interest. Such things are truly discouraging. But we will not allow ourselves to believe that it will be so this year. No doubt we shall have an interesting season, whether the delegation be large or small. We have the materials to make it such. The impetus which has been given the past year to the work of Foreign Missions, and the communications received from the missionaries, which will be embodied in the Annual Report, together with such proceedings as may be founded upon the same, cannot fail to make the coming season one of great importance. And with the blessing of God, ye also, brethren, helping together by your prayers, we do not doubt that the ensuing anniversary will be one long to be remembered. God grant that it may prove a blessing to the denomination, and to the church in particular with whom we shall be assembled. But brethren, dear brethren, do attend. Send up your ministers, your deacons, your pious and influential members; and let us endeavor, one and all, to encourage each another in the work of God. Consider how many eyes are upon us. Our Sabbath principles render us so odious in the eyes of other denominations, that our missionary undertakings,—though they dare not do otherwise than recommend the spirit which prompts them—are viewed with jealousy. We have no strength, therefore, but in union. But united among ourselves, and with the blessing of the God of truth, we shall do valiantly. *

NOTICE TO PERSONS WISHING TO ATTEND OUR ANNIVERSARIES.—The Anniversaries of the Sabbath Tract Society and the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, will be held at DeRuyter, Madison Co., N. Y., on the 16th and 17th days of September. The church in DeRuyter, through its Pastor, has authorized us to give notice, that there will be teams at the Chittenango Railroad Dépôt, on the arrival of the afternoon train of cars the day previous to the commencement of the Anniversaries, to convey to DeRuyter those who may wish to attend the meetings. By this arrangement, persons may leave New York at 7 o'clock third-day evening, and reach DeRuyter about 10 o'clock of the following evening.

BAPTISTS IN OREGON.

The Baptists have two missionaries, Rev. Messrs. Fisher and Johnson, in Oregon. Letters recently received from them state that they and their families were enjoying good health, and the prospects of the mission were in several respects encouraging. Mr. Fisher has removed to Astoria, where he will probably become permanently settled. He expected in the course of the spring to organize a church at Astoria, and beside supplying it as their pastor, would extend his labors in the settlements around. Mr. Johnson remains at Oregon City. There is but one other Baptist minister in the Territory from Puget's Sound and Astoria to the head waters of the Willamette—a distance of more than 200 miles. The services of five or six devoted Baptist ministers—men in whom the denomination have confidence—are greatly needed immediately. The missionaries request donations of religious and juvenile books, periodical religious pamphlets, stationery, and elementary school books. The Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society has given notice that a vessel for Oregon will sail from New York in September, and adds, that "crockery, cutlery, wearing apparel, bedding, and all necessary articles for housekeeping and domestic use—needles, pins, thread, &c., cannot be obtained at less than three or four times their usual price in this country—and some of them cannot be obtained at any price. We think we know many who only need to read this article in order to be prepared by the 1st of September with a generous donation."

WRITTEN COVENANT AND ARTICLES OF FAITH.

DEAR BROTHER SOMMERBELL,—Sickness, and an unusual pressure of business, have kept me from replying to you. Your apology for the injustice of which I complained, is my "ambiguity," as you call it. You say that you "wrote under the impression that I espoused and vindicated the enforcement of written articlos of faith and covenant, as a test of church membership and fellowship, and a wall of sectarian demarcation." But, dear brother, I have advanced no such idea. It is neither expressed nor implied; so that I am still of the opinion that the objectionable feature of your letter of Jan. 15th, is not so much the result of my "ambiguity" as of some other cause. But enough of this.

You seem to think that "written articles" have made many an infidel. I think not. The difficulty with the infidel is not that we have our differences "written;" the objection is to the difference, and not to its being written; so that this objection will amount to nothing.

Again you say, "If by 'written articles' he means disjointed parts of God's whole truth, I can say, that in the substance I cordially agree with him, while from the mutilation I dissent." About all this I have said nothing. You say that you cordially embrace those doctrines which I call Existence of God, Atonement, &c., but would use them only as they are used by the Word of God, "in the same connection, and by the same language." I do not know that I fully understand you, when you say, "in the same connection, and by the same language." I suppose that we have a right to speak of the existence of God, and the atonement, whenever it becomes necessary; the connection need only be observed when that will affect the sense of the doctrine. As to the "language," that is a matter of no great consequence. "Words are signs of ideas;" and if the idea is fully conveyed, that is enough; whether it is Greek, Hebrew, or Dutch, is a matter of no importance. It is possible that I have misunderstood you now, for you have neither given the "connection" or the "language" of your quotations.

You say again, "I object to any other system, because I see no authority for selecting these or any other from among God's truths, and giving them a more prominent place than other truths." If you have not found any authority, it seems to me that I have; read, if you please, 1 Cor. 13th chapter, especially the last verse. It is there declared, that the greatest of those important graces is "charity." Matt. 23: 23—"Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithes of mint, and annis, and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, faith," &c. Other passages might be quoted, but these are worth a thousand, for they fully affirm the point which you deny.

You say again, that you "do not object to any church giving an exposition of its views, but to its making those views a test of Christianity, and enforcing them on others." This is admitting the entire question in dispute. "Inquirer" did not ask if we might "make them a test of Christianity, and enforce them on others." With this admission the controversy ends.

As to your mode of restoring "Christianity to its original symmetry," it seems to me quite objectionable; and until you can change the fountain by changing the stream, your system must fail. Every honest man acts according to his faith. If his faith is wrong, his actions are necessarily wrong. If his faith is right, his actions will be right. Our works show what our faith is; so James teaches—"I will show you my faith by my works."

Again, you say that you "object to all human formularies, because they preclude the right of private judgment." I cannot see why they should. Every man has a right to believe for himself. We have a right to express our views of biblical doctrine in whatever language will best convey them to our fellow men. We are not tied up to Scripture language always. The Evangelists, in giving an account of the miracles wrought, and the parables put forth by Christ, seldom if ever make use of the precise "language;" nor do the apostles always, in quoting from the Old Testament, use the language of the prophets, but the ideas. It appears to me that your view of this matter, when fully carried out, would prohibit all exposition of the Scriptures, whether oral, or written, in an individual or collective capacity. Again, it would seem to me that you have become a violator of your own views, since you have been explaining in your own language your views of Christian liberty and obligation, and have written several "articles" indicative of your faith. I suppose that if you have a right to do this, others have a right to adopt them as their views; and if they are right, they have the liberty of being governed by them in their actions.

Again you say, "the Bible is your God made creed." Such assertions do not amount to much in the discussion of this question, for all Christians say the same.

Last of all, and most of all, you say, that to you "all truth is equally dear, wherever or whenever in God's word you find it." I am not a little disappointed that an enlightened Christian should entertain such strange views of God's word. I should like to know if Bro. S. can see no difference in importance between Balaam's answer to the ass, (Num. 22: 27,) and the word of the Lord as delivered amidst the thunderings of Sinai; or between the story of Ahab, who got mad, and went to bed, and would not eat, because Naboth would not let him have his vineyard for a garden of herbs, and the ever-memorable events of Calvary. I must say, that as instructive as these events of Balaam and Ahab may be, to me there is a vast difference between them and the others named. It seems to me that your view of Scripture truth is quite incorrect, and calculated to lead one into error; and I hope you will reconsider the matter, and attach to each portion of God's truth its proper weight.

I shall not probably write again on this question. Enough has been written. I will now fully state my views of this matter. I have no objection to a church having "a written covenant and articles of faith, only let them be gospel-wise; and if they do not want them, then let them have none, just as they like. It appears to me me that you have anticipated too much in this matter, and we are led consequently to differ to a degree that we would not under other circumstances. I believe it to be the duty of a disputant to confine himself strictly to the question proposed. This would save much time and labor. I would respectfully suggest, if you should write again, that you would read the original question. For myself, I have neither time nor disposition to say any thing more; neither do I think the question of sufficient importance to be worth the space it occupies in the Recorder.

Yours in gospel bonds, V. HULL.

SCOTT, July 16, 1847.

AN EXAMPLE.—It is stated, says the Christian Observer, that not one of the 722 congregations connected with the Free Church of Scotland, has failed to send up contributions to the Boards of Missions and Education, during the last year. The sum received for these objects amounts to $350,000. What a noble example this for other churches. Many of them pressed with famine, and with heavy liabilities for local objects, yet not one delinquent church! The whole amount of their benefactions for religious purposes, since the disruption, only four years, is more than six millions of dollars.

QUAKER MISSION.—The Quakers of England are attempting a mission to this continent to the Iowa Sac Indians. They say, "The Indians look upon the followers of William Penn as their true and faithful friends; and shall not this confiding attachment be confirmed, by an effort to rescue them, in the hour of their perils? Who is to say how great, how blessed might be the permitted results?" We hear as yet of only one "amiable and exemplary lady" that has embarked in this cause.

SHARP-SIGHTED.—Some two months ago, we copied from "The Leberator" certain rather severe comments upon the course of Dr. Edwards in connection with the "American Sabbath Union." A week or two afterwards, the editor of the Christian Observer, a paper published in Philadelphia, copied the same paragraph, with this remark appended:—"The editor of the Sabbath Recorder, if he were aware of the estimate in which Mr. Garrison's religious principles are held by intelligent men, would never cite his scurrilous paragraphs in support of an effort to revive the Jewish Sabbath, or any thing else connected with religion." We were not surprised to find this remark in the Christian Observer, for we never knew its editor to be guilty of seeing any thing good come out of Nazareth. But we must confess ourselves somewhat surprised to find the Observer's article copied into a recent number of Zion's Advocate, a Baptist paper of the orthodox school, which is generally quite free to express its own opinions in respect to the reforms of the day. All we have to say in reply is, that we are tolerably well acquainted with "the estimate in which Mr. Garrison's religious opinions are held by intelligent men," and think we see therein a good reason for copying his remarks. Be that as it may, however, we have one source of consolation in the premises, which is that the eagle-eyed editors of the papers in question have copied the very paragraph for publishing which they take us in hand.

PREMIUM TRACT ON BENEFICENCE.—Rev. Wm. A. Halleck, Secretary of the American Tract Society, gives notice, that a merchant of twenty years' experience in active business has placed in his hands two hundred and fifty dollars, to be awarded to the author of the best-approved treatise on the importance of systematic beneficence, and of statedly appropriating certain portions of income for benevolent objects. His experience has taught him, that the love of money strengthens with the increase of property, and that employments, highly praiseworthy in themselves, often betray men into covetousness, because they have adopted no system of benevolent action calculated to counteract this tendency. He believes that the danger of becoming miserly and covetous in after life is greatly overlooked by the young, and that the consequence follows, that when fortunes are amassed men fail to comply with a tithe of the new obligations which God imposes upon them. He is of opinion also, that the systematic and constant calls which the Mosaic law made for the surrender of property, were designed as a preventive to covetousness; and that under the Gospel, God had a similar design in his demand that all should be consecrated to his service.

FUGITIVES WELCOMED.—We learn from the Emancipator, that in a single day, not long ago, there arrived in Canada between ten and twenty poor panting fugitives from American Slavery. In the afternoon, from fifty to one hundred white and colored persons, from the city of Detroit, crossed over into Canada, on the Anti-Slavery ferry-boat, to congratulate them on their safe arrival. A short address was delivered to them by R. GorJen, of Detroit, by way of encouragement; after which the fugitives sung a very affecting and appropriate hymn, which was listened to in profound silence, and caused many to weep tears of joy as well as sadness. Mr. Henry Bibb, a fugitive slave who has been lecturing in different parts of the country, then delivered an address in support of the following resolution:—

"Resolved, That we hail these fugitives as our fellow countrymen and brethren, and in behalf of the citizens of Canada, we bid them welcome on this soil as freemen, and that we do here, in the presence of Him who is no respecter of persons, pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor, if need be, that no fugitive who has or shall hereafter escape from American slavery to us for protection, shall ever be taken back into bondage."

RELIGIOUS CONDITION OF THE NORWEGIANS.—We mentioned some weeks ago the fact that the Norwegians were forming settlements in Wisconsin. The following account of their religious condition is given by a correspondent of the American Bible Society:—

"All can read the Danish language, but few comparatively can read English. Their children and youth are fast learning our language, so that our tracts and Bibles distributed among them will find some one to read them in very many of their families. The state church of their own native land embraces almost the entire population, so that all who come here are already members. The mass, however, are wholly destitute of evangelical knowledge and vital piety. Such is the condition of the ministers of the establishment, a few of whom are here, doing what they can to keep out the light of truth, and continue the people under the dominion of their dead forms and ceremonies. There is but one evangelical minister among them, who has already organized five evangelical churches in their different settlements. Connected with this evangelical minister is a young Norwegian student for the ministry, by the name of Anderson, who devotes his vacations to the work of a Colporteur in the distribution of Bibles and tracts; he distributes both Danish and English books. The distribution of English reading will tend to promote a knowledge of the English language, a knowledge of importance to them and to the country."

Rev. Joshua Leavitt has retired from the editorial chair of the Emancipator, which he has occupied about ten years. His successor is not yet announced.

MISSIONARIES FOR CHINA.—Mr. B. F. Teft has published in the Western Christian Advocate a long and spirited letter advocating an attempt on the part of the Methodists to send missionaries to China. Speaking of the characteristics of a missionary suited to that field, he says:—

"He must be emphatically a man of thought, of study, of active, untiring intellectual enterprise. No hater of books need set his foot on the soil of China. Unless he is ready, like the apostle to the Gentiles, to labor till he makes himself familiar with the entire literature, philosophy, and science of the people, in addition to his reading and speaking fluently their language, he should not undertake the conversion of that book-loving nation. Nor can this taste for books be assumed at pleasure, or conferred by an election to this mission. A man must be found who has already formed, confirmed and evinced it, by a long course of patient and extensive study."

ONE IN A THOUSAND.—The Hampshire Gazette, after mentioning some recent donations to Amherst College, by the Hon. Samuel Willistou, remarks thus:—

"The above sums, given to the College by Mr. Williston, with a professorship, previously endowed by him, amount to fifty thousand dollars! But to form an adequate idea of the liberality of Mr. Williston to the public, it should be recollected that he has appropriated, within seven years, more than fifty thousand dollars for the establishment of 'Williston Seminary' at Easthampton. His donations, therefore, to the cause of public education, without regarding several smaller sums for the same general purpose, have amounted, during the period of seven years, to upward of one hundred thousand dollars! Such public munificence is probably without a parallel, especially when we consider that the donor's whole property has not been rated higher than two or three hundred thousand dollars."

INTERESTING MISSIONARY FACTS.

Rev. Mr. Abbott, the Baptist missionary to Arracan, sailed from Boston last week. In his farewell address previous to sailing, he gave the following interesting particulars relative to the Burman Mission:—

In 1816 Mr. Judson wrote to Luther Rice, his messenger to this country, and his companion in the first mission, "If any inquiry is made about our prospects, tell them our trust is in Almighty God; and if they will give us bread and send you back, in twenty years they may hear from us." Mr. Judson was then the only missionary in that vast kingdom of darkness. In a little time five or six strong men embraced Christianity, and commenced in earnest the instruction of their countrymen. One of these, who had killed 30 men with his own hand, was converted by reading a tract he had stolen. He went immediately out among the Karens, a wild people inhabiting the mountains and the jungle, and read to them his tract and the New Testament, and the hearts of many were turned to the Lord, and the entire transformation of their characters and their habits of living attested their sincerity. The Karens, 16 years ago, had no written language; now they have the New Testament, tracts, and school books in their own language; and, during the last year, four young Karens from the theological seminary, in their own land, have received ordination, and are now preaching the Gospel. Mr. Abbott, who speaks their language, has directed the native assistants in their labors, and himself explained the Word of Life to thousands of the Karens. He has also with his own hands baptized 1,700 converted Karens; 1,200 more have been baptized by native preachers, and 1,500 are now awaiting his return to receive the ordinance—making more than four thousand who have professed the Christian religion, most of them since 1836, the commencement of Mr. Abbott's labors among them.

FEMALE TEACHERS FOR THE WEST.

The Board of National Popular Education propose to collect a second class of Teachers to be sent out this Fall. It is intended that they shall go through a course of preparation similar to that pursued by the teachers sent out last Spring. That course consisted of lectures on the details of teaching the primary branches—on history—on physiology, with special reference to the preservation of health; on the modes of organizing and conducting different kinds of schools in different places, and embraced also various other topics of advice and instruction. Instruction was also given in Calisthenics and composition. The whole course occupied four weeks; at the close of which time, the teachers (thirty-three in number) proceeded from Albany to Buffalo, where they divided into separate companies, destined to Detroit, Michigan—Milwaukie, Wisconsin—Chicago, Illinois—Indianapolis, Indiana—Springfield, Illinois—and Burlington, Iowa. At each of these places, Gov. Slade had previously organized committees, who received the teachers on their arrival, and provided them with schools. One of the teachers has gone to the territory of Minnisota.

To teachers who may be willing to enter this field of labor, the Board of National Popular Education will furnish a gratuitous preparatory training, and the means of defraying their traveling expenses to the places of their destination; and will also secure the necessary arrangements at the West for their reception and employment, with compensations which shall furnish them a respectable support. In return, it is expected that the teachers will continue in the employment for at least two years, and that the traveling expenses advanced to them will be refunded, to aid others, in cases in which such income may be secured as shall furnish the ability to do it.

Applications are invited from ladies wishing to be employed. They will please address Miss C. E. Beecher, post paid, at Brattleboro, Vt., at some time bewteen the 10th and 25th of August, stating in what branches they are qualified to teach, and their views and motives in seeking the employment, and transmitting testimonials from their clergymen or teachers, in reference to all the following particulars: Name, residence, age, religious denomination, amount of school education, general appearance and manners, and moral and religious character.

General Intelligence.

SEVENTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

By the steamship Cambria, foreign news to August 4th has been received, being seventeen days later than previous advices.

The uninterrupted fineness of the weather during the last fortnight held out the assurance that the harvest of grain would be a full average one. From all quarters of Europe there is also a general concurrent opinion that the yield will be abundant in the chief grain-producing spots.

On the 19th of May the price of best American flour in Liverpool was 48s to 49s. On the 3d of August a considerable sale took place of the same description of flour at 27s 6d. This statement will give some idea of the decline in breadstuffs. The impression seems to be, that they have now nearly reached the lowest mark.

Harvesting had already begun in some of the Southern Counties. The crops of wheat, oats, and barley, were universally healthy; the potato, notwithstanding all that has been said about the reäppearance of the disease of last year, is affected but to a very insignificant extent. Reports from Ireland are equally glowing. Famine and disease are rapidly vanishing in Ireland, but, by a strange anomaly, outrage still continues rife.

The state of trade in the manufacturing districts is, on the whole, of a satisfactory character. The "short time" system, as it has been termed, is gradually decreasing, and both in the cotton and woolen districts more extensive orders from abroad are coming forward. This gratifying fact of the encouraging prospects before us in consequence of the state of the crops, warrants us to anticipate, ere long, a good and prosperous trade in both cotton and woolen fabrics.

The remains of Mr. O'Connell were embarked at Birkenhead, for Dublin, on Sunday, where they arrived the following day.

Several heavy failures have occurred in the corn trade, and many others of a serious character are apprehended.

A formidable conspiracy of the most diabolical character had been detected at Rome. The object of the conspirators, who amounted to several hundreds in number, was to massacre the citizens, and remove the Pope to Naples by force. Five Cardinals, with exalted civil and military officers, are discovered to have been abettors.

On Thursday, the 29th ult., the Great Britain was sufficiently raised to leave the keel completely visible, and workmen were busily engaged in repairing the bottom, the vessel being suspended in the air by means of the lever, the wedge, the screw, and the large boxes of sand. Great hopes are entertained that she will be immediately got off.

A frightful accident occurred on the 21st ult., at the arsenal of Rocherfort. While twenty-one persons were engaged in a work-shop, where rockets, cartridges, and similar articles were made, an explosion took place, and fourteen persons were killed, and others were much injured. A fire resulted from the disaster, and burnt for three hours.

A letter from Berlin, in a Frankfort journal of the 26th, states that two English missionaries had arrived at Berlin from Cracow, the Austrian authorities not having permitted them to fix their residence at Cracow, notwithstanding the intercession of the British Ambassador at Vienna, who received for reply that it was contrary to law to tolerate religious missionaries in any part of the Austrian territories.

The state of affairs in China was still unsatisfactory. Up to the 23d of May, when the last accounts left Canton, all business remained suspended, and fresh disturbances were anticipated. The mob had menaced the Governor, Keying, for his recent concession to foreigners, and threatened to burn his palace if he attempted to give effect to the terms of the treaty; especially in so far as regarded a concession to the English of adequate land for dwellings, warehouses, &c., on the Honan side of the river, a site for the erection of a church, in the vicinity of the present factories, and space for the formation of a cemetery at Whampoa. Mr. Pope, who had been appointed to inspect the grounds for these purposes, had been obliged to abandon the attempt. Under these circumstances, a fresh expedition against Canton was expected.

The Augsburg Gazette gives an account of several sanguinary affairs which have taken place in the Caucasus, between the Russians and Circassians, on the authority of the following letter from Constantinople: On the 16th of May, the Circassians, notwithstanding the approach of the Russian army, carried by storm the Russian fortress of Kirikalch, situated in the Cauban, which they razed to the ground. On the 20th of May they attacked the fortress of Zerebra. The garrison defended itself valiantly, and during the assault a young Russian officer set fire to a powder magazine, the explosion of which destroyed 400 men, for the most part Circassians; but such was the ardor of the assailants that, notwithstanding this catastrophe, the place fell into their hands, after a desperate struggle of twelve hours' duration. Afterward, on the 8th of June, there was a terrible battle between a Russian division, commanded by Gen. Lepiski, and the mountaineers, under the orders of Mohammed Juba. Nearly five thousand men remained on the field of battle, neither party being able to claim the victory. The Circassians are in want of gunpowder. It is said that they pay for it as much as 300 Turkish piastres per pound.

Struck with Lightning!—When the lightning telegraph was first put in operation from New-York to this City, a shrewd miller up in Livingston, who lived in a neighborhood where a daily paper had never been taken, subscribed for the Daily Democrat, in which he obtained the news several days in advance of his neighbors. He called one day upon a neighbor who was anxious to sell his wheat as soon as he could get six shillings per bushel, and purchased his entire crop. In a few days the old farmer heard that wheat had risen to a dollar, and suspecting the way in which the miller obtained the news in advance, he exclaimed: "Well, I never was so struck with lightning before!" [Rochester Dem.

Collision at Sea—172 lives lost.—The ship Shanunga, recently arrived at Boston from Liverpool, reports that in latitude 44° 25′, longitude 58° 30′, the weather being foggy, she came in contact with the Swedish bark Iduna, from Hamburg for New York, with two hundred and six persons on board. The Iduna sank in about half an hour. Immediately after the collision, the Shanunga's boats were put out, and with one boat from the bark, picked up thirty four persons only. One hundred and seventy-two persons, including the master, Capt. Ernest Andreas Moberg, were lost.

The passengers in the Iduna were composed of industrious Swedes, who were coming to this country with considerable sums of money in their possession, for the purpose of purchasing farms, and settling at the West. The collision was so sudden and unexpected, and the vessel sunk so soon afterwards, that none of the passengers had time to clothe themselves. Most of them, however, secured their money, which was mostly in gold, about their persons, which accounts for the serious loss of life. Those who were saved, had been in the water nearly half an hour when they were picked up, during which time those who had gold about their persons had sunk. It is supposed that Capt. Meberg, master of the barque, had $1,400 in gold about his person!

Peter G. Stuyvesant dead.—The papers announce the death of Peter G. Stuyvesant. It took place at Niagara Falls, where he was staying with his wife and neice, having left here about a week since on an excursion to the Lakes. He was in a plunging bath attached to the hotel when his demise took place from some cause not yet ascertained, as, though 75 years of age, he was in good health. The deceased was a direct descendant from Governor Stuyvesant, and inherited a large fortune, which had greatly increased under his skillful and cautious management. He is reckoned to have been the richest man in the City next to Mr. Astor. The value of his estate, which consists mainly of real estate, is of course many millions. He leaves a wife, but no children, having never had any; Mr. Stuyvesant was an active member of the American Bible Society, to which he devoted much time and money. He became a manager of this institution in 1832, and a Vice-President in 1839. Since then he often presided at the monthly meetings of the Board, and once or twice at the anniversary meetings of the Society.

Arrest for Kidnapping.—Officer Redgraves arrested two young men, named George Schwartz and Edward Miller, charged with kidnapping Mary Whiting, a free colored woman, from Chambersburg, Pa. It seems the accused enticed the woman away from her residence by pretending to hire her as a housekeeper to go to the western part of Pennsylvania. They told her that it would be necessary to travel through a part of Maryland, and to avoid difficulty, she had better pass as a slave, which she assented to. They then brought her to this city, and on Monday afternoon lodged her at Hope H. Slatter's establishment, which she supposed to be a hotel. Here the accused sold her to Mr. Slatter for $500, and were to call next morning for the purchase money. In the meantime, Mr. S. having cause to suspect that there was something wrong about the transaction, he questioned the woman closely, and ascertained from her the whole particulars of the affair. He then had the two men arrested, who in default of bail were committed for farther examination, and until evidence can be procured from Chambersburg. The woman was also committed. A Struggle for Freedom.—The Mercer Luminary gives the following account of a slave who recently passed through that place on his way to Canada: He was from Louisiana, and he had been three months in performing his pilgrimage journey, with nothing but the river for his guide, and in a land of enemies, the greater part of his way, ready to seize and return him to his prison-house of bondage. He is about 25 years of age, and this is the second attempt made to gain his freedom. The first was made some years since, which proved unsuccessful, as he was recaptured and taken back, when he was put to work on a cotton plantation, with a heavy bar of iron attached to one of his legs. This was worn by him for years; when, supposing that the spirit of manhood was crushed in him, it was removed. He still cherished in his bosom a desire for liberty, and when an opportunity offered, resolved to make another desperate effort to gratify it. In this he has been successful.

English Post Office.—By a return of the gross and net revenue of the English Post Office, and of the cost of management, for the year 1846, we find that the gross revenue amounted to £2,004,007, and the net revenue to £825,112. The cost of management was £1,128,437; the expenses of returned letters £40,150, and other charges £10,307. The estimated amount gross postage upon foreign and colonial letters for the year 1846 amounted to £624,788. The estimated cost of collection in the colonies, paid by the Post Office Department during the same period, amounted to £118,979. The total expense of the packet service was £129,086, and the net expense £108,083. The gross revenue of the London District Post Office amounted to £283,772, and the net produce to £6,184,477, after deducting £99,294 for the cost of management. This amount includes £190,431 for postage stamps sold by the London District receivers. The number of money orders issued and paid in 1846 amounted to 7,024,882, and the value of such orders was £14,115,153. The amount ofcommission received for money orders £59,550. The expense of the money order office in the United Kingdom for the year amounted to £29,474.

Capt. Clarkson, of the ship Woodside, from Canton, learned at St. Helena that the British brig Waterwitch, on the 12th of June last, 100 miles W. S. W. from Ainkie, captured an American built brig, having "Bantah, of Portland," painted in large white letters on her stern. No colors or papers on board. On the log slate was written Capt. Norsyth. The crew were all Brazilians. She had on board 508 live and two dead slaves. She was sent to Sierra Leone for adjudication. The Bantah was eight days out from the coast, between Congo river and Ambuselle.

SUMMARY.

The Matamoros Flag says that the following may be relied upon as nearly the correct number, and the disposition, of the troops under our two Generals in Mexico:—

Under Taylor:		Under Scott:
Buena Vista	2,900	Puebla	8,500
Monterey	750	with Cadwalader	1,500
Cerralvo	260	with Pillow	2,500
Upper Grande	3,500	with Pierce	4,000
Lower Grande	1,600
Total	9,010	Total	16,500
		Grand Total	25,510

The Lawrence Courier says that the contractors on the Bay State Mills, now hoist their brick and mortar by steam. A small engine is placed in the lower story of the mill, to which is applied an endless chain running from the engine to the floor upon which the workmen are engaged. To the chain the hods of brick and mortar are fastened by a hook, which is firmly affixed to the hod. On arriving at the top the tenders take the hods from the chain and carry them to any desired part of the building. A man stands near the engine to take off the empty hods as they approach the floor by the downward side of the chain. The labor of about 25 men is saved by this ingenious invention.

The repairer of the telegraphic line between Boston and Worcester discovered a day or two since that the wire had been tampered with in the following manner; a short piece of the wire had been broken off, and a piece of silk cord, of the same general appearance, had been fixed so that it could be looped into the place, which would instantly destroy the communication, and at the same time evade the discovery of the repairer.

The Minaret of the Mosque of Sultan Bajazet, at Constantinople, was, a short time since, struck by lightning. The whole tower fell, and in doing so crushed two persons. Three times this year have mosques been struck by lightning in Constantinople. This has caused great alarm among the people, who, being superstitious, see in it the presage of misfortune for the Ottoman empire.

The New Orleans Board of Health report, under date of August 2d, "that the cases of yellow fever having been numerous during the the past week, and 47 thereof fatal, it becomes their duty to apprise the public, and particularly the unacclimated, that we are on the eve of an epidemic, that the latter may absent themselves in time, and avoid such exposure and imprudence as may increase their susceptibility to the disease."

Ship Spartan, arrived off Nantucket, last week, while on the Off Shore Ground, took a sperm whale, perfectly milk white in every part. It was the size of a 90 bbl. whale, but yielded only 55 bbls. of oil. The teeth were entirely gone, and its appearance denoted extreme old age. The "oldest whaleman" never saw or heard of a white whale, so far as we have been able to learn.

It is said that M. Banvard has in the short period of seven months, realized fifty thousand dollars from his panoramic view of the Mississippi river, in Boston. He has purchased a lot of ground in New York, with a portion of the profits, and intends to erect a suitable building upon it, for the purpose of exhibiting his picture.

The Boston Chronotype says that on Saturday afternoon, as a man named Elisha Washburn was driving a heavily loaded four horse team, at East Cambridge, he, from some unaccountable cause, fell under the wheels of the wagon, which passed over his head, crushing it in a horrible manner. He lived but a few moments after.

By the new regulation, in the State of New-York, Judges of the Superior Court are to receive $70 per week; Judges of the Common Pleas $60 a week each; and Judges of the Supreme Court $50 a week each. The two former are County Courts, and the salaries are established by the supervisors. The salaries of the Supreme Judges have been fixed by the Legislature.

The mercantile shipping of the civilized world would amount to about 8,000,000 tons; which is worth, new and old, $30 per ton; and nets clear of expenses interest, and insurance, 10 per cent, or $24,000,000 per annum. The appropriation to the British Navy for the current year, is $33,620,200.

An exchange paper says that a gentleman of Virginia has purchased an island in the Chesapeake and stocked it with cats, for the purpose of obtaining the fur, for the manufacture of fashionable articles of wearing apparel.

It is stated that during the passage of the Sea Witch from Canton for New York, she sailed the distance of 1800 miles, or three hundred miles a day, in six successive days—a feat which was never before accomplished.

The deaths from ship fever at the Albany alms-house, have averaged five per day since the commencement of the month, and cases are increasing with the accumulation of emigrants.

The editor of the Art Union Journal says he has recently seen a block of ice two feet long and nearly two inches thick produced from pure spring water, in twenty minutes.

A rich vein of copper has been recently discovered on a farm near Princeton, N. J. Arrangements are making for an extensive examination of it.

Upwards of 420 tons of bomb shells have been turned out from St. Louis, since the commencement of the war.

It is said that Lewisburg, a town on the Susquehanna river, of about 3,000 inhabitants, has not in all the place a single shop or tavern where intoxicating liquor is vended.

The Irish Wesleyan Conference met at Belfast in June. The diminution of the Conference by deaths and removals, the past year, had been about 3,000.

There was a fire in New York on Sunday night last, which burnt up nearly a whole block of buildings, bounded by Front, Scammel, Walnut, and Water sts.

The N.Y. Tribune says:—We call the attention of the Receivers of the Plainfield Bank, to the fact that a large amount of perfectly new bills of that broken concern are daily offered in Wall-st. for sale at 40 to 45 cents on the dollar. They have never been in circulation, and are numbered consecutively, as if just cut from sheets. It may be a matter of some interest to the unfortunate real bill-holders to know where this apparently unlimited supply comes from. Who has the plates of this Bank?

The Portland Argus states that Messrs, Barnes & Hall, lumber dealers of that city, not long since advertised a pocket-book as lost, containing some papers and about $150. On Monday morning it was found in their back shed with the papers, and the following very cool note enclosed, which is given verbatim: "Just 152 dollars will pay this and interest if ever i git able i am now as poor as the man that will bimeby git me."

A short time since six of the slaves employed by Government on the public works at Tortugas, took a small schooner tender and a boat, and started, as was supposed, for the Bahamas. When about ninety miles from Key West, to the eastward, they, being short of water, landed on Matacamba, and were captured by one of our recking vessel's crew, and brought to Key West. They have been libeled for salvage.

At the meetings of the Alumni of Middlebury College, present at the late Commencement, we are informed that, after a very full discussion of the state of the College, it was resolved to raise fifty thousand dollars to place it on a firmer basis, and to appeal to the graduates for the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars. The Alumni present were to undertake to raise fifty dollars each.

The Commencement at Hamilton College took place July 28. Number of the graduating class 29. The Baptist Register says, "Their performances would have done honor to any institution in the Union." In the evening an address on Civil Liberty, by Dr. Bacon, of New Haven, was listened to by a large assembly with deep interest.

The Richmond Whig says:—The Rev. Stephen Taylor, formerly of Richmond, now of Petersburg, declines accepting the honorary degree of D. D. recently conferred upon him by the Emory and Henry College. He objects to the title, because it has become utterly perverted and useless, and if not in our own, at least in the eyes of foreigners, ridiculous.

The last Martinsburg (Va.) Gazette says that during the preceding fortnight, not less than twenty slaves have absconded, or been detected in the attempt to escape from their masters in that vicinity. Three of them succeeded in reaching a "free state," one of whom had been caught and carried back to Martinsburg.

An exchange paper says that "Capt. Dorovan, once editor of the Wabash Standard, lately returned from Mexico, where he had been taken by the enemy and 'sold into slavery,' but succeeded in making his escape, and joined Gen. Scott's army, after the battle of Cerro Gordo. He brought $350 at public sale."

In Bristol, Ct., on Thursday, a boy about 10 years of age, immediately after being reproved by his uncle, with whom he was living, for some misconduct, went into the house, and bringing a loaded gun, deliberately shot him—the whole discharge taking effect in the head and face—killing the man almost instantly.

The N. Y. Express has received a unofficial statement of "Uncle Sam's Cash Account," by which it is made to appear, and pretty clearly too, that the deficiency, to be obtained by loans in 1848, will amount to about $49,000,000!

Gov. Young has issued his proclamation offering a reward of $500 for the arrest and delivery of Le Grand Warren, late of Montgomery, Orange Co., who, it will be remembered, inflicted a wound upon the person of Wm. L. Dickinson, late of Wallkill, in the same Co., whereof he has since died.

Stephen Daye is said to have been the first printer in North America. A Committee has been appointed at Boston, consisting of Buckingham, Marvin, Dutton, Ford and Nicholis, to devise means to honor his memory.

We learn from the Boston Whig, that Gerrit Smith has given the sum of $50 for the purpose of printing Mr. Sumner's Lecture, that a copy may be put into the hands of every lawyer and minister in New-England. S. C. Philips of Salem, has added $25 to the same fund.

We regret to announce the death of Marve Hale, Esq., proprietor and editor of the Elizabethtown Journal, at his residence in Elizabethtown. His death was caused by lock-jaw resulting from the injury received a few days since on the railroad.

There are seventy-four towns in Ireland with a minimum of 2,500 inhabitants, which do not contain one bookstore! There are six entire counties, viz., Donegal, Kildare, Leitrim, Queens, Westneath, and Wicklow, which do not contain one bookseller!

Father Matthew, the great apostle of temperance, is traveling in Germany. Recent letters from Prague affirm that he was in that city.

TRACT SOCIETY NOTICE.

The Fourth Anniversary of the American Sabbath Tract Society will be held at DeRuyter, Madison Co., N. Y., on fifth day, September 16th, at 10 o'clock A. M. Auxiliary Societies, agents, and tract distributors, are requested to communicate to the Corresponding Secretary, without delay, such facts connected with the circulation of Sabbath Tracts as are calculated to show the usefulness of that field of labor. Annual Members of the Society, Auxiliary Societies, or Churches, owing or having contributions designed to be included in the Treasurer's Annual Report, are requested to forward them to the Treasurer before the 5th of September, at which time he will make up his report.

Paul Stillman, General Agent.

MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

The Fifth Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association will be held at DeRuyter, Madison County, New York, on the sixth day of the week, September 17th, at 9 o'clock A. M. Sermon by Rev. L. Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J.; N. V. Hull, of Alfred, N. Y., his alternate.

"Any person contributing one dollar annually to the funds is a member." "Societies, Churches, or Associations, may become auxiliary by contributing to its funds, and shall be entitled to one vote for every five dollars." "Each subscriber of twenty-five dollars, at one time, shall be a member for life." Churches, Societies, or Associations, would do well to make some of their members life members, by the payment of twenty-five dollars, especially the Pastors of their Churches. W. B. Gillett, Rec. Sec.

THE NEW HYMN BOOK.

At the last meeting of the General Conference, a Committee, consisting of Thomas B. Brown, Lucius Crandall, Wm. B. Maxson, Eli S. Bailey, Nathan V. Hull, and Sherman S. Griswold, was appointed to prepare and secure the publication of a Hymn Book suited to the wants of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Subsequently Mr. Brown, Chairman of the Committee, suggested a plan for the work, which received the unanimous and hearty approval of the other members of the Committee, and which he was requested by them to carry out. We are happy to state, that he has completed the duty assigned to him, and has prepared for the press a book which is believed by good judges to be equal in point of merit to any thing of the kind now extant. The copy is already in the hands of the printer, and the work will be published and ready for distribution on the 10th day of September next. It will contain above one thousand hymns, covering nearly six hundred pages of the size of the medium edition of "The Psalmist," now in use among the Baptists. It will be printed on fine paper, and upon stereotype plates prepared from entirely new type. In style of workmanship, it is intended that the book shall be inferior to none. To secure for it as general a circulation as possible, the price, in common leather binding, has been fixed at 75 cents per copy, or $9 per dozen. Copies will be put up in extra binding, with gilt edges, &c., to suit every variety of taste, at prices corresponding to the style.

The Publishers of the Book are desirous of learning what number of copies will be at once demanded, in order that they may regulate the size of the first edition by the demand. They request, therefore, that those in want of the work will give them as early notice as possible of the number they desire. Probably the best way to do the business will be for each society or church to appoint some person to ascertain how many will be wanted within its own bounds, and send on the order accordingly. The books will be ready for delivery, as before stated, on the 10th day of September, in time to supply at the Anniversary of the Missionary and Tract Societies in DeRuyter, all who may wish to obtain them in that way. To save uneasiness, no money will be required until the books are delivered; and to save loss, no books will be delivered except for the money or its equivalent. Orders for the books are now solicited, and should in all cases be accompanied with explicit information as to the way in which they may be sent. Those who wish to be sure of copies of the first edition, should send their orders as early as the 1st day of September. Address, "Utter & Champlin, No. 9 Spruce-st, New-York."

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

A NAME IN THE SAND.

BY MISS HANNAH F. GOULD.

Alone I walked on the ocean strand,
A pearly shell was in my hand,
I stooped and wrote upon the sand
My name, the year, the day.
As onward from the spot I passed,
One lingering look I fondly cast;
A wave came rolling high and fast,
And washed my lines away.

And so, methought, 't will shortly be
With every mark on earth from me!
A wave of dark oblivion's sea
Will sweep across the place
Where I have trod—the sandy shore
Of time—will be to me no more;
Of me, my day, the name I bore,
Will leave no track nor trace.

And yet with Him who counts the sands,
And holds the waters in his hands,
I know a lasting record stands,
Inscribed against my name,
Of all this mortal part hath wrought—
Of all this thinking soul hath thought,
And from these fleeting moments caught
For glory or for shame.

KING'S EVIL.

The name of King's Evil was applied to scrofulous diseases because the kings of England and France claimed, and were supposed to possess, the power of curing by the simple process of touching the afflicted with the hand. The hand of the seventh son of a seventh son, and also the hand of a man who had been hanged, possessed the same healing property—which last must have been a flattering association for the monarchs. In England, it is said, the miracle was first wrought by Edward the Confessor; nor did the lapse of centuries impair the faith of any of the parties concerned—Charles II. having, in the course of twenty-two years, during which exact registers were kept, touched 92,107 scrofulous persons.

Wiseman, who held the office of sergeant-surgeon, a man of great repute in his day, and of undoubted skill (for the folio volume on surgery which he has left behind him may be consulted with advantage even at the present time,) bears the following testimony to the efficacy of his royal master's treatment:—

"I must needs profess that what I write, (that is, on the subject of scrofula,) will do little more than show the weakness of our ability when compared with his Majesty's, who cureth more in one year than all the surgeons in London have done in an age."

Brown, who was also one of his Majesty's chirurgeons, and chirurgeon of his Majesty's hospital in London, makes a statement similar to that of Wiseman, and asserts that Cromwell was anxious to exercise this as well as the other prerogatives of royalty, but that the practice failed in his hands, "he having no more right to the healing power than he had to the legal jurisdiction." It seems, however, that the faith of Wiseman was not so absolute but that he deemed it expedient to add to his other dissertations, sixty-four closely-printed pages on the history of the king's evil, and the mode of treating it by ordinary means. It is probable that there were others who had no faith at all, although it might be dangerous to express their sentiments—one Thomas Rosewell having, in the year 1664, been tried on a charge of high treason, for having publicly said that "the people made a flocking to the king upon pretence of being healed of the king's evil, which he could not do, but that they, being priests and prophets, could not do as much." Rosewell was found guilty, but afterwards pardoned. King William declined to exercise this part of the royal prerogative, but it was resumed by Queen Anne, as is shown by a passage in the "Life of Dr. Johnson," in which it is stated that he was taken to her Majesty when a child, "to be touched for the evil, by the advice of an eminent physician, Sir John Floyer." The good sense of King George I. put an end to this absurdity, but it continued to flourish in France under Louis XV., and in this country it was soon followed by others, over which the royal authority had no control. CASE OF SOMNAMBULISM.

Altogether the most curious case of somnambulism on record is that of a young ecclesiastic, the narrative of which, from the immediate communication of an archbishop of Bordeaux, is given under the head of "Somnambulism" in the French Encyclopedia. This young ecclesiastic, when the archbishop was at the same seminary, used to rise every night, and write out either sermons or pieces of music. To study his condition, the archbishop betook himself several nights to the chamber of the young man, where he made the following observations: The young man used to take paper and write. Before he wrote music he would take a stick and rule the lines with it. He wrote the notes, together with the words corresponding with them, with perfect correctness. Or when he had written the words too wide, he altered them. The notes that were to be black he filled in after he had completed the whole. After completing a sermon, he read it aloud from beginning to end. If any passage displeased him, he erased it, and wrote the amended passage correctly over the other: on one occasion he had to substitute the word "adorable" for "divine," but he did not omit to alter the preceding "tec" into "cet," by adding the letter "t" with exact precision to the word first written. To ascertain whether he used his eyes, the archbishop interposed a sheet of pasteboard between the writing and his face. He took not the least notice, but went on writing as before. The limitation of his perception to what he was thinking about was very curious. A bit of anniseed cake that he had sought for he ate approvingly; but when, on another occasion, a piece of the same cake was put in his mouth, he spat it out without observation. The following instance of the dependence of his perceptions upon, or rather their subordination to his preconceived ideas, is truly wonderful: It is to be observed that he always knew when his pen had ink in it. Likewise, if they adroitly changed his papers when he was writing, he knew it, if the sheet substituted was of different size from the former, and he appeared embarrassed in that case. But if the fresh sheet of paper, which was substituted for that written on, was exactly the same size with the former, he appeared not to be aware of the change. And he would continue to read off his composition from the blank sheet of paper as fluently as when the manuscript lay before him; nay, more, he would continue his corrections and introduce his amended passages, writing it upon exactly the same place on the blank sheet which it would have occupied on the written page. [Blackwood's Magazine.

WHAT TEMPERANCE CAN DO.

In Mrs. Hall's book on Ireland, occurs the following passage, which a person will hardly read without emotion:—

"We entered one day a cottage in the suburbs of Cork; a young woman was knitting stockings at the door. It was as neat and comfortable as any in the most prosperous district of England. We tell her brief story in her own words as nearly as we can recollect them:—'My husband is a wheelright, and always earns his guinea a week; he was a good workman, but the love of drink was strong in him, and it was'nt often he brought me home more than five shillings out of his one pound on Saturday night, and it broke my heart to see the poor children too ragged to send to school, to say nothing of the starved look they had out of the little I could give them. Well, God be praised, he took the pledge, and the next Saturday he laid twenty-one shillings upon the chair you sit upon. O! did'nt I give thanks upon my bended knees that night? Still I was fearful it would n't last, and I spent no more than the five shillings I used to; may be the money will be more wanted than it is now. Well, the next week he brought me the same, and the next, and the next, until eight weeks had passed; and, glory to God! there was no change for bad in my husband, and all the while he never asked me why there was nothing better for him out of his earnings, so I felt there was no fear for him, and the ninth week, when he came home to me, I had this table bought, and these six chairs, one for myself, four for the children, and one for him: and I was dressed in a new gown, and the children all had new clothes, and shoes and stockings, and upon his chair I put a bran new suit, and upon his plate I put the bill and receipt for them all, just the eight sixteen shillings, the cost that I'd saved out of his wages, not knowing what might happen, and that always went for drink. And he cried, good lady and good gentleman, he cried like a baby, but 'twas with thanks to God; and now where's the healthier man than my husband in the whole county of Cork, or a happier wife than myself, or decenter or better fed children than our own?"

ANECDOTE OF STEPHEN GIRARD.

The following capital anecdote, illustrative of the peculiarities of the late Stephen Girard, of Philadelphia, is from the New Bedford Bulletin. We have never seen it published before:—

"Mr. Girard had a favorite clerk, one who every way pleased him, and who, when at the age of twenty-one years, expected Mr. G. to say something to him in relation to his future prospects, and perhaps lend him a helping hand in starting in the world. Mr. G. said nothing, carefully avoiding the subject of his escape from minority. At length, after the lapse of some few weeks, the clerk mustered courage enough to address Mr. G. upon the subject.

"I suppose, Sir," said the clerk, "I am now free; and I thought I would say something to you as to my future course. What do you think I had better do?"

"Yes, yes, I know you are free," said Mr. G., "and my advice to you is, that you go and learn the cooper's trade."

This announcement well-nigh threw the clerk off the track, but, recovering his equilibrium, he said that if Mr. G. was in earnest, he would do so.

"I am in earnest," said Mr. G.; and the clerk, rather hesitatingly, sought one of the best coopers, agreed upon the terms of apprenticeship, and went at it in earnest. "In process of time," the young cooper became master of his trade, and could make as good a barrel as any other cooper. He went and told Mr. G. that he had graduated with all the honors of the craft, and was ready to set up his business; at which the old gentleman appeared much gratified, and told him to make three of the best barrels he could get up. The young cooper selected the choicest materials, and soon put in shape, and finished his three barrels, and wheeled them up to the old gentleman's counting-room. Mr. G. said the barrels were first rate, and demanded the price.

"One dollar," replied the clerk, "is as low as I can live by."

"Cheap enough," said his employer; "make out your bill and present it."

And now comes the cream of the whole. Mr. G. drew a check for $20,000, and handing it to the clerk-cooper, closed with these words:

"There, take that, and invest it in the best possible way, and if you are unfortunate and lose it, you have a good trade to fall back upon, which will afford you a good living at all times."

A CURIOUS WILL.

The Courier des Etats Unis gives an account of a singular will left by a wealthy notary in Paris, about twenty-five years since, and which is yet in course of fulfillment. His greatest pleasure in life had been to gather his numerous friends around his table and treat them splendidly, being generous, and a good liver, and he conceived the notion of perpetuating these social gatherings after his death. Accordingly, by his will he instituted an annual banquet for twenty of his chosen friends, appropriating to the purpose, the sum of 2,000 francs. The details of the feast were strictly enjoined, directing the expense always to be 100 francs a head. The memory of the deceased was to be toasted, and to make the subject of conversation as friendship or politeness might dictate. The feast was to be inviolably the same, twenty-one plates to be always set, (one for himself as perpetual head of the table,) and the 2,000 francs to be expended.

The first year the twenty friends were all there, but year after year they were removed by death, until in twenty years they were reduced to eight. These partook as customary of the feast, and toasted the memories of their departed companions. Last year, however, there were but two, who solely shared the luxurious but melancholy banquet. The two knew each other but little, and met yearly at this table. Their positions were very different. One was very rich, while misfortune had reduced the other to destitution. The rich and the poor man sat coldly opposite to each other until, warmed by the wines, they had forgotten their different circumstances.

On the first of June, this year, the feast again returned, but the rich man was dead, and the poor and only survivor seated himself at the table laden with silver, and its twenty-one covers and its delicious viands. There he sat, the victim of poverty, subject to all its privations, prveaded by a feeling of sadness and desolation, to a magnificent banquet of 2,000 francs.

Pressed by his wants, he made bold to request that the sum which was applied to this yearly feast for himself might be appropriated to his daily sustenance. The lawyer showed him the positive clause of the will, which he was compelled to see executed to the letter. The poor man retired in sadness, thinking how many days he would be obliged to go without a dinner, while once a year he was compelled to be surfeited with a feast prepared for 21 persons and valued at 2,000 francs! A singular piece of folly truly.

Knowledge is Power—Curious Illustration.—At a meeting which took place the other evening for the purpose of forming a North London Mechanism Institute, Mr. Basil Montague, as an illustration of the maxim that knowledge is power, related the following anecdote. He was walking a few months ago in Portland Place, when he observed a large mastiff dog having a lesser one in his grip. Several persons tried, by splitting the mastiff's ear, and by pinching his tail, to make it let go its hold, but in vain. At last a delicate and dandified young gentleman came up, and making his way through the circle, requested to be allowed to separate the dogs; assent was given amid jeers and laughter, when the dandy slowly drew from his pocket a large snuff-box, and having taken a pinch for himself, inserted his finger again in the box, and withdrawing a larger pinch, deliberately applied it to the mastiff's nose. The snuff operated so powerfully on the animal's olfactory nerves, that it not only immediately let go its hold, but made its escape as fast as it could. The dandy was loudly cheered, upon which he stopped for a moment and said, "Gentlemen, I have merely given you a proof that knowledge is power."

Devices of the States.—It is said that when the first Congress met after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, it was in contemplation, but afterwards abandoned, to have the seats of each delegation wrought with some device, descriptive of the staples of their several States, viz.:—

New Hampshire, to be represented by a pine tree.
Massachusetts, by a barrel of fish.
Rhode Island, a hamper of cheese.
Connecticut, an ox.
New York, a hogshead of flaxseed.
New Jersey, a bundle of flax.
Pennsylvania, a bag of wheat.
Delaware, a bag of wool.
Maryland, a pig and bar iron.
Virginia, a hogshead of tobacco.
North Carolina, a barrel of tar.
South Carolina, a bag of cotton.
Georgia, a barrel of rice.

Labor in Switzerland.—None of the women are exempt from field work, not even in the families of very substantial peasant proprietors, whose houses are furnished as well as any country manse with us. All work as regularly as the poorest male individual. The land, however, being their own, they have a choice of work, and the hard work is generally done by the men. The felling and bringing home wood for fuel, the mowing grass generally, but not always, the carrying out manure on their backs, the handling horses and cows, digging, and such heavy labor, is man's work; the binding the vine to the pole with straw, which is done three times in the course of its growth, the making the hay, pruning the vine, twitching off the superfluous leaves and tendrils, these lighter yet necessary jobs to be done about vineyards or orchards, form the women's work.

Luther's Marriage.—Catharine von Bora was a beautiful girl, of noble birth, who, having fallen in love with a poor student of Nuremberg, had been condemned by her parents to the cloister. Escaping with eight of her companions, after some years, she took refuge at Wittemberg. Here Luther became attached to her. Yet, with a sense of justice, rather unusual in a lover, he wrote to the Nuremberg student—'If you desire to obtain your Catharine von Bora, make haste before she is given to another, whose she almost is. Still she has not yet overcome her love for you. For my part, I should be delighted to see you united.'

The student not responding to this offer, Luther married her. In this union he was most happy—the details of his domestic life are full of sweetness and tenderness.

A Lessen for Scolding Wives.—"And I dare say you have scolded your wife very often, Newman," said I once.

Old Newman looked down, and his wife looked up to reply—

"Never to signify—and if he has, I deserve it?"

"And I dare say, if the truth were told, you have scolded him quite as often."

"Nay," said the old woman, with a beauty of kindness which all the poetry in the world cannot excel. "How can a wife scold her good man, who has been working for her and her little ones all day? It may do for a man to be peevish, for it is he who bears the crosses of the world, but who should make him forget them but his own wife? And she had best for her own sake, for nobody can scold much when the scolding is all on one side."

Prevention of Infection from Typhus Fever.—Dr. J. C. Smith obtained £5000 from Parliament for the following receipt:—"Take six drachms of powdered nitre (saltpetre,) and 6 drachms of sulphuric acid (oil of vitriol;) mix them in a large tea cup. By adding one drachm of the oil at a time, a copious discharge of nitrous acid gas will take place. The cup to be placed during the preparation, on a hot hearth or a plate of heated iron, and the mixture stirred with a tobacco pipe. The quantity of gas may be regulated by lessening or increasing the quantity of ingredients. The above is for a moderate-sized room; half the quantity would be sufficient for a small room. Avoid as much as possible breathing the gas when it first rises from the vessel." No injury to the lungs will happen when the air is impregnated with the gas which is called nitrous gas; and it cannot be too widely known that it possesses the property of preventing the spred of fever.

VARIETY.

The Boston Journal says that a little boy, named William Hunter, had been for some months ill, at the Massachusetts General Hospital, and his mother was with him. On Thursday evening, he sent for the superintendent, and asked him to pray by his bedside. Then, after many thanks for his kindness, he said, 'I shall die to-morrow morning, and I now am not afraid to die; but oh! do pray for my mother!' During the night he made repeated inquiries, as with earnest longings, for the approach of day. Morning came, and the child sank into a deep, sweet sleep, from which he never awoke on earth.

A distinguished foreigner landing at one of our ports, heard that the mother of Washington was at a hotel. Gaining access to her, he ventured to ask her a question, which he thought it would take her as long to answer as would be suitable for him to remain in the presence of such a personage. The question was, how did you train up your son to make him such a great man. "I taught him the lesson of obedience." This should be taught to all who would command like Washington.

It is asserted in the "Transactions of the Society of Arts" that there is a great advantage in fattening geese, turkeys, and, in short, fowls of every description on potatoes mixed with meal. On this diet they are said to fatten in less than one half the time ordinarily required to bring them to the same condition of "excellence, on any kind of corn or even on meal itself. The potatoes must de boiled and mashed fine whilst they are hot, and the meal added, just before the food is to be presented.

There is a warehouse in Paris, with the title, "Dépôt for African Gods!" The firm of Regis & Co., carried on an extensive business with Senegal. When an African King has lost a battle, he dismisses his "gods," and orders new French ones from Regis & Co., who employ artists to make them of deal, with serpent's heads, lion's manes, and tiger's claws. When a Senegallian potentate obtains a consignment of new "gods," he goes to war in order to test their efficacy.

As early as 1682, there was a dispute between William Penn and Lord Baltimore respecting the construction of their respective grants, the debatable land being one degree or 69 English miles on the South line of Pennsylvania, and extending west as far as the State itself. The matter was in litigation over sixty years, when Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon were appointed to run the line in dispute. This line, boundary of Pennsylvania and Maryland, is the famous Mason and Dixon's line.

The best composition that can be prepared, to relieve carriage wheels and machinery from friction, is composed of hog's lard, wheat flour, and black lead, (plumbago.) The lard is to be melted over a gentle fire, and the other ingredients—equal weight—may be added, till the composition is brought to the consistency of common paste, without raising the heat near the boiling point. One trial of this paste will satisfy any one of its superior utility.

An honest man, remarkable for the singularity and doggedness of his opinions, had been several times on a jury, and always entertained notions of law and justice totally at variance with the judge and his brother jurors. One of the judges asked him how it was possible that he always gave so much trouble to the court? He replied, with the utmost gravity, "I don't know how it is, but it always happens to be my misfortune to be on a jury with eleven obstinate men."

To prove the soundness of the lungs, let the patient draw in a full breath, and then try to count as far as he can, slowly and audibly, without again inflating the lungs. The number of seconds he can continue is then to be carefully noted. In confirmed consumption, the time does not exceed eight, and is often less than six seconds. In pleurisy and pneumonia, it ranges from nine to four seconds. But, when the lungs are sound, the time will range as high as from twenty to thirty seconds.

The Western Lancet states that the Post Master of Geneva, Alabama, announces the marvelous fact, that among a population voting about eight hundred, some pretty large families, and the village containing about forty families, they cannot count one doctor. Geneva is on a stream navigable for steamboats, at the head of navigation, and in a cotton region.

The great influence of well-selected words is forcibly illustrated by the anecdote which ensues:—A superintendent called some men to come and help work an engine for him. Not a man stirred. "Come, my lads," said he, "come and 'play' the engine." They complied with his wish at once.

A schoolmaster in Cornwall, advertising his establishment, says: "Every boarder must be supplied with a Bible and a Prayer book, a knife and fork, three towels, and a silver dessert-spoon; all of which, except the books, become the proprietor's requisites on the pupils quitting the school."

What a glorious world this would be, if all the inhabitants could say with Shakespeare's shepherd, "Sir, I am a true laborer. I earn that I get; get that I wear; owe no man hate; envy no man's happiness; glad of other men's good; contented with my farm."

When Charles Fox's house was on fire, he found all effort to save it useless; and, being a good draughtsman, he went up the next hill to make a drawing of the fire! the best instance of philosophy I ever heard of.

Samuel Williston, Esq., of Easthampton, has made another donation of $30,000 to Amherst College, and Mr. Hitchcock of Brimford, $10,000, both for professorships.

THE DAILY NATIONAL WHIG is published in the city of Washington, every day, at three o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted, and served to subscribers in the City, at the Navy Yard, in Georgetown, in Alexandria, and in Baltimore, the same evening, at six and a quarter cents a week, payable to the sole agent of the Whig, G. L. Gillchrist, Esq., or his order. It is also mailed to any part of the United States for $4 per annum, or $2 for six months, payable in advance. Advertisements of ten lines or less inserted one time for 50 cents, two times for 75 cents, three times for $1, one week for $1 75, two weeks for $2 75, one month for $4, two months for $7, three months for $10, six months for $16, one year for $20, payable always in advance.

The "National Whig" is what its name indicates. It speaks the sentiments of the Whig party of the Union on every question of public policy. It advocates the election to the Presidency of Zachary Taylor, subject to the decision of a Whig National Convention. It makes war to the knife upon all the measures and acts of the Administration deemed to be adverse to the interests of the country, and exposes without fear or favor the corruptions of the party in power. Its columns are open to every man in the country, for the discussion of political or any other questions.

In addition to politics, a large space in the National Whig will be devoted to publications upon Agriculture, Mechanics, and other useful arts, Science in general, Law, Medicine, Statistics, &c. Choice specimens of American and Foreign Literature will also be given, including Reviews, &c. A weekly list of the Patents issued by the Patent Office will likewise be published—the whole forming a complete family newspaper.

The "Weekly National Whig," one of the largest newspapers in the United States, is made up from the columns of the Daily National Whig, and is published every Saturday, for the low price of $2 per annum, payable in advance. A double sheet of eight pages will be given whenever the psess of matter shall justify it.

The Memoirs of General Taylor, written expressly for the National Whig, are in course of publication. They commenced with the second number, a large number of copies of which have been printed, to supply calls for back numbers.

CHAS. W. FENTON,
Proprietor of the National Whig.

P. S. All daily, weekly, and semi-weekly papers in the United States are requested to insert this advertisement once a week for six months, noticing the price for publishing the same at the bottom of the advertisement, and send the paper containing it to the National Whig office, and the amount will be duly remitted. Our editorial brethren are also requested to notice the National Whig in their reading columns.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON,
IRA SAYLES, } Principals,

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institntion, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

NOTES OF A VOYAGE TO CHINA.

By Mrs. L. M. Carpenter, of the Seventh-day Baptist Mission.

Feb. 12*th*, S. lat. 35° 25′, W. long. 11° 14′. "A man overboard, a man overboard!" Such was the dreadful cry that came down to us from on deck, followed by the quick rush of feet, the rapid but distinct commands of the captain, the lowering of the quarter boat, the splash of oars, the words of encouragement from the captain as he cheered the men onward in their errand of mercy, over the bounding billows, far away in the wake of the ship, to the spot where the poor sailor was seen struggling with the waters, as he rose from time to time above the intervening swells. And now all was silent as the house of death; the words of encouragement to the receding oarsmen were no longer heard by us, because they could no longer be heard by them. A few moments more elapsed, when it was said the man was saved; and now I ventured on deck—(I could not go before)—and never shall I forget that scene. The quarter-deck was strewn with cables, which lay in wild confusion as they had been thrown down in the agitation of the moment; captain, crew, and passengers, all gazing in silence from the stern of the vessel upon the returning boat, breathless, as far as appeared, except the man at the wheel, whose pale face, (the only one towards me,) and earnest manner, showed that no common feeling agitated his breast. The boat was soon along side, the recovered sailor, pale and excited, sprang up the laniards, and over the side of the ship; yet no word of congratulation was heard, no voice, except the necessary commands to lift the boat, set the sails, and get the ship under motion; no confusion, no outward expression of the deep inward feeling which, while it sought not restraint, needed but the pale face, the quivering lip, and the suppressed voice, to give it eloquence. May I never again behold a repetition of that scene; and oh, may this danger and deliverance be blest to many who have hitherto lived without hope and without God in the world.

14*th*.—The sea, which for the last few days has been losing its intense blue color, is this morning of a pale leaden hue. I remember to have read years ago, that sailors knew by this sign when they were near land. The nearest land to us, is the Tristan d'Acunha Islands, which cannot be much less than a hundred miles. I am informed that this change of color is often observed in crossing the Atlantic, between Europe and America, and that it is probably owing to soundings, which have actually been obtained in the midst of the ocean.

16*th*, lat. 39° 40′ South, long. 5° East. Are now nearly in our highest latitude. It is found necessary to run so far from the Cape on account of the strong currents which prevail near the shore. Find the weather cold, although the time corresponds to our midsummer. Have returned to our winter clothing, which is after all insufficient to keep us comfortably warm without a fire, and that is out of the question, as we have had no stove since the unceremonious dismissal of ours on the night of the storm. But with our present rapid rate of progress (11 1-4 knots an hour,) three days more will suffice to bring us into the longitude of the Cape, whence we may begin to set our faces towards a warmer clime.

Feb. 16*th*.—No opportunity to catch fish often occurs in the open ocean; so our "fishermen" set themselves to angle for birds. Six Albatroses were the trophies of their toils. These are beautiful birds, of a variety of colors, some very dark brown, with very little white except under side of the wings, which I think are always so; others are beautifully shaded and variegated; on some the neck and breast are pure pearly white; in others, speckled. They measure from nine to twelve feet between the tips of the extended wings. Two only were killed; the others were merely examined, and allowed to remain on deck a while for our entertainment, and then remanded to their native element. It seemed at first strange that they could not rise to fly from the deck, but observing their motions more closely on the water, I discover that they seem to require the momentum given them by the impelling buoyancy of the wave, in order to rise from its surface. The feet are webbed, and the beak strong and hooked.

Indian Ocean, Feb. 25.—Since my last date we have doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and are now making a rapid easterly course. We have been spared those severe storms incident to this latitude, although the last two days have been rather rough, as was also Thursday, the 18th, the day before doubling the Cape. Sad, memorable day! About half past four P. M., we were again startled by that most terrific cry, "A man overboard!" The wind was strong; the waves ran mountain high, and the ship was under rapid motion. It would have been presumption to attempt sending out a boat. The cover was cut loose from the helm, and thrown over to him; but he must have been too far away ever to reach it. The ship was put about as soon as possible, but a squall just then striking her, made the task still more difficult. It passed as suddenly away, and left in its place, just over the spot where he was last seen, the most splendid rainbow I ever beheld. I could not but regard it as a "bow of promise" for the poor sailor; but if so, it extended beyond this world, beyond the Jordan of death. A look-out was kept from mast-head, and we cruised about until dark, but we saw him no more. It is hardly possible he could have struggled long in such a sea, and the more so as he could not swim. His name was JOHN MORE, of Charleston, S. C., (where he has a sister,) the same I mentioned as standing at the helm when his fellow-sailor was rescued, and who, by a singular coincidence, was one to keep the wheel in this attempt to save More; and they were intimate friends! I have almost fancied there was something prophetic in the pale face and agitated mien of him who now "sleeps his last sleep," but it is only fancy. Most deeply has this dispensation been felt by us lone wanderers of the deep, for although strangers we had ever looked with peculiar interest upon that countenance, so full of intelligence, kindness, and energy. He was highly esteemed by the crew; and it was for their sakes, and in their behalf, that I wrote a few lines, as nearly as possible expressive of their own feelings, and hoping it would serve to keep alive in their hearts, not only the memory of the departed, but also the solemn lesson of their own mortality which they had thus learned. By request, it was sung at the funeral service, which was attended on Sunday. Mr. C. preached from the words, "And the sea gave up the dead that were in it." It was a deeply solemn season. With only the timbers of that frail vessel between us and the grave of the departed, the vault of heaven the only roof for our bowed heads, the winds the only accompaniment to our sad songs, and the roar of the billows making sad response in the intervals—thus was our mournful service performed.

In Memory of John More,

Drowned off Cape Good Hope, Feb. 18, 1847.

Farewell, brother; we shall miss thee,
  When the nightly watch is set,
When the lonely hours beguiling,
  We're for social converse met;
When the raging winds sweep o'er us,
  When the threatening billows rave,
Hastening to our post we'll miss thee;
  Brother! thou art in thy grave!

In thy grave! yet never o'er thee
  Flower shall spring or willow wave;
No pale marble guard thy slumbers,
  No fond tears thy ashes lave!
They who loved shall long bewail thee,
  Long for thee a sister weep,
Far away, while watchful angels
  Have their charge thy dust to keep.

Peace to thee, O gentle brother!
  In thy lowly ocean bed,
Nought shall break thy dreamless slumber
  Till the sea gives up its dead.
Step and voice are hushed forever,
  Speaking eye and thoughtful brow,
But a still small voice within us
  Asks, "Where dwells the spirit now?"

Gone to God!—to him who loudly
  Speaketh once, yea twice, to us,
By his judgments, by his mercies,
  By the love that spares us thus.
When life's troubled voyage is ended,
  When death's chilling tide we stem,
When for judgment we assemble,
  What shall be our answer then?

March 5.—In the evening passed within sight of St. Paul's Island. Had a very imperfect view of its outlines, by moonlight. Yet not the sight of our eyes only rejoiced our hearts; our ears were greeted with "the voice of the singing of birds," which probably find a home on the Island. The sailors call them Mackerel Gulls. If their notes cannot boast much sweetness, they had at least the charm of novelty for us, which I am half inclined to think Lord Kames right in considering the strongest principle of our nature.

March 18.—Two days more will probably bring us to the Island of Java, where we shall leave letters for home. I have been much disappointed in traversing the Indian Ocean to see no more animal life. The birds which accompanied us round the Cape, have deserted the ship; not one have I seen for several days. Fish have been almost as rare. We have occasionally seen a shoal of porpoises, or a few flying fish, and once there was pointed out to me a certain kind of "steaming," which I might after all have mistaken for a steamboat, had I not been told it was a whale! We have had higher swells, more dead calms, and more rough weather, than before we doubled the Cape, but no storms, at least not like what we had the third night out. Yesterday we had the highest swells I ever saw; somewhat better to-day.

22*d*.—Not at Anjier yet. Dead calms have kept us almost stationary for the last two or three days. Yesterday we saw a whale—a veritable monster of the deep, not less than sixty feet in length, perhaps much more. It played about for a long time, often rising to the surface of the water to take breath, and throw off the steam and vapor of its nostrils, like the puffing of an engine. Its breathings were distinctly heard, and rare sport indeed did this novelty afford us. The poor flying fish seemed at their wits end, flying about, and in their terror rushing furiously against the ship. Poor things! hundreds of them would hardly afford a taste to his whale majesty; rather too small business, one would judge, to think of making a meal of them. This morning we have seen two curious birds—one black, and called by the sailors "Man-of-war hawk;" the other white and called "Boatswain Marlin-spike;" both remarkably long, and slender in wings and body, resembling in form, (but not in size,) the little insect called by children the "devil's darning-needle." We are again having very warm weather. The sea has assumed the deep, the intense blue, which it wore within the tropics in the Atlantic Ocean; our own northern constellations are returning to us; flannels have become obsolete, and open windows night and day let in the blessed breeze of heaven, the mild clear starlight, the glimmering of the waning moon, or the burning rays of a tropical sun. But they bring us only health and increasing vigor. Every day brings us nearer to the shore we long to tread. I trust also that not in vain have passed away these days of our sea faring life. I believe we have all felt that the Spirit of God is still "brooding upon the waters," that our Saviour still walks upon the billows to meet his disciples in the ship, and that he is still saying to them, "Why are ye fearful?" These have been good days to us all. To me, days long to be remembered, for the sweet communion which I have been permitted to enjoy with my blessed Saviour. We have not been without our annoyances, but even these, I hope, have worked for our good.

A CHRISTIAN WOMAN.

A worldly man was with some friends in a coffee house. Wine had inflamed the heads and loosened the tongues of the guests. Each sketched the character of his wife, and enumerated her defects as well as her good qualities. "As to mine," said our worldling, "all that I could say in her praise would fall far below the truth. My wife unites all the virtues, all the amiable qualities, which I can desire. She would be perfect if she were not a Methodist. But her piety gives her no ill-humor; nothing disturbs her equanimity; nothing irritates her, nor renders her impatient. I might go with you, gentlemen, at midnight, and ask her to get up and serve us with supper, and she would not show the least discontent. She would do the honors of the table with as much assiduity as if I brought loved and expected guests."

"Well, then! let us put your wife to the proof," said some of the company.

A considerable bet was made. The husband agreed to the proposal, and our wine drinkers, forgetting all propriety, went in the middle of the night, to invade, with their noisy mirth, the peaceful dwelling of the humble Christian.

"Where is my wife?" asked the master of the house of the servant who opened the door.

"Sir, she is asleep, long ago."

"Go, wake her, and tell her to prepare supper for me and my friends."

The wife, obedient to the will of her husband, quickly made her toilet, met the strangers, and received them in the most gracious manner. "Fortunately," said she, "I have some provisions in my house, and in a few minutes supper will be ready."

The table was spread, and the repast served. The pious lady did the honors of the table with perfect good will, and constantly bestowed upon her guests the most polite attentions.

This was too much for our drinkers. They could not help admiring such extraordinary equanimity. One of them (the soberest of the company) spoke, when the desert was brought in, and said: "Madam, your politeness amazes us. Our sudden appearance at your house at so unseasonable an hour, is owing to a wager. We have lost it, and we do not complain. But tell us how it is possible that you, a pious person, should treat with so much kindness persons whose conduct you cannot approve."

"Gentlemen," she replied, "when we were married, my husband and myself, we both lived in dissipation. Since that time it has pleased the Lord to convert me to himself. My husband, on the contrary, continues to go on in ways of worldliness. I tremble for his future state. If he should die now, he would be to be pitied. As it is not possible for me to save him from the punishment which awaits him in the world to come, if he is not converted, I must apply myself at least to render his present life as agreeable as possible."

These words affected strongly the whole company, and made a deep impression on the husband. "Dear wife," said he, "you are then anxious about the fate that awaits me in eternity. Thanks, a thousand thanks for the warning which you gave me. By the grace of God I will try to change my conduct."

He was true to his promise. He opened his heart to the gospel, and became from that day another man,—a sincere Christian, and the best of husbands.

"Christian wives who have the misfortune to be united to infidel husbands," adds the narrator, "read and read again this anecdote. See how minds are gained to the gospel. Complaints and reproaches, however well founded, do not restore peace to the household; often the contrary, they irritate and increase the evil. Be then full of meekness, patience, charity, and the Lord will bless your efforts."

HEAVEN.

[RECITED BY PROFESSOR GREENBANK, IN HIS LECTURES ON ELOCUTION.]

There is a world we have not seen,
  Which time shall never dare destroy,
Where mortal footstep hath not been,
  Nor ear hath caught its sounds of joy.

There is a region lovelier far
  Than sages tell or poets sing,
Brighter than summer beauties are,
  And softer than the tints of spring.

There is a world,—and Oh how blest!
  Fairer than Prophets ever told,
And never did an Angel guest
  One half its blessedness unfold.

It is all holy and serene,
  The land of glory and repose;
And there, to dim the radiant scene,
  The tear of sorrow never flows.

It is not fann'd by summer gale,
  'Tis not refresh'd by vernal showers,
It never needs the moon-beam pale,
  For there are known no evening hours.

No; for that land is ever bright
  With a pure radiance all its own,
The streams of uncreated light
  Flow round it from th' Eternal Throne!

There forms that mortals may not see,
  Too glorious for the eye to trace,
And clad in peerless majesty,
  Move with unutterable grace.

In vain thy philosophic eye
  May seek to view that fair abode,
Or find it curtain'd in the sky,—
  It is the dwelling-place of God.

STINGY CHRISTIANS.

The Christian Advocate and Journal makes the following very sensible remarks in reference to a class of Christians very frequently met with:—

"We confess, however, that we have often questioned the Christian character of some loud professors whom we have known, on account of their stingy contributions to the support of the gospel and the relief of the poor. We have known some who would visit the sick poor, and pray with them as long and as loud as any body, but you could no more get a dollar from them for the relief of the sufferers, than you could one of their teeth; it was evident that if they could sell their prayers for a dollar a piece, they would not have given one away. The minister and his family might have starved, if their brethren, less able to give, had not felt their Christian obligations differently. Such people have always by them that 'neat little pocket edition of selfishness,' as Watson calls it, 'Charity begins at home;' and, verily, this charity leaves off where it begins. They add annually to their gains, and love of gain feeds and grows on the accumulation, until it hardens the heart, and sears the conscience against all the claims which the gospel has upon them, and all the calls of mercy and benevolence in favor of suffering humanity. But the strangest thing of all is, that such people really persuade themselves they are pious Christians, because they can, now and then, work themselves up to some pious feelings and emotions. Thus they deceive themselves, until at length they hear, 'Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee; then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?'"

EFFECTS OF PRAYER.

A woman came to Halle one day, and said to Augustus Herman Franke, that it was as possible that the steeples should fall prostrate, as that she should lay down her hatred to her mother-in-law, who had so abused and outraged her, that she could never be reconciled. Franke replied, "I am not surprised that you are not able to reconcile yourself to your mother-in-law. You can be able only if you implore God's grace to do it. And now, from my heart I ask you to promise me that you will pray to God for a forgiving temper." The woman could not refuse. Some days after, she returned, and said: "Now I will go and be reconciled to my mother-in-law." She did so. Her own pastor asked her why she had not done so before. She replied: "You admonished me to be reconciled, but did not tell me how to get a forgiving spirit by praying to God."

Philip James Spencer had a son of eminent talents, but perverse and extremely vicious. All means of love and persuasion were without success. The father could only pray, which he continued to do, that the Lord might yet be pleased to save his son, at any time and in any way. The son fell sick; and while lying on his bed in distress of mind, nearly past the power of speech or motion, he suddenly started up, clasped his hands and exclaimed—"My father's prayers like mountains surround me!" Soon after, his anxiety ceased—a sweet peace spread over his face—his malady came to a crisis, and the son was saved in body and soul. He became another man. Spencer lived to see his son a respectable man, in public office, and happily married. Such was the change of his life after his conversion.

REST OF THE FAITHFUL DEPARTED.

Taken away, as Isaiah says, from the evil to come, they enter into peace, and rest in their beds, each one walking in his uprightness; their bodies slumbering in the peaceful grave, their souls living mightily unto God. The faithful departed are at rest. They rest as the toiled laborer rests, when his work is done, and the shades of night invite him to repose. They rest as the way-worn traveler rests, when his journey is ended, and he sits down to recruit his strength. They rest as the wearied warrior rests, when the fight is over, and he awaits the hour of triumph, and the rewarding wreath. They rest from bodily infirmity and pain, from sickness and disease, from the cares and troubles of this mortal life, from disappointments and sorrow, from contradiction and the strife of tongues; above all, they rest from the temptations of wicked men and evil spirits, and from the painful struggles of inbred sin. They "sleep in Jesus;" not unconsciously, but as on earth tired nature is wont to repose in her sweet restorer. They are dead to the world, but alive unto God. When the hand of death loosed the silver cord that bound them to this mortal life, it released them also from its own power. They are set free from the conditions of mortality; death hath no more dominion over them. [Rev. Henry Hopewood, M. A.

A HEATHEN'S CONSCIENCE.

The province of Bengal, in India, is bordered on the south-west by a large tract of hilly country, which is inhabited by a people called the Coles. They differ in many respects from the natives of the adjoining districts. They do not worship images; they have no priests like the Brahmans, to oppress or delude them; they have no cast to make their escape from the degraded condition in which they are born, almost hopeless. The Coles therefore are regarded by many in India as presenting fewer obstacles to missionary effort than most of the inhabitants of that benighted country. That they have a conscience which is not wholly perverted the following confession made by one of them, when he voluntarily surrendered himself to the public authorities, abundantly testifies.

Quest. Did you kill your son, Kapore?

Ans. Yes, I killed him.

Quest. For what fault did you kill him?

Ans. He never committed any fault; we were both starving; I had nothing to give him to eat; he cried, and looked in my face; he was weak, and lay down on the ground. He lay down in the jungle and could not rise again; night was coming on, and I heard the tiger roaring, and I thought he would seize you, my poor boy, if I left you, and so I killed you! I then buried him in a ravine, lest the wild beasts should devour him. I went away slowly, for I was weak and ill. And when I got farther into the forest, I thought I heard him call, and then I fainted away. But he calls me now every day. In the morning, and noon, and night, I hear him call—Father, oh, father! So, I cannot eat—I cannot work—I cannot laugh, I can live no more! So hang me, sir, kill me quick, and this wretchedness is over.

THE HEATHEN WORLD.

According to the most accurate recent calculations, the entire population of the earth is about one thousand millions of inhabitants. The following is as accurate a distribution of their religious classes as can well be made, and answers every purpose, in order to have a practical view of the condition of the world:—

Protestants,	70,000,000
Roman Catholics,	130,000,000
Greek Church,	56,000,000
Armenians and others,	8,000,000
Jews,	6,000,000
Mohammedans,	100,000,000
Pagans,	630,000,000
Total,	1,000,000,000

The Christian Journal remarks: "It is now about forty years since the commencement of the modern missionary effort. There are now among the heathen about 2,000 missionaries, and these occupy nearly as many stations. In connection with these are 7,000 or 8,000 native and other salaried teachers, catechists, helpers and assistants, of various kinds, engaged in the offices of education and religious instruction. There are about 200,000 converts in Christian communion, and about 250,000 children and adults belonging to missionary schools. Some 300 or 400 churches, and 2,000 or 3,000 schools have been organized. The Bible is printed in most of the principal dialects of the children of men. These are the brief results of what has been done for the heathen in the period of 1840 years' effort."

GOOD INFLUENCE OF A TRACT.—A correspondent of the Genesee Evangelist gives the following instance of the power of one of these silent monitors:—

In the winter of 1841–2, I put up over 500 barrels of pork and lard for the English market. I had at that time a tenant a Dutch cooper, whom I employed to make my barrels, at one dollar each; but during the time I bought ten barrels of John Burns, an English butcher. After I had done packing I settled with the aforesaid cooper. He, as appears, designedly included the ten barrels I purchased of Burns. I paid his demands, having forgot, in the hurry of business, the ten barrels until my return to Rochester, when, in looking over my books, I noticed the error. I inquired for the cooper, to have redress; but he was gone west. About two years ago he returned. I several times thought of mentioning the case to him; but he appeared poor, and I concluded it to be of no use, and so let it go.

About three weeks ago, however, early one rainiy morning, the man came to me, and calling me one side, said he had cheated me out of ten dollars; and that, from reading the day before a Dutch tract which he held in his hand, he could have no rest nor sleep all night, until he had paid me the money, which he did very cheerfully, and went home rejoicing.

PRIDE AND HUMILITY.—I never yet found pride in a noble nature, nor humility in an unworthy mind. Of all trees, I observe that God hath chosen the vine—a low plant that creeps upon the helpful wall; of all beasts, the soft and patient lamb; of all fowls, the mild and guileless dove. When God appeared to Moses, it was not in the lofty cedar, nor the sturdy oak, nor the spreading Palm; but a bush—a humble, slender, abject bush. As if he would, by these elections, check the conceited arrogance of man. Nothing produceth love like humility; nothing hate like pride. [Feltham.

THE WORK OF FOREIGN MISSIONS.

The news which reaches us from our missionaries in China, is calculated to deepen our interest in the missionary work, and give definiteness to our views of it. We have long contemplated it at a distance, and professed a desire to be engaged in it. But now we have put our hands to it, and sent four of our number into the midst of heathenish darkness to hold up the light of the gospel. Enthusiastic persons may see a great deal of romance in contemplating a foreign mission. But those who engage in the enterprise, and those who look at it intelligently, will see in it appalling difficulties, which can only be met and overcome by the exercise of a most vigorous faith. The remoteness of the scene of operations, is alone sufficient to discourage the timid from engaging in the work. The immensity of the population upon which it is proposed to act—a population steeped in error and vice, full of prejudice against strangers, and superstitiously attached to their own customs—is a more frightful consideration still. And when to this is added the difficulty of mastering an unknown language, translating the Bible into it, and creating a religious literature in accordance with the spirit of Christianity, it is not surprising that the magnitude of the work appalls even good men. It requires an intreped and dauntless faith in the promises of God to meet such obstacles—a faith which can calmly face adversity, and wait patiently to see the salvation of God, and the fruit of labor bestowed.

But many as are the trials and discouragements of the missionary work, it has its encouragements. Wherever it has been undertaken in the right spirit, and from right motives, God has given it successes—partial, it may be, but still sufficient to exert a reflex influence upon faith, and assure the Christian of the final triumph of the Gospel. Such successes are in fulfillment of the divine promises; they throw cheering rays upon the otherwise dark future; they give glimpses of the splendor of God's kingdom, and earnests that it shall yet become universal. Of course they may justly be referred to as evidences that the missionary work is approved of Heaven; and when viewed in this light, they cannot fail to "lift up the hands which hang down," and "strengthen the feeble knees." Nevertheless, it is possible to make too much of successes, and the absence of them may be allowed to exert too depressing an influence. With a real Christian, the command of the Saviour to "go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature," should be the grand incentive to duty. And when to this is added the promise, that the heathen shall be given to Christ for his inheritance, with the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession, the Christian should be ready to go forward in the path of duty, and leave the result with God.

The result must be left with God! Would that this thought might sink deep into every heart. Let those who care for the mission remember it. Without His blessing—without the all-powerful aid of his Holy Spirit—the best directed efforts will be of no avail; they cannot move the hearts of the benighted heathen, but will only operate to discourage the persons who put them forth. Let this thought be remembered, then, and let it lead to fervent and importunate prayer for His blessing in whom resides all power to renew the natures of men. Let the family altar, the social prayer circle, and the Monthly Concert, give proof that our faith rests upon the arm of God. So may all be helpers in the work, and exert an influence to ensure its success.

TRACT LABORS AT SHANGHAI, CHINA.

The American Messenger says that the Rev. E. W. Lyle, of the Protestant Episcopal Mission, "accompanied Dr. Lockhart (medical missionary from the London Society) in one of the frequent excursions which he and Dr. Medhurst are accustomed to make for distributing tracts and books through the surrounding country. They proceeded by boat about twenty-five miles, when a walk of five miles brought them to Chingpoo. Here, Mr. Lyle says, "we distributed great numbers of Tracts; finding it difficult to pass through the streets with sufficient rapidity to prevent our being borne down by the crowd that followed us. Our books were received with great civility, nay, with an appearance of courtesy which afforded a striking illustration of the general attention paid to the cultivation of good manners."

"In connection with the subject of tract distribution," he adds, "I may here mention what are our plans for this purpose. On the 4th of May, Mr. Graham and myself met the Bishop (Boone) in his study, and after uniting in prayer, proceeded to draw up some general scheme for future operations. In view of the fact, that this one city presented a field far too large for profitable cultivation by so small a number as ours, it was determined that each of us should devote himself to a certain district, and endeavor to follow up, by personal visits, the distribution from house to house of carefully-selected Tracts. The next step would be to form catechetical classes, and hold small meetings, and finally build a church and hold regular public services. The Bishop's district lies within the city; Mr. Graham's at the Eastern suburb; my own more to the Southward, and in the immediate neighborhood of my house."

"A SABBATH-BREAKING RAILROAD."

Such is the heading of an article by a correspondent of the New York Recorder, in which he sets forth that the Harlem Railroad carries more passengers on Sunday than perhaps on any other two or three days of the week, and also that it is "willing to extend its freighting business on that day, against the prohibition of Heaven, the rights of those employed on the road, and the highest welfare of the community." We do not doubt the writer's sincerity in all he says about disregarding the "prohibition of Heaven," nor do we doubt that the Company in question is sufficiently reckless of all such prohibitions. But we question whether, with all his sincerity and earnestness, the Recorder's correspondent can point out the prohibition of Heaven against labor on the first day of the week; and we are quite certain, that until he can do this his denunciations will have but little effect. If he would move railroad companies by appeals to divine authority, it will be necessary for him to conform to the requirements of God himself. When he does so, his exhortations to desist from Sabbath labor may be listened to and allowed to have some effect. Until then, he will be sure to hear the reply, "Physician, heal thyself."

☞ The following article comes to us from a gentleman who has recently embraced the Sabbath, and seems to be an earnest inquirer after truth. We publish it without expressing any opinion as to the correctness of his views of prophecy.

THE TWO PERIODS SPOKEN OF IN REVELATION.

In the book of Revelation, there are two periods of time distinctly specified. The first period embraces 1260 days, while the two witnesses prophesy; also three and a half days more, while the witnesses lie slain. The second period is 1000 years, during which time Satan is bound. The first period is a time of hatred, strife, war, and persecution; a time of deception, corruption, oppression, blasphemy, and all sorts of evil. During the second period, every thing is changed; righteousness prevails, and all is peace and love.

There are four notable things which mark the first period. The holy city is trodden under foot 42 months, (1260 days, allowing 30 days to a month.) The witnesses prophesy 1260 days, after which they lie slain three and a half days more. The woman is in the wilderness 1260 days, after which she flies into some other part for refuge, for a time, times, and half a time, which corresponds to the three and a half days while the witnesses lie slain, also to the time, times, and dividing of times, spoken of in the 7th chapter of Daniel. The beast with seven heads and ten horns has power to continue 42 months, (1260 days,) after which the beast with two horns comes into power for a short space; (doubtless three and a half days, while the witnesses lie slain, and the woman is so severely persecuted, and the saints are delivered up to be worn out.) These four are of equal duration, and all terminate at the same time. When the spirit of life from God enters into the witnesses, then the first period winds up, the seventh angel sounds, and a new period of 1000 years is ushered in. Again—when the remnant are slain with the sword of Him who sat on the horse, then the first period expires, the seventh angel sounds, and the millennium commences. Again—when Daniel's fourth beast is slain, (little horn and all,) then the first period runs out, the seventh angel sounds, and the times are changed! Now the Ancient of Days sits, and He whose right it is to reign holds the universal scepter, while all people, nations and languages, become subservient to his will. Now the stone cut out without hands, having become a great mountain, fills the whole earth. Now the thrones are cast down, and the time is come when the saints possess the kingdom, as Daniel the prophet saw. Now all those who "loved not their lives unto death, become priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years. Now Babylon falls, and commerce—wicked commerce, (as now carried on,)—ceases forever; no more speculation; no more traffic in "slaves and souls of men." Now the words of all the prophets are fulfilled. And now (if not before) is fulfilled that remarkable prophecy in Zachariah, chapter 12th, beginning at verse 10th and reaching to the end of the chapter.

A few observations may be useful:—

1st. The same events which terminate the first period, mark the beginning of the second. Such are the rising of the witnesses, the great battle, the fall of Babylon, the binding of Satan, and the sounding of the seventh trumpet. This trumpet, it must be remembered, is a woe trumpet; for while the righteous are avenged, and martyrs rewarded, the wicked are consumed, and those that destroyed the earth are destroyed. 2d. While the last beast is in power, persecution the most bloody is the order of the day; and nothing strange, for then "the Devil is come down, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time." Now it is, that the witnesses are slain and men receive that most deceptive mark, which seals them over beyond the possibility of repentance—and yet the dragon's host will glory in it—the noble mark of his majesty the Beast! O the infatuation of man at that time! 3d. It is evident, that when the holy city shall have been trodden down the full time appointed, it will be restored again, as the chosen city of God, and great capital of the whole world, when all kingdoms shall be swallowed up in ONE universal kingdom, consisting of many subordinate governments. 4th. Concerning the first resurrection, the revelator is very particular to designate the martyrs; nor is there ground for belief that any others are included. That all the righteous do not rise in the first resurrection is confirmed by "the book of life," which is opened at the general resurrection, to find whose names are written there. When Paul says the dead in Christ shall rise first, he evidently alludes to the general resurrection, at the last day. (Perhaps they were the prophets, or eminent saints, who rose after Christ's resurrection.) 5th. The 10th chapter of Revelation is a sort of introduction to what follows in the next three chapters. "Thou must prophesy again," is very expressive; as much as to say, a different order of things is about to take place, but the gospel must be preached, therefore thou must continue to prophesy 1260 days longer. When the angel swears that time shall be no longer, he refers to the future, when the seventh angel shall begin to sound, at which time Babylon falls, and Satan's kingdom terminates. 6th. And now, with such a flood of evidence, how can any reasonable mind doubt the reign of Christ here on earth? As well turn infidel at once, and disbelieve the whole Bible, as disbelieve this. What Daniel says concerning the four beasts has come to pass exactly; and when the fourth beast is destroyed, root and branch, shall we doubt what the prophet says concerning what follows? S. W.

MADISON UNIVERSITY AND THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—The New York Recorder publishes a long account of the doings and sayings at Hamilton during Commencement Week of Madison University, the leading institution for collegiate and theological education among the Baptists of this State, if not of the whole Union. The affairs of the School seem to be in a prosperous condition. There were seventeen graduates from the collegiate department, whose orations on commencement day are spoken of as "of a most gratifying character, remarkably free from sickly sentimentalism, seldom extravagant, and distinguished to an unusual degree by a healthful moral and religious tone." There were nine graduates from the theological department, whose addresses indicated thorough mental cultivation, and just views of the work of the minister of Jesus Christ. The exercises throughout were such as greatly to encourage the friends of the institution.

DR. FULLER AT HAMILTON.—The Rev. Dr. Fuller, of Baltimore, (recently of South Carolina,) preached the Annual Sermon before the Society of Inquiry of Madison University, at Hamilton, N. Y. The fact that he is a slaveholder, and has written a labored apology for slaveholding, created not a little feeling on the occasion. A correspondent of the Baptist Register gives an account of the discourse, which he represents as eloquent and powerful. He seems to think it necessary, however, to apologize for the fact of Dr. Fuller's being invited to Hamilton under existing circumstances. This he does by saying that the invitation came from the Board of the Society of Inquiry, who are accustomed to act in such matters without the knowledge of the Faculty. We think it will be difficult to prevent an impression that the Hamiltonians are quite willing to confer honors upon a slaveholder.

PETER G. STUYVESANT'S WILL.—It is now said, that Mr. Stuyvesant leaves real estate worth some two millions of dollars, of which one half is bequeathed to twelve nephews and nieces, while three other nephews inherit the other half. His personal property is said to be about three hundred thousand dollars. He has also left the following legacies to benevolent institutions:—

American Bible Society . .	$5,000
American Tract Society . . .	1,000
Institution for the Blind . .	3,000
Protestant Half Orphan Asylum .	5,000

HARD QUESTION.—A letter from the Baptist missionary Dean is published in the "Macedonian." Under date of Hong Kong, Jan. 17, he says:—

"While one of the assistants, last week, at Long Island, was distributing books and speaking of the doctrine of Christ, he met a Chinese teacher, who said to him, 'You might as well think of extinguishing the flames of a house on fire, with a single cup of water, as to Christianize all the Chinese with so few teachers. If Jesus' disciples wish to convert the Chinese, why don't they set to work as if they intended to do it?'"

BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE for August, republished by Leonard Scott & Co., was laid upon our table last week. The following is a list of its articles: "Grote's History of Greece," "Ben Nevis and Ben Muich Duai," "Letters on the Truths contained in Popular Superstitions," "History of the Captivity of Napoleon at St. Helena," "Juancho the Bull-Fighter," "The Emerald Studs," "Cæsar," "Ried and the Philosophy of Common Sense." Office of republication, 79 Fulton-st., corner of Gold.

INFANT BAPTISM AND CHURCH-AND-STATE UNION.—The Montreal Register says that in various parts of Europe the lawfulness of Infant Baptism begins to be doubted by those who have been led to see the iniquity of the Church-and-State Union. It is well; the two abuses will fall together.

YALE COLLEGE.—The Commencement festivities of this venerable institution took place week before last, and were of an unusually interesting character. The graduating class, from the collegiate department, numbered 124, considerably larger than any previous class, and what is a little remarkable, not a death has occurred in the class since they entered college. From the theological department, the graduating class numbered 24. Degrees were conferred upon twenty-one graduates from the medical department, and fourteen from the law department. A number of class meetings were held, where friends long parted met, and recounted the scenes of College life and the events in their subsequent experience. Among these the class of 1797 held their first meeting after the lapse of half a century. Twelve out of twenty-four surviving members were present; and only thirteen of thirty-seven, the original number of the class, have died. Among those who were present of this class, were Rev. Lyman Beecher, D. D., Rev. James Murdock, D. D., and Hon. Thomas Day, LL. D.

WAR NEWS.—Nothing important or decisive has been received within a week past. There is a report of an attack on a train, near the National Bridge, in which several Americans were killed and wounded. Maj. Gaines and Midshipman Rogers have escaped from the city of Mexico, and arrived safely at Gen. Scott's head quarters. Gen. Paredes, Ex-President of Mexico, passed through Vera Cruz in disguise, on the morning of Aug. 14. He came from Havana by the royal mail steamer Teviot, under an assumed name. The Secretary of War has called out five more regiments to serve in Mexico, viz. two from Tennesse, two from Kentucky, and one from Indiana.

RONGEISM.—It is stated in one of our exchange papers, that a Dr. Kock has arrived at Washington, D. C. He is a German, and a disciple of Ronge. He has come here under the advice and counsel of Ronge. His object is to establish a sort of Catholic Church at Washington, independent of the See of Rome; and it is the purpose of Ronge to send out a minister or two into foreign nations generally, preaching the Catholic faith entirely independent of the head of the church at Rome.

STILL ERECT.—We learn from the Christian Observer, that the Waldenses of the Valleys of Piedmont, who have so long maintained the ancient faith, though suffering the common calamity of the poor in Europe—scarcity of bread—contributed ten thousand francs to the funds of the French Society of Evangelical Missions, during the financial year which ended in May. The object of this Society is to sustain the work of missions among the heathen.

ELD. CHARLES M. LEWIS requests his correspondents hereafter to address him at Newport, R. I.

Hon. Silas Wright died at his residence in Canton, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., on Friday morning last, by a stroke of apoplexy.

THE JEWS.

FRANCE.—Some idea of the number and importance of the Jewish population in France may be formed from the circumstance, that the French Government pay towards the support of the synagogues and ministers of religion among the Jews, the sum of 170,000 francs annually; including a salary of 6,000 francs for the chief rabbi of the central consistory, 3,000 francs for the chief rabbi in each province, various salaries for the rabbis who preside over different congregations, and 10,000 francs for the rabbinical central school; 8,000 for the consistories, and 15,000 for the expenses in building synagogues, &c., No less than four different periodicals are regularly published in France, for the discussion of questions relating exclusively to the religion and interests of the Jews.

HAMBURG.—The Jews in Hamburg have taken an active part in the religious movement which has so much occupied the attention of their nation in so many parts of Germany. A society has recently been formed for improving the social condition of the Jews. About 1,000 persons, merchants and literary men of various classes, have joined the society. Both Jews and Christians are members. They meet for the discussion of questions connected with the objects they have in view. They endeavor to provide suitable employment for the poorer Jews, and to promote mutual good will and respect; seeking to obtain the removal of all those civil and social distinctions which have hitherto tended to prevent that intercourse which they wish to maintain. As might be expected, the adherents of Rabbinism, do not approve of this Society.

JERUSALEM.—The building of the Protestant Church on Mount Zion has steadily proceeded, notwithstanding manifold hindrances. The walls have now nearly reached their full heights and are ready for the ceiling. A new ship has been chartered for the purpose of taking out these latter and other similar parts of the work, such as the seats, pulpit, communion-railing, &c., and is about to leave the London Docks, direct for Jaffa.

There has been a remarkable influx of Jews into Palestine during the past year; even from America great numbers have come. They have not been aged people only, but for a great part young, and many females among them.

SMYRNA.—A considerable number of Israelites have expressed their conviction of the truth of Christianity, and their desire to make a public profession of their faith, but they are kept back from doing so by the difficulty of providing employment for them after their baptism.

[Ann. Rep. Lon. Society.

THE AMERICAN BOARD.—The Boston Traveler learns that the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions is entering upon a new financial year with a considerable debt. On the first of this month the balance against the treasury was more than $30,000, and this notwithstanding the economy with which its affairs are managed. It is to be hoped that the Christian public will not suffer the Board to become embarrassed for want of the requisite amount of funds. It is doing a good work, and should be sustained.

PERSEVERANCE AND SUCCESS.

The following, from the Springfield Republican, is a remarkable instance of what perseverance and industry, rightly directed, are able to accomplish. Who that is bent upon it, after reading such an example, can despair of obtaining an education?

"Among the Graduating Class at the Commencement last week, at Williams College, was one by the name of Cordit, from Jersey. This gentleman is a shoemaker, is married, and has a family of four children. Six years ago, becoming sensible of the blessings of an education, he commenced learning the simple branches, such as are taught in our primary schools. One by one, as he sat on his shoemaker's bench, he mastered Grammar, Arithmetic, Geography, &c., with some occasional assistance from his fellow-workmen. At this time he determined to obtain a collegiate education. Without means, and with a large family depending on him for support, he commenced, and learned Latin and Greek in the evenings, after his day's labor was over, under the direction of a friend; and after the lapse of a year and a half, prepared himself, and entered the sophomore class of Williams College.

"He brought his bench and tools as well as his books with him. The students supplied him with work; the faculty assisted him; and together with the fund for indigent students, and some occasional assistance from other sources, he was enabled to go through the college course, and at the same time support his family. He graduated last week, on his birth-day, aged thirty-two. He stood high in his class, and received a part at the Commencement, but declined. At the farewell meeting of the class, in consideration of his perseverance, talents, and Christian character, they presented his wife with an elegant set of silver spoons, tea and table, each handsomely engraved with an appropriate inscription.

"Mr. Cordit will now enter the Theological Seminary at New York, and will, no doubt, make a faithful and popular minister."

AN EXAMPLE WORTHY OF IMITATION.

The following account of a Baptist minister out west, who graduated from college at the age of fifty years, after having brought up a large family, was abridged from the N. Y. Observer by the editor of the N. Y. Baptist Register. It shows what energy and perseverence can accomplish under the most unfavorable circumstances:—

He was a poor young man, anxious for an education, but discouraged on account of his poverty. His parents being pious, he was taught to read the scriptures and the shorter catechism. Nine months schooling was all he enjoyed during his minority. The death of his mother cast him on the wide world at 16 or 17, without money or clothes except of the coarsest kind. After the labors of the day his evenings were spent in the prosecution of study. In this way he progressed in arithmetic and grammar, and grasped other branches of knowledge, but no idea of college entered his mind.

At about the age of 20, he married an industrious woman, but without property, and settled in the woods of Indiana. With his previous savings he entered a tract of eighty acres. The first payment took all his money, and left nothing to purchase food or erect a shelter. But not discouraged, he commenced clearing and erected a cabin. Soon a small piece was ready for cultivation, and by exchange of labor he cultivated his land in summer, and in addition by his day labors earned bread and meat for his family, while his industrious wife manufactured their clothes. In the winter he was employed to teach the children of his neighbors. Remembering his early paternal instruction, he forgot not to acknowledge that God had preserved him in all his straits and trials, and not long after his marriage and settlement in the west he united with the Baptist church.

Preachers at this time being scarce, and he possessing more intelligence than his neighbors was licensed to preach, but received no pecuniary compensation. In the capacity of farmer, teacher, preacher, and occasionally magistrate, he spent several years of his life, until his farm was well improved. He was, however, still bent on knowledge, and was constantly urging young men to obtain a good education, and devising means to aid them. At length exchanging his farm for one in the vicinity of Western Reserve College, he began to think he might have some further education himself, though 40 years of age. His family, now large, were to be provided for and educated, and he continued to labor and preach the gospel without compensation. All his scraps of time were employed to add to his stock of knowledge. His farm was now under fine cultivation, with a good brick house on it, and at 44 he entered the preparatory department as a regular student—classmate of his own son, a fourth child!

He still continued to attend to his farm, and preach the gospel, and in his fiftieth year he finished his college course, and graduated with honor! He still labors on his farm and preaches the gospel, and possesses a property of some four or five thousand dollars. His children are well educated, and several settled in life—promising to become useful and prosperous. Now what was the great secret of his success? Energy and perseverance, combined with rigid integrity and rigid economy—an illustration of God's faithfulness to his promise. While honoring Him, and laboring as he was able for the promotion of His cause, and the salvation of men, he was graciously remembered in his deepest necessities, and raised to a state of competency and comfort.

TEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamer Guadelquiver arrived at New-York on Sunday last, from Liverpool, which port she left on the 14th of August.

The market for breadstuffs was fluctuating, and not much was doing. The Cotton market was quiet. There is a sort of monetary panic in England, and many heavy failures have occured.

The Liverpool European Times of the 14th inst. states that by the last British Mail Steamship to Boston, upward of £12,000 of protested bills for non-acceptance were returned. It appears that the bills were drawn at New-York for corn speculation for a London principal, but as the agent had exceeded his instructions they were dishonored.

Mr. Bremner's ingenious contrivance for raising the steamship Great Britain has been fully successful. Her keel is now completely out of the sand, and the workmen, at low water, when she is 'high and dry,' can, in a short time, effect the repairs which her bottom requires, immediately on the completion of which one or two powerful Government steamers will be in readiness to tow her across the channel to the Mersey.

Dr. Andrew Combe, brother of George Combe, and well known as a popular medical author, died in the neighborhood of Edinburgh on Monday. For several years the continuance of Dr. Combe's life has been almost miraculous. His complaint was in the lungs, the consumption of which induced such extreme delicacy of frame, that nothing but the most unremitting scientific treatment kept him alive.

Farther accounts from Rome confirm the report of the existence of one of the most atrocious conspiracies recorded in modern history, which was to have converted the rejoicings of regenerated Rome into a frightful scene of tumult and massacre, and to have let loose a horde of assassins on an unarmed people, met to celebrate the anniversary of the dawn of their recovered liberty, and to testify their enthusiastic veneration for their enlightened Pontiff.

Shipwreck and Loss of Forty-two Lives.—The New York Tribune says that on Sunday evening, August 15, in about lat. 48° N. long. 67° W. the ship Mamlouk, while lying to in a violent hurricane, under the main-spencer and fore-topmast staysail, at ten minutes before 12, was struck by a tremendous squall, which careened her so far over that the cargo shifted and brought her in an instant on her beam-ends, so far over that the weather-rail on the quarter-deck was within a few feet of the water. The main and mizen masts were immediately cut away, and the ship righted, but the cargo had burst away the hatches, and was floating about, and the vessel was full of water, the starboard rail being submerged. At daylight on Monday morning, but 22 out of 64 souls were found alive.

Throughout that day and Tuesday the storm still raged and the sea broke violently over the wreck. Saw a vessel on Tuesday, but the weather was too rough for her to approach. By daylight next morning she was seen bearing down toward the wreck. She proved to be the brig Belize, Capt. James H. Dawes, from Boston, bound to Port-au-Prince. The seamen were immediately taken on board by Capt. Dawes, their wants most generously provided for, and the vessel's course changed for New York. Thirty-five steerage passengers and seven of her crew were washed overboard.

Douglass and Garrison Mobbed.—Wm. Loyedl Garrison, and Frederick Douglass, now on an anti-slavery tour to the West, were severely handled at one of their meetings in Harrisburg, Pa. Donglass furnishes an account of the fracas for the New York Anti-Slavery Standard. Several volleys of 'unmerchantable eggs' he says, were poured through the windows, filling the room with the most disgusting and stifling stench, which he calls 'Slavery's choice incense;' and one struck friend Garrison on the back, sprinkling its escense all 'over his honored head.' A pack of fire-crackers was also exploded, causing much excitement and alarm. Cries of 'throw out the nigger' were shouted by the mob outside, and stones and brick-bats were hurled, when he left the house, protected by some of his colored friends. Douglass himself escaped without injury.

The Glens Falls Clarion says that near Indian Lake, in the northern part of that county, or Hamilton county, there resides an Indian family which recently numbered three male members, well known to hunters and fishermen in those regions as "Old Sabile," "Lige," and "Little Jo." Lige and Little Jo recently spent a day in pursuit of a panther, without overtaking him. They returned to their cabin, and on the next morning Little Jo arose early and went to a spring, a few rods from the cabin, for water, when a panther (supposed to be the same one they had been in pursuit of) sprang upon him and literally tore him to pieces before assistance could reach him from the cabin.

Some ingenious, wicked, Yankee has been playing off an ornithological swindle upon the simple folks of Troy, in selling birds with a plumage of various rich hues; several of the cute ones bought, some with the cash, others swapped off favorite canaries for these more showy pets. In about a day's time, it was with mingled emotions of chagrin, very much mad, and a little inclination to laugh, that the purchasers found the fine colors were paint only, like so much rainbow thrown on a sparrow, a perfect bite, but the merchant too was transient as the rainbow, a vanished wonder.

A curious fact appears to be established by the publication of bills of mortality in England, viz. that the soldier, fighting in the trenches of a besieged city or on the field of battle, before the bravest of his enemies, is exposed to a smaller chance of death, than the inhabitants of certain manufacturing cities of England, such as Manchester, Liverpool, &c. The chances of death at the siege of Antwerp were as one to 68; at the siege of Badajoz as 1 to 54; at the battle of Waterloo 1 to 30. For the laboring classes at Liverpool the chance of death is as 1 to 17. For the cutler of Sheffield as 1 to 14.

SUMMARY.

In the Municipal Court of Boston, Patrick Tracy, who was indicted as a common seller of spirituous liquor, violation of the Lord's day, keeping a disorderly house, a house of ill fame, &c., was sentenced by Judge Merrick, upon three counts of the indictment, as follows;—As a common seller he was fined $100, if not paid in ten days, then eighty days in the House of Correction; for a violation of the Lord's day $10 fine, if not paid in ten days, ten days in the House of Correction; for keeping a disorderly house, $100 fine, if not paid in ten days, then ninety days in the House of Correction—making one hundred and eighty days in all.

The Rock Co. (Wisconsin) Democrat says: We are pained to hear that Mr. Jos. Goodrich, of Milton, in this county, on Wednesday, fell from the wall of a building which he was erecting, and so injured himself that his life is despaired of. A rumor of his death reached town this morning, which we trust may turn out to be incorrect, as Mr. Goodrich is one of our most exemplary and enterprising citizens. Mr. G. is extensively known as the inventor of gravel cement for building houses.

George Rapp, the founder of Economy, (Pa.) and the greatest communitist of the age, is dead. He departed this life on the 9th instant, aged ninety-two years. He was a native of Germany, and emigrated to this country half a century ago with a band of followers, with his own peculiar religious, political, and social views. His niece is his heiress, but, as celibacy is a peculiarity of their creed, the stock will of course soon run out.

In Kingston, N. H., Col. William Webster, aged 67, was married to Miss Martha Winslow, aged 19. By the above union, the bridegroom has married his sister's grand-daughter, which makes the bride a wife to her great uncle, sister to her grand-father and grand-mother, and aunt to her father and mother, and great aunt to her brothers and sisters. She is a step-mother to five children, fourteen grand-children, and one great-grand-child.

It is stated in the St. Louis Era that there are 1190 steamboats engaged on the waters of the Mississippi valley, costing upwards of $16,000,000, employing 40,000 men, and running at an annual expense of $32,700,000. It is also stated in the same paper that these boats are capable of carrying, annually, 10,000,000 tons of freight, and that the annual value of the commerce of this great valley is over $432,000,000, or more than twice as much as that of the whole foreign commerce of the country.

The Teacher's Convention connected with the Boston Academy of Music, has been in session for several days at Tremont Temple. The class is very large, numbering about 700. The forenoon is devoted to lectures, by the Professors, on Harmony, the Elements of Music, and Cultivation of the Voice; the afternoon to Glee singing, and evening to Chorus singing. The present is the fourteenth annual session of the Convention.

We see, by an article in the Yarmouth Register, that the monster bubble of the "Chase property in England" is nowhere. A Boston gentleman, who employed the Barings, of London, to cause an investigation of records for proof that a fortune is in reserve for the Chase family in America, received a letter from them by the last steamer, in which they state that no evidence of the fact has been discovered, and send a bill of about fifty dollars expenses in the research!

The Church of the Pilgrims in Boston, under the pastoral care of Rev. M. Hale Smith, have resolved to dispense with choir singing, when they enter their new place of worship, and restore the puritanical mode of congregational singing. At the invitation of the pastor, Lowell Mason, Esq., gave a lecture on Sunday, July 18th, in Tremont Temple, on the practicability and utility of congregational singing.

We learn from the Portland Advertiser, that of the whole number of children in Maine returned to the Board of Education, between the ages of four and twenty-one, the Secretary of the Board finds that sixty thousand nine hundred and forty-two did not attend any school during the last summer; and that there were forty-seven thousand eight hundred and forty-seven who were not in attendance at any school during the past winter.

A little girl, between five and six years old, the daughter of Mr. Stein, met with her death at Quebec last week under the following circumstances: Her father had imprudently kept a loaded pistol in an open drawer; the child having got hold of the weapon, took it to the door as a plaything; and while amusing herself the piece went off and shot her through the heart.

The Mercer (Pennsylvania) Luminary gives an account of a person who came to their office some weeks since, worked three days, went home, constructed a press, procured a font of second hand type, and returned last week with a proof sheet of the first form of a pamphlet. What will become of the trade?

A little daughter of Mr. Otis Lawrence, of Lyndon, Vt., recently, in returning from school, called at a house, as was supposed, for the purpose of ascertaining the time of day, when finding the people absent, she thoughtlessly placed her hands on the window sill, raised herself from the ground, and put her head through the open window, that she might look at the clock, when the window fell upon her neck, causing death before she could be discovered and asssistance rendered.

A handsome business is doing in Vancluse mine, Orange county, Virginia, the most extensive gold mine in operation in the United States; the capital is to be raised $500,000, divided into 10,000 shares of $50 each. Large subscriptions have been made in Washington, and among them extensive ones for English houses.

It is proposed by a number of gentlemen of South Carolina and other States, to establish a press in Washington, which shall represent Southern views on the subject of slavery. The press is to be "free from party influence," and none are to be engaged in the undertaking but "men in every way independent," and "whose means and position are such as to free them from all temptations of profit and place."

Seth Sprague, who recently died at Plymouth, Mass., was born on the 14th of July, A. D. 1760, and had entered his eighty-eighth year. He was a descendant in the paternal line of William Sprague, and in the maternal line of Francis Sprague, who were among the earliest settlers in the colony of Plymouth and Massachusetts. The farm on which he died was occupied by himself and his ancestors for more than two centuries. Eight children and one hundred and seventy-five grandchildren survive him.

According to Semaphore de Marseilles, the corn trade is particularly active at Constantinople. The exportation continued on a large scale. Prices were moderate, but the freight was exorbitant. In the space of three or four days 500 vessels had crossed the Dardanelles, most of which were proceeding to load grain in the Black Sea harbors. Of these 400 had been freighted for the purpose. It is impossible to form an idea of the immense profit Turkey has derived from that trade.

Peru has accepted the proposal of Mr. William Wheelright to construct a railway (the first in that country;) between Lima and Callao. It will be about six miles in length, cheaply constructed, with one set of rails; and, running from Lima to the water's edge, it will receive, as regards both passengers and goods, almost the entire commercial traffic of the republic.

The Pittsburg Gazette estimates that the exports of coal from that city up to the present time this year, will amount to five millions of bushels, and that fourteen millions of bushels will be exported during the entire year. It is worth from four to four and a half cents per bushel at Pittsburg. There are nine hundred and sixty eight boats engaged in this trade, valued at one thousand dollars each.

There was a fire on Monday evening of last week, in the extensive foundry of Stillman, Allen, & Co., known as the Novelty Works, foot of 12th street, and used for the manufacture of steam engines, castings, iron ships, boats, &c., The loss is estimated at $8,000—covered by insurance.

In some of the railway bills passed at the last session of the British Parliament, power was given to enable the companies to act as water companies for the supply of water by pipes along the railways, to the towns on and at their terminus.

Pens made of ivory are now coming into use. They are shaved down to an almost transparent thinness, and perfecly susceptible of being nibbed, mended, &c., with all the facility of an ordinary quill. They are of French manufacture.

A catfish was purchased in the Cincinnati market, lately, which, on being opened, was found to contain in its stomach, a silver thimble, a gold ring, and a counterfeit dime, tied up in a rag.

By a decree of the Austrian Government any employee of a railway causing an accident by negligence, is liable, if serious, to 10 or 20 years imprisonment, and if death be caused, death is the punishment.

W. C. Warning & Co., Phœnix Factory, Yonkers, have recently manufactured a beautiful three-cornered hat for General Taylor. It is made entirely of wool, white as the driven snow.

It is expected that the great Erie Railroad will be finished about the autumn of 1848. There are now 3000 men engaged on it.

The Swedish bark Gotheburg cleared at the custom house in Boston, for Falmouth, Eng., with a cargo of bones, valued at $5000.

One of the best toasts said to have been drunk at the printer's festival at Rochester, was the following: "To the health of the man who pays in advance for his newspaper."

The small pox has lately been unusually prevalent in London, and the authorities of several parishes have consequently issued circulars, calling attention to the provisions of the act respecting vaccination.

The teeth of some antediluvian animals, and several of those weighing eighty pounds each, have been found at Lamarsh, England.

A memorial to the Queen of England, signed by 100,000 women, has lately been presented, praying that the bill for punishing seduction may become a law.

Mr. Charles Wallace, of Alleghany city, Pa. met with an accident on Saturday, which, it is thought, has ere this proved fatal. He was on his way to Brownsville, in a one horse buggy, when, from some cause, the horse took fright, ran away, and threw Mr. W. out, fracturing his scull and injuring him internally.

New York city has nineteen licensed rum holes to each church; and thirty-eight rumsellers to each preacher of the gospel. A fine prospect for the morals of the rising generation, while it furnishes a beautiful commentary upon the present.

St. Paul's Church in Rochester, it is now believed, took fire from the stump of a lighted cigar, very carelessly thrown down in the tower during the visit of three young men the day before the conflagration. Arrangements are being made to rebuild the church.

Mr. Fletcher Webster is to deliver the anniversary discourse before the New York American Institute in October. The Fair will open at Castle Garden, October 2d. Our producers are invited to send in specimens for exhibition.

The Governor General of Canada has been invited by the committee to attend the agricultural fair which is to be held at Saratoga, N. Y., Sept. 14, 15, 16. He says he will attend if his public duties will admit of it.

The consumption of caoutchou (India Rubber) has prodigiously increased, as shown by the fact that in 1828, the quantity of that article exported from Brazil did not exceed 20,000 lbs., whilst that of 1845—6 amounted to 800,000 lbs., besides 416,000 pairs of shoes.

The Cincinnati Commercial says: "We are informed by good authority, that a block of three story buildings is to be erected in this city, the entire front to be of cast iron! The plates for the same are already being cast."

A medical gentleman at the Chicago convention remarked that, according to the most approved formula for the preservation of bodily health, the Great Father of Rivers kept his head cool in the frigid regions of the north and his feet warm in the sunny air of the tropics. It was now only necessary to remove the obstructions from his bowels to make it the most healthful alimentary canal in the known world.

A Mr. Johnson says he has effectually cured himself of an obstinate cancer, by the free use of potash made from the ashes of red oak, boiled to the consistence of molasses, used as a poultice, covering the whole with a coat of tar. Two or three applications will remove all protuberances, after which it is only necessary to heal the wound with common salve.

The Tablet (Roman Catholic) publishes the following extract from Rome:—"The Pope has wrought a miracle. He went to Subiaco, and as there was a great want of rain, the people asked him to pray for it. He accordingly went to the shrine of St. Benedict, and prayed there an hour, and immediately the rain came, and lasted six hours."

Eight hundred Graduates of West Point have been one year in service in Mexico, and of the number fifty have been killed or died in the war, or one in sixteen of the whole number. Of the artillery officers serving in Mexico every one graduated at West Point.

The Cleveland Herald publishes a letter from Major Smith of the army, dated Vera Cruz, July 13th, in which it is stated, that in a population of 7,000, including the troops, there are thirty deaths per day. In the military carpenters' shop 550 coffins were made in the month of June.

The Salem Gazette learns from Capt. Sims, of the brig Oregon, that Capt. McLean, Governor of Sierra Leone, and well known as the husband of the deceased poetess, Miss Landon, died at Cape Coast about the 20th of April last.

A message was received at New York on Saturday, over the telegraphic wires, from Montreal, which was delivered, answered, and receipt acknowledged in the short space of thirty minuts. It came by way of Toronto and Buffalo.

A city paper says that at a public house near the railroad station at Farmingdale, Long Island, where a camp meeting has been held during the week, $1,400 for "refreshments" were taken in one day.

A correspondent of the Evening Post says that Thomas W. Dorr is lying very low. His disease has become a confirmed jaundice. He has been a great sufferer. At present his recovery is deemed doubtful, both by himself and his friends.

The Governor and Council of New-Hampshire have appointed Thursday, November 25, as the day of annual thanksgiving in that State.

DIED,

In Westerly, R. I., Wednesday morning, Aug. 25th, Miss Elizabeth H. Maxson, daughter of Jonathan Maxson, in the 25th year of her age. Her health had been declining for some weeks, but she was able to be about until attacked by a fever less than a fortnight before her death. Her sickness was attended with extreme nervous irritability and excessive action of the brain, which after the first few days rendered her unconscious of her situation. As nature gave way to the influence of disease, she gradually sank until she calmly fell asleep in Jesus. Great would have been the consolation to her friends, if she had possessed her reason in the trying hour; but this was denied them, perhaps the more sensibly to remind them of the necessity of preparing for death while in health. This afflictive dispensation of Providence will be deeply felt by a large circle of relatives and friends; but they have the blessed assurance that what is loss to them is infinite gain to her.

In Scioto, Ohio, on the 13th of August, of an inflammatory disease, Marcus J. Bronson, aged 40 years. Brother Bronson embraced religion when a youth, and united with the Methodists, with whom he remained a worthy member until, about five years since, he became a convert to the Bible Sabbath, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Jackson, Shelby Co., O., by whom he was called to the improvement of his gift, and received a license to preach the Gospel. Subsequently he removed to this place, and became a member of this church, and continued to labor with us as a licentiate until he was silenced by sickness and death. We trust he has gone to join the church triumphant. His disease was rapid and very distressing; but at intervals we had the satisfaction of hearing him express his unshaken confidence in the rock of Ages. He left a wife and one daughter to mourn their loss. Charles Clarke.

Scioto, August 18, 1847.

In Lincklean, Chenango Co., N. Y., June 18th, Abigail Stillman, widow of Deacon Jared Stillman, aged 70 years.

In New York, Aug. 20th, of croup, Zelotus Theodore, son of M. B. and G. A. Danelson, aged three years and one month.

TRACT SOCIETY NOTICE.

The Fourth Anniversary of the American Sabbath Tract Society will be held at DeRuyter, Madison Co., N. Y., on fifth day, September 16th, at 10 o'clock A. M. Auxiliary Societies, agents, and tract distributors, are requested to communicate to the Corresponding Secretary, without delay, such facts connected with the circulation of Sabbath Tracts as are calculated to show the usefulness of that field of labor. Annual Members of the Society, Auxiliary Societies, or Churches, owing or having contributions designed to be included in the Treasurer's Annual Report, are requested to forward them to the Treasurer before the 5th of September, at which time he will make up his report.

Paul Stillman, General Agent.

MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

The Fifth Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association will be held at DeRuyter, Madison County, New-York, on the sixth day of the week, September 17th, at 9 o'clock A. M. Sermon by Rev. L. Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J.; N. V. Hull, of Alfred, N. Y., his alternate.

"Any person contributing one dollar annually to the funds is a member." "Societies, Chnrches, or Associations, may become auxiliary by contributing to its funds, and shall be entitled to one vote for every five dollars." "Each subscriber of twenty-five dollars, at one time, shall be a member for life." Churches, Societies, or Associations, would do well to make some of their members life members, by the payment of twenty-five dollars, especially the Pastors of their Churches. W. B. Gillett, Rec. Sec.

THE NEW HYMN BOOK.

At the last meeting of the General Conference, a Committee, consisting of Thomas B. Brown, Lucius Crandall, Wm. B. Maxson, Eli S. Bailey, Nathan V. Hull, and Sherman S. Griswold, was appointed to prepare and secure the publication of a Hymn Book suited to the wants of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Subsequently Mr. Brown, Chairman of the Committee, suggested a plan for the work, which received the unanimous and hearty approval of the other members of the Committee, and which he was requested by them to carry out. We are happy to state, that he has completed the duty assigned to him, and has prepared for the press a book which is believed by good judges to be equal in point of merit to any thing of the kind now extant. The copy is already in the hands of the printer, and the work will be published and ready for distribution on the 10th day of September next. It will contain above one thousand hymns, covering nearly six hundred pages of the size of the medium edition of "The Psalmist," now in use among the Baptists. It will be printed on fine paper, and upon stereotype plates prepared from entirely new type. In style of workmanship, it is intended that the book shall be inferior to none. To secure for it as general a circulation as possible, the price, in common leather binding, has been fixed at 75 cents per copy, or $9 per dozen. Copies will be put up in extra binding, with gilt edges, &c., to suit every variety of taste, at prices corresponding to the style.

The Publishers of the Book are desirous of learning what number of copies will be at once demanded, in order that they may regulate the size of the first edition by the demand. They request, therefore, that those in want of the work will give them as early notice as possible of the number they desire. Probably the best way to do the business will be for each society or church to appoint some person to ascertain how many will be wanted within its own bounds, and send on the order accordingly. The books will be ready for delivery, as before stated, on the 10th day of September, in time to supply at the Anniversary of the Missionary and Tract Societies in DeRuyter, all who may wish to obtain them in that way. To save uneasiness, no money will be required until the books are delivered; and to save loss, no books will be delivered except for the money or its equivalent. Orders for the books are now solicited, and should in all cases be accompanied with explicit information as to the way in which they may be sent. Those who wish to be sure of copies of the first edition, should send their orders as early as the 1st day of September. Address, "Utter & Champlin, No. 9 Spruce-st, New-York."

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

Miscellaneous.

THE PEN AND THE PRESS.

Young Genius walked out by the mountains and streams,
Entranced by the power of his own pleasant dreams,
Till the silent—the wayward—the wandering thing
Found a plume that had fallen from a passing bird's wing;
Exulting and proud, like a boy at his play,
He bore the new prize to his dwelling away,
He gazed for a while on its beauties, and then
He cut it, and shaped it, and called it a pen.

But its magical use he discovered not yet,
Till he dipp'd its light lips in a fountain of jet;
And oh! what a glorious thing it became,
For it spoke to the world in a language of flame;
While its master wrote on like a being inspired,
Till the hearts of the millions were melted or fired:
It came as a boon and a blessing to men,
The peaceful—the pure—the victorious pen!

Young Genius went forth on his rambles once more,
The vast sinless caverns of earth to explore!
He search'd the rude rock, and with rapture he found
A substance unknown, which he brought from the ground;
He fused it with fire, and rejoiced in the change,
As he molded the ore into characters strange,
Till his thoughts and his efforts were crowned with success,
For an engine uprose and he called it the Press.

The Pen and the Press, blest alliance! combin'd
To soften the heart and enlighten the mind!
For that to the treasures of knowledge gave birth,
And this sent them forth to the ends of the earth,
Their battles for truth were triumphant indeed,
And the rod of the tyrant was snapped like a reed;
They were made to exalt us—to teach us to bless
Those invincible brothers, the Pen and the Press.

IRISH HEARTS.

At this moment, when the sufferings of the Irish people engross so large a share of public sympathy, the following sketch of Irish character may not be found uninteresting. To us it seems touching and truthful. The story teller prefaces the incident by stating that he found an Irish family, of a husband, wife, and several children, on one of our lake steamers. They were in great destitution; and the beauty of the children was the theme for the admiration of all their fellow travelers. At the request of a lady passenger, who, having no children of her own, was desirous of taking one of the little Irishers and adopting it, the narrator addressed himself to the head of the family. We do not know the author of the sketch, and give it as we find it.

Although, says the story teller, I had considerable doubts as to the result, I offered my services as a negotiator, and proceeded immediately upon my delicate diplomacy. Finding my friend on deck, I thus opened the affair:

"You are very poor?"

His answer was characteristic—

"Poor, sir?" said he: "ay, if there's a poorer man than me troublin the world, God pity both ov uz, for we'd be both aiqual,"

"Then how do you manage to support your children?"

"Is it support them, sir? Why I don't support them any way; they get supported some way or another. It'll be time enough for me to complain when they do."

"Would it be a relief to part with one of them?"

It was too sudden; he turned sharply round, "And what, sir?" he cried: "a relief to part from me child? Would it be a relief to have the hands chopped from the body, or the heart torn out of my breast? And relief, indeed? God be good to us, what do you mean?"

"You don't understand me," I replied: "if, now, it were in one's power to provide comfortably for one of your children, would you stand in the way of its interests?"

"No, sir," said he: "the Heaven knows that I would willingly cut the sunshine away from myself, that they might get all the warm of it; but do tell uz what you're driving at."

I then told him that a lady had taken a fancy to one of his children; and if he would consent to it, it should be educated and finally settled comfortably in life.

This threw him into a fit of gratulation. He scratched his head, and looked the very picture of bewilderment. The struggle between a father's love and a child's interest was evident and touching; at length, he said:

"Oh, murther, wouldn't it be a great thing for the baby? But I must go and have a talk with Mary—that's the mother of them; an' it wouldn't be right to be giving away her children afore her face, and she know nothing at all about it."

"Away with you, then," said I: "and bring me an answer back as soon as possible."

In about an hour he returned, leading two of his children. His eyes were red and swollen, and his face pale from excitement and agitation.

"Well," I inquired: "what success?"

"Bedad, it was a hard struggle, sir," said he: "but I've been talkin' to Mary; an' she says as it's for the child's good, maybe the Heavens above will give us strength to bear it."

"Very well, and which of them is it to be?"

"Faix, an' I don't know, sir," and he ran his eye dubiously over both. Here's Norah—she's the oldest, an' won't want her mother so much—but then—oh! tear and aigers—it's myself that can't tell which I'd rather part with least; so take the first that comes wid a blessin'. There, sir"—and he handed over little Norah—turning back, he snatched her up in his arms, and gave her one long hearty father's kiss, saying through his tears:

"May God be good to him that's good to you; and them that offers you hurt or harm, may their souls never see St. Pethur."

Then, taking his other child by the other hand, he walked away, leaving Norah with me.

I took her down in the cabin, and we thought the matter settled. It must be confessed, to my great indignation, however, in about an hour's time, I saw my friend Pat at the window. As soon as he caught my eye, he commenced making signs for me to come out. I did so—and found he had the other child in his arms.

"What's the matter now?" said I.

"Well sir," said he: "I ax your pardon for troubling you about so foolish a thing as a child or two, but we were thinkin' that maybe it'd make no differ—you see, sir, I've been talking to Mary, an' she can't part with Norah, because—the creature has a look ov me; but here's little Biddy, she's purthier far, an' av you please, sir, will you swap?"

"Certainly," said I, "whenever you like."

So he snapped up little Norah, as though it were some recovered treasure, and darted away with her, leaving little Biddy, who remained with us all night; but lo! the moment when we entered the cabin in the morning, there was Pat making mysterious signs again at the window, and by this time he had the youngest, a baby, in his arms.

"What's wrong now?" I inquired.

"Be the hokey fly, sir, an' it's myself that's almost ashamed to tell you. You see I've been talking to Mary, and she didn't like to part with Norah, because she had a look of me, and be me soul, I can't afford to part with Biddy, because she is the model of her mother; but there's little Paudieen, sir. There's a lump of a Christian for you, two years old an' not a day more—he'll never be any trouble to any one, for av he takes after his mother, he'll have the brightest eye, an' av he takes after his father, he'll have a fine broad pair of shoulders, to push his way through the world. Will you swap, sir?"

"With all my heart," said I: "it's all the same to me"—and so little Paudieen was left with us.

"Ah, ah," said I to myself, as I looked into his big laughing eyes, "the affair is settled at last;" but it wasn't, for ten minutes had scarcely elapsed when Pat rushed into the cabin without sign or ceremony, and, snatching up the baby in his arms, cried out:

"It's no use, I've been talking to Mary, an' we can't do it. Look at him, sir,—he's the youngest and the best of the batch. You wouldn't have the heart to keep him from us. You see, sir, Norah has a look ov me, and Biddy has a look ov Mary, but be my soul, little Paudieen has the mother's eye an' my nose, and little bits av both ov uz all over. No, sir, no; we can bear hard fortune, starvation, and misery, but we can't bear to part from our children, unless it be the will of Heaven to take them from us."

CHINESE MODE OF FISHING.

The most singular of all the methods of catching fish in China, is that of training and employing a large species of cormorant. These are certainly wonderful birds. They are frequently met with on the canals and lakes in the interior. There are generally two small boats, containing one man and about 10 or 12 birds each. The birds stand perched on the side of the little boat, ready to commence operations. They are so well trained, that when they go on the water they immediately scatter themselves and look for fish. They have a beautiful sea-green eye, and quick as lightning, they see and dive upon the finny tribe, which once caught in the sharp notched bill of the bird, never by any possibility can escape. The cormorant, when it takes a fish, rises to the surface with it in its bill, and the moment he is seen by the Chinaman, he is called back to the boat. As docile as a dog, he swims after his master, and allows himself to be pulled into the boat, where he disgorges his prey, and again resumes his labors. And what is more wonderful still, if one of the cormorants gets hold of a fish of a large size, so large that he would have some difficulty in taking it to the boat, some of the others, seeing his dilemma, hasten to his assistance, and with their efforts united capture the fish, and haul him off to the boat. Sometimes a bird seems to get playful or lazy, and then the Chinaman, with a long bamboo used for propelling the boat, strikes the water, near where the bird is, without hurting him, calling out to him at the same time in an angry tone. Immediately, like the truant schoolboy who neglects his lessons and is found out, the cormorant gives up his play and resumes his labors. A small string is put around the neck of the bird to prevent him swallowing the fish which he catches; and great care is taken that this string is placed and fastened so that it will not slip further down and choke him, which otherwise it would be very apt to do.

PRICE OF A MEXICAN PEON OR SLAVE.

The value of a peon is not estimated very high. Two hundred dollars would be a very high price for one. Forty or fifty dollars are sufficient to keep a man enslaved during life. The woman who cooked the supper at Santa Rosa, where I first ate red pepper, was purchased by the landlady, the day before, for eighty-six dollars, which was considered a high price. She was a fine cook, and she had the privilege of paying the debt off by wages of two dollars per month. Her love of finery will forever prevent her from paying it.

At Monclova, a good-looking Mexican girl of sixteen years of age, was held in servitude as a peon, having been sold by her father to pay a debt. She was about to be transfered to another master, and was very much distressed at it. General Shields happened to hear of it, and inquired what was the amount of the debt for which the girl was held in bondage. He was informed the debt was five dollars. Small as this sum was, it is not probable that she ever could have paid it. Without farther inquiry, the General promptly paid the debt, and restored her to freedom. The poor girl was overcome with gratitude, and falling upon her knees, would have kissed his feet, if he would have permitted it. Drying her tears, she returned to her father's house rejoicing—perhaps to enjoy life in freedom—perhaps to be sold again.

MISERIES OF THE JEWS.

An English clergyman, who recently traveled through Palestine, in speaking of the fulfillment of the judgment predicted by the prophets, as now manifest in the miseries of this people, relates the following facts, which he says he had on the highest authority:—

"The houses of Jerusalem belong to Turks. If a Jew wants a habitation, he must therefore have an oppressive hater for his landlord. The landlord has a right to demand a year's rent, to be paid on taking possession; but yet he may eject the tenant at a short notice.

"The Mohammedan law sanctions the claim of an ejected tenant, for the repayment of an adequate portion of the rent; but he must prove his case before the Cadi. A Jew's testimony is not admissible. A Christian's is refused. No Turk will bear witness on behalf of a Jew. So then, at any moment, a Jew may be turned into the street; and in addition to that calamity, must lose all the year's rent which he paid in advance. Moreover, if a Jew engage in any little trade, he hardly earns enough to sustain life. If he possesses any thing beyond this, he is an object towards which rapacity glances its greedy and cruel eye. The poor Jews throughout Palestine derive all their sustenance, or nearly so, from contributions made by the richer Jews in various parts of Europe."

Speedy Cure for a Foundered Horse.—As soon as you find your horse is foundered, bleed him in the neck in proportion to the greatness of the founder. In extreme cases you may bleed him as long as he can stand up. Then draw his head up as is common in drenching, and with a spoon put back on his tongue strong salt, until you get him to swallow one pint. Be careful not to let him drink too much. Then anoint round the edges of his hoofs with spirits of turpentine, and your horse will be well in one hour. A founder pervades every part of the system of a horse. The fleam arrests it from the blood, the salt arrests it from his stomach and bowels; and the spirits of turpentine arrests it from the feet and limbs. I once rode a hired horse ninety miles in two days, returning him at night the second day; and his owner would not have known that he had been foundered if I had not told him; and his founder was one of the deepest kind. I once, in a travel of seven hundred miles, foundered my horse three times, and I do not think that my journey was retarded more than one day by the misfortune, having in all caaes observed and practiced the above prescription. I have known a foundered horse turned in at night on green feed; in the morning he would be well, having been purged by the green feed. All founders must be attended to immediately

Plowing in Ancient Peru.—The Peruvians had neither the iron ploughshare of the old world, nor had they animals for draught, which, indeed, were no where found in the new. The instrument which they used was a strong, sharp-pointed stake, traversed by a horizontal piece, ten or twelve inches from the point, on which the ploughman might set his foot and force it into the ground. Six or eight strong men were attached by ropes to the stake, and dragged it forcibly along—pulling together and keeping time as they moved by chanting their national songs, in which they were accompanied by the women, who followed in their train to break up the sods with their rakes. The mellow soil offered slight resistance, and the laborer, by long practice, acquired a dexterity which enabled him to turn up the ground to the requisite depth with astonishing facility. This substitute for the plough was but a clumsy contrivance; yet it was curious as the only specimen of the kind among the American aborigines, and was, perhaps, not much inferior to the wooden instrument introduced in its stead by the European conquerors.

Curious Tenure.—A law contest is expected to be commenced shortly, arising from the stoppage of the following custom at the parish church at Caistor, in England. For many years it has been the custom in that parish church to have a gad whip, with a purse tied to its lash containing half-a-crown, flourished over the pastor's head during the service every Palm Sunday, by a man from Broughton. This custom, however ridiculous, we understand is obliged to be performed, or the church would lose an estate, which is left on condition that the same shall be at all times kept up on Palm Sunday. Several influential gentlemen have tried to prevent the gad being cracked, but finding it could not be legally laid aside, they have withdrawn all opposition. However, last Palm Sunday the gad was there, and the man from Broughton, but the exhibition was stopped through the interference of an individual, and the question now is, has not the church forfeited the estate.

A Severe Rebuke.—When Sir Richard Steele, the celebrated contributor to the "Spectator," was fitting up his great room in York Buildings, which he intended for public orations, he happened at a time to be pretty much behind hand with his workmen, and coming one day among them, to see how they went forward, ordered one of them to get into the rostrum, and make a speech, that he might observe how it could be heard; the fellow mounting, and scratching his pate, told him he knew not what to say, for in truth he was no orator. "Oh!" said the knight, "no matter for that, speak any thing that comes uppermost." "Why here, Sir Richard," says the fellow, "we have been working for you these six weeks, and cannot get one penny of money: Pray, Sir, when do you design to pay us?" "Very well, very well," said Sir Richard, "pray come down; I have heard enough; I cannot but own you speak very distinctly, though I don't admire your subject."

The Witchery of the Voice.—A voice which, though somewhat low, was of that organ that at once arrests attention; a voice that comes alike from the brain and from the heart, and seems made to convey both profound thought and deep emotion. There is no index of character so sure as the voice. There are tones, tones brilliant and gushing, which impart a quick and pathetic sensibility; there are others that, deep and yet calm, seem the just interpreters of a serene and exalted intellect. But the rarest and most precious of all voices is that which combines passion and repose; and those rich and restrained tones, exercise, perhaps, on the human frame, a stronger spell than even the fascination of the eye, or that bewitching influence of the hand, which is the privilege of the higher races of Asia.

Influence of Railroads.—A short time since, we met a heavy loaded team a little distance from town, carrying chesnut sleepers to the dépôt. Being of a peculiar shape, we inquired to what use they were to be appropriated. The teamster replied that they were engaged by a contractor, and were to be shipped to Havana, to build a railroad in the Island of Cuba! Concord chesnut, once nearly worthless, now bringing a high price, and shipped 2,000 miles to build railroads! We believe the teamster's load was worth about $50, all clear gain through the magic influence of railroads.

A respectable citizen of our town, once resident in Springfield, on the dreary height of land between the Merrimack and the Connecticut, near which the Northern Railroad is to pass, lately informed us that he had tried long and earnestly to sell a lot of timber land for $4 per acre, but all in vain. Not long since some gentleman called upon him, and offered $16 per acre, which he accepted, though he might have done better by waiting. [Cong. Jour. Concord.

VARIETY.

Charles XII., King of Sweden, drank sometimes to excess, so as even to disturb his reason. In one of his drunken bouts he lost the respect which was due to the Queen, his mother. She retired to her chamber, overwhelmed with grief, and remained there on the following day. As she did not make her appearance, the King inquired the cause. This being told, he took a glass of wine in his hand, and went to the Queen's room. "Madam," said he to her, "I have learned that yesterday, in my cups, I forgot myself towards you. I come to ask your pardon; and to prevent a recurrence of such a fault, I drink this glass to your health; it shall be the last during my life." He kept his word, and from that day he never tasted wine.

A late London paper says:—"Last October two vessels were wrecked off Fishgurd; three men were seen clinging to the rigging, but the sea was so rough that the hardy seamen of the port refused to venture out with their boats. Two young women named Llewellen were more daring. Having had ropes attached to them, they entered the surf, and succeeded in conveying a rope to the wrecks, by means of which the sailors were got ashore. Both the committee of Lloyd's and the Humane Society have contributed to a collection for the heroic women, who are in very humble circumstances."

Lately, in pulling down an old churchat Aia, Norway, an oblong box was found containing the skeletons of a man and woman, with about fifty rods of hard wook lying between them. On the cover was a brass plate with the following inscription: "In this coffin repose the remains of a man and woman, who, having lived together in concubinage, were, for their ill-conduct, beaten to death. October 4, 1404." It appears, from an examination of the state of the law in Norway, in the beginning of the 15th century, that the above-named crime was at that period punished by death from castigation.

A paris letter says that the few fashionable young men in town are amusing themselves with the most absurd wagers, such as asking their way of a certain number of people in a certain time; walking from one point to another blindfolded; or driving a certain distance before their opponent can fire a given number of pistol shots. This last dates from 1783, when the Duke of Orleans bet the Count de Genlis that he would go to Fontainbleau, with post horses, and return ere the Count could prick 700,000 holes in sheets of paper with a pin. The Duke won.

A young fox asked his father, (says the Persian Fable,) if he could not teach him some trick to defeat the dogs if he should fall in with them. The father had grown grey in a long life of depredation and danger, and his scars bore witness to his narrow escapes in the chase, or his less honorable encounters with the faithful guardiaus of the hen-roost. He replied, with a sigh, "After all my experience, I am forced to confess that the best trick is—to keep out of their way."

A hearty laugh occasionally is an act of wisdom: it shakes the cobwebs of care from a man's heart; icicles of melancholy from his brains, and the hypochondria from his ribs, more effectually than champagne or blue pills. One of the emperors of Japan is said to have killed himself by immoderate laughing, on being told that the Americans were governed without a king.

The Journal of Commerce estimates the value of donations from the U. States in aid of the starving people of Ireland and Scotland, to exceed $300,000, and adds: "The history of the world does not afford another such instance of private charity extended from one people to another of a different nation."

It is a fact worthy of note, says the Transcript, that the three Presidents who have visited Boston during the last fourteen years, have been greeted with showers of rain on their entrance into town, viz—Gen. Jackson, on Friday, June 21st, 1833; Mr. Tyler, on Friday, June 16th, 1843; and Mr. Polk, on Tuesday, June 29th, 1847.

It is stated that in Ceylon elephants are employed in ploughing rice fields, and in preparing new grounds for cultivation of coffee, pepper, &c. One of these animals, well trained, it is said, will do the work of twenty oxen; consequently, more labor is performed in a given time, and the period is hastened for putting in the crops. The price of an elephant in Ceylon varies from $50 to $75.

Sixty years ago, according to a work lately published in Paris, the nobility of Europe numbered five and a half millions; being one in every thirty inhabitants. It now comprises but three millions and three quarters; or one in fifty-seven inhabitants.

The introduction of gas-light into private houses in Europe has been taken advantage of by the ladies, who, under pretext against the glare and dazzling uncomfortableness of such bright lights, deliberately spread parasols in an evening soiree, and (incidental advantage) converse under and behind the same very agreeably.

Howard, the Philanthropist, made an estimate that the number of persons sacrificed on the altar of war since the creation of the world, would amount to seventy times as large a number as the present population of the globe!

The policy of cheap fares is shown in a statment which appears in the London Globe newspaper, that the receipts of three steamboats which ply between London Bridge and the Adelphi, and carry passengers for a half-penny, average £100 per day.

There are, in the English language, 20,500 nouns, 40 pronouns, 9,200 adjectives, 8,000 verbs, 2,600 adverbs, 60 prepositions, 10 conjunctions, 60 interjections, &c., in all, above 40,000 words.

It is said that the blood of the 1,400,000,000 of human beings that have perished by war would fill a circular lake seventeen miles in circumference, ten feet deep, in which all the navies of the world might float.

Upwards of 600,000 francs were withdrawn from the savings banks in France in three days at the commencement of May, principally by people withdrawing their little earnings to seek with them a transatlantic home.

THE DAILY NATIONAL WHIG is published in the city of Washington, every day, at three o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted, and served to subscribers in the City, at the Navy Yard, in Georgetown, in Alexandria, and in Baltimore, the same evening, at six and a quarter cents a week, payable to the sole agent of the Whig, G. L. Gillchrist, Esq., or his order. It is also mailed to any part of the United States for $4 per annum, or $2 for six months, payable in advance. Advertisements of ten lines or less inserted one time for 50 cents, two times for 75 cents, three times for $1, one week for $1 75, two weeks for $2 75, one month for $4, two months for $7, three months for $10, six months for $16, one year for $20, payable always in advance.

The "National Whig" is what its name indicates. It speaks the sentiments of the Whig party of the Union on every question of public policy. It advocates the election to the Presidency of Zachary Taylor, subject to the decision of a Whig National Convention. It makes war to the knife upon all the measures and acts of the Administration deemed to be adverse to the interests of the country, and exposes without fear or favor the corruptions of the party in power. Its columns are open to every man in the country, for the discussion of political or any other questions.

In addition to politics, a large space in the National Whig will be devoted to publications upon Agriculture, Mechanics, and other useful arts, Science in general, Law, Medicine, Statistics, &c. Choice specimens of American and Foreign Literature will also be given, including Reviews, &c. A weekly list of the Patents issued by the Patent Office will likewise be published—the whole forming a complete family newspaper.

The "Weekly National Whig," one of the largest newspapers in the United States, is made up from the columns of the Daily National Whig, and is published every Saturday, for the low price of $2 per annum, payable in advance. A double sheet of eight pages will be given whenever the press of matter shall justify it.

The Memoirs of General Taylor, written expressly for the National Whig, are in course of publication. They commenced with the second number, a large number of copies of which have been printed, to supply calls for back numbers.

CHAS. W. FENTON,
Proprietor of the National Whig.

P. S. All daily, weekly, and semi-weekly papers in the United States are requested to insert this advertisement once a week for six months, noticing the price for publishing the same at the bottom of the advertisement, and send the paper containing it to the National Whig office, and the amount will be duly remitted. Our editorial brethren are also requested to notice the National Whig in their reading columns.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

NOTES OF A VOYAGE TO CHINA.

Sunda Straits, March 27.—I did not think to add to my already long letter, but feel disposed now to make it still longer. For a few days past we have been in constant expectation of making land, but a counter current, head winds, and dead calms, have kept us floating about near the entrance of the Straits, making very little headway. This evening we are cheered again with the prospect that another sun will find us near Anjier. Have you ever seen the ocean in a calm? It resembles nothing so much as a sea of glass. A slight undulating motion just serves to perfect that complete mirror-like polish of the surface, which makes it so strikingly beautiful. Numerous little insects float and hover about on its unruffled surface, and leaves, buds, flowers, and fruit, from shore, are truly objects of delight to us. They tell us, land is near! Can one who has never "been to sea" imagine the ecstacy of delight which the cry of "land ahead!" awakens in the breast of a weary sojourner upon its bosom—in one who for eighty-two days has seen neither green tree nor humble turf, neither flower nor shrub? O the very sight of these mementos of land, as they float past the vessel, sends a thrill of rapture to the soul, to which it has long been a stranger. To-day a bamboo floated near us, on which were perched three little birds; then a large branch, or small tree; then several turtles, sleeping on the water. Yes, land is near, but it is a heathen land—a land of clouds and thick darkness, even as the region and shadow of death. O when shall the day dawn, and the shadows flee away? When shall the Sun of Righteousness rise upon all these isles of the sea? When shall they wait for his law? For us, we go far hence. Many days, perhaps weeks, may yet elapse before we enter the "land of Sinim," before we tread the soil of the "Celestial Empire." At some seasons of the year, the contrary monsoons produce long passages through the China Sea. We hope, however, not to meet with them at this season, it being somewhat too early. This morning, at four o'clock, the Captain spoke a ship, the first since we sailed. It was solemn, as well as novel, at that still hour, to hear the questions and answers through the speaking-trumpet. "Ship ahoy!" (Answered.) "What ship is that." "The Liverpool." "Where from?" (Answer indistinct.) "Where bound?" "To Manilla." Then on the other side: "What ship is that?" "The Houqua." "Where bound?" "To Canton." Another vessel was also near, which was not spoken, supposed to be also an English ship. They have been in sight all day.

This afternoon we saw a waterspout. First the Captain pointed out to us a strange dark cloud, like a long inverted cone suspended in the air, and pointing directly to a stream of vapor which seemed to be ascending from the waves to meet it. We saw it growing larger and more dense for some moments, when it gradually disappeared, first the column of water below, and the "cloudy pillar" fast following it.

This day has been Sabbath. We have spent it in our usual lonely way. How different from the Sabbath in our beloved America! While I write, I find it difficult to realize that the sun, which has long been hid to us, is beaming upon their morning preparations for the house of God. We can no longer fix our hour of worship at the same time as theirs. But we look forward to the time when one bright day shall witness our united devotions, while they mingle around the throne; for "there is no night there," neither sorrow, nor separation.

Mrs. W. is engaged as usual in teaching Khoo-a. He learns very fast, and she is a most faithful and competent teacher. I can but think her remarkably well qualified for that department of missionary labor. I love her more and more continually.

29th.—Drawing near to Anjier. A boat, full of natives, came off this morning, and they are still alongside, entertaining us with their unintelligible jargon, or trying to make themselves understood by an attempt at English. One among them, a leader, named William Penn, is on our ship, making himself quite at home with our captain and others. He speaks English very well, and dresses after the English costume, doubtless out of compliment to his fellow officers, for it seems that his dress is assumed for the occasion; he however goes barefoot. The poor creatures in the boat have only clothes about the waist. They have asked for old clothes, and seemed delighted with what was given them, putting them on at once. Several have been on board to sell the fruits, shells, &c., which they brought. We have made a fine lunch of their cocoas, oranges, and mangusteens, the latter of which exceed all I ever before tasted for richness and delicious flavor. The Island is near enough to be seen distinctly, and it is so beautiful!—covered with the richest verdure, and gradually rising from the shore far back into the interior, where the sight loses itself in "cloud-capt hills." It seems highly cultivated, and the houses appear delightfully shaded with beautiful trees. The natives are small of stature, and of a dark red color. "William Penn," in apologizing for his people's begging, said they were poor men. He was asked if they were married men. "Oh no, they no get wife, too poor." "Too poor?" "Yes, they pay great deal money for wife." "How much?" "Hundred dollars, hundred fifty dollars." "Do they always pay for their wives?" "O no; suppose both like, then no pay; if the woman like the man, then no pay; but if the man like the woman, and the woman no like the man, then he pay." "Are you married?" "Yes." "Did you pay for your wife?" "Yes, cause I like her, she no like me." This then is the law of marriage in Java. I can hardly write for their continual jargon which is sounding in my ears. Beautiful, beautiful island! My eyes continually wander to it, in spite of all my efforts to fasten them on the paper. One bright red spot of ground appears a little back from the shore, said to be an excavation in the ground, and consequently shows the color of the soil. Can it be so red?

For dinner we had some of the plantain fruit boiled. It resembles the potato, but is not palatable, at least to my taste. The milk of the cocoa-nut, also, is far from agreeable; it tastes different from any I ever saw at home, being more fluid, and perhaps, too, more fresh.

And now, I imagine, I hear you reiterate the question, "What are your feelings, while you are thus greeted for the first time with the sight of heathen shores, and more still, of heathen immortals?" I cannot tell you, dear brother; my heart is drawn out for them, when I look upon their bright intelligent faces, and hear their voices, which are pleasant in spite of their unpleasant jargon. They certainly appear less heathenish than I anticipated, and show many traits of character which, under a European dress, would appear very much like civilization. I do not know that there are missionaries among these people now, but I know there have been from time to time, and that the New Testament, at least, has been translated into their language. No doubt the unhealthiness of the climate must do much to retard the progress of Christianity among them. They are reputed to be a most harmless and inoffensive people, and certainly carry that characteristic in all their features and gestures. They are remarkably small, and effeminate looking, having the hair long and done up at the back of the head, and being almost or entirely destitute of beard. They brought on with them, in addition to what I have mentioned, many curious birds and animals. One was called a Mangoos, resembling a weasel, (more than any thing I can mention,) except the color, which was brown and white. A female of the monkey tribe was also brought, holding in its arms its little one, with all the care and apparent affection of the most devoted mother. But I shall weary you with particulars. It does not seem to me that it would be difficult to conform to the necessity of living among such heathen, did duty require it, although, judging from my own observation, a dwelling among the Chinese would be more pleasant. Indeed, so much have all become attached to our Chinese, Khoo-a, that we almost feel like loving all Chinamen and women for his sake. But the view is, as yet, entirely prospective. A nearer observation may change every feature of it. One thing we know, they are perishing for lack of vision, and as such we would go to them. We would tell them the story of the cross, which our own hearts tell us must be the strongest appeal. O for life, for health, for ability to labor for them. Dear brother, will not the prayers of pious, faithful souls at home, go up and prevail with a prayer-hearing God for us, and for them?

Evening.—Our Javanese friends still accompany us, having fastened their frail bark by a cable to our ship; they dance merrily over the billows in the wake of the Houqua, enjoying life, and their pipes and fruits, almost as much as they do the valuable clothing with which the sailors and crew furnished them, and which, after having been worn a short time for their own gratification, and the edification of their fellows, they took off, folded down carefully, and laid aside for great occasions, namely, the boarding of English and American ships. One of the more enterprising among them, appeared out in his new suit, and came aboard, where he, with William Penn, has remained all day, parading the decks, and displaying more consequence than all our officers and crew, passengers included. Fires are bursting out on the surrounding hills, giving them a thorough home-look, in the evening, presenting to our eyes for the first time in twelve weeks the sight of a kindled fire. (Of course we are not admitted into the kitchen sanctum of the ship, where the fire is kept.) Ten o'clock—we are safely at anchor in Anjier road. The sails are furled, the natives have taken leave of us, the man at the wheel has retired, and the wheel itself for the first time is left desolate!—all is quiet, and we hasten to prepare by rest for an early departure in the morning.

THE VOICE OF THE GRASS.

Here I come creeping, creeping every where,
By the dusty road-side,
On the sunny hill-side,
Close by the noisy brook,
In every shady nook,
I come creeping, creeping every where.

Here I come creeping, smiling every where,
All round the open door,
Where sit the aged poor,
Here where the children play,
In the bright and merry May,
I come creeping, creeping every where.

Here I come creeping, creeping every where,
In the noisy city street
My pleasant face you'll meet,
Cheering the sick at heart,
Toiling his busy part,
Silently creeping, creeping every where.

Here I come creeping, creeping every where,
You cannot see me coming,
Nor hear my low, sweet humming;
For in the starry night,
And the glad morning light,
I come quietly creeping every where.

Here I come creeping, creeping every where,
More welcome than the flowers,
In summer's pleasant hours;
The gentle cow is glad,
And the merry bird not sad
To see me creeping, creeping every where.

Here I come creeping, creeping every where,
When you're numbered with the dead,
In your still and narrow bed,
In the happy spring I'll come,
And deck your silent home,
Creeping, silently creeping every where.

Here I come creeping, creeping every where,
My humble song of praise
Most gratefully I raise
To Him at whose command
I beautify the land,
Creeping, silently creeping every where.

From the Missionary Reporter.

THE TRIAL OF STRENGTH.

In a large dancing-house, belonging to Malietoa, the elderly chief of Savaii, one of the islands of the South Pacific, and a great company of natives, were assembled, seventeen years ago, in eager expectation. Presently two young girls entered, adorned with flowers, and laid down mats in the centre of the floor; and then the distinguished visitors, whose coming was such a wonderful event to the simple people, and who were no other than the missionaries, Mr. Williams and Mr. Barf, appeared and took their seats on the mats. Malietoa, having ceremoniously placed presents at their feet, seated himself opposite, and listened with great attention to their proposal to leave Christian teachers with him.

He replied, "I and my people must now go over to Upolu to war; but immediately after my return I will become a worshiper of Jehovah, and learn from the teachers. Meanwhile they can use this house, and when we come home from the war we will build a chapel, but the people who stay here can come tomorrow, if they like, and learn about Jehovah, Jesus Christ." Some teachers were left, and then the wonderful alii papalangi (foreign kings) sailed away.

Malietoa went and finished the war at Upolu. He sent one of his sons to help the teachers in building the chapel. When it was ready, a day was fixed for opening it. But just before, Malietoa called his family together to hear something important which he had to tell them. They assembled, and waited, not without curiosity, to know what it was. The old chief said, "I am going to keep my promise to the English kings; I have finished the war, the chapel is built, the teachers are here, and now I mean to become a worshiper of Jehovah." "Very well," replied his family, "if that is good for you, it is good for us; we will worship Jehovah too." But Malietoa said, if they did he would stick to the old customs! They looked surprised. "Don't you know," continued he, "that our gods be enraged at me for abandoning them, and will try to destroy me? Perhaps Jehovah may not have power to protect me against their anger. My proposal is, then, that I should try alone the experiment of becoming his worshiper, and then if we find him strong enough to protect me, you can follow my example; if not, only I shall fall a victim to their vengeance, you will be safe."

It is plain that the chief was still ignorant. He had not left off believing in his old gods. He thought of Jehovah as only one among many other deities, though as one who might possibly chance to turn out the most powerful; much as those Assyrians who were settled in the land of Israel, and afterward became the Samaritans of Christ's time, thought of God.

The young men sitting around looked on each other and at their father in fear. They could not understand such a request. They would rather refuse an offer which they thought might endanger his life. One asked at length, how long a time Malietoa would think necessary for his perilous experiment? He determined to continue it about a month or six weeks. Unwillingly his family had to yield.

And so this singular trial of strength between the great God and the Samoan idols (Papo, the god of war, was a piece of rotten matting) was begun. The news spread abroad, and greatly were the people moved by it. It was a time of intense excitement all over the island. People, of course, felt differently about it. The teachers were glad the thing was put in earnest to a fair trial; they doubted not that God would triumph; and yet perhaps they might feel anxious sometimes. Malietoa's mind was probably the most agitated. He had done a noble thing in putting himself forward as the pioneer of his people, into what he considered danger of death. Very likely, while in his half-enlightened way he daily offered worship to God, even his brave heart beat sometimes with apprehension, lest calamity should overtake him from the angry gods whom, though he had forsaken, he still believed to be powerful. As for the people, they looked on with lively interest, suspending their own decision till they should see how the new religion agreed with Malietoa, and whether he would escape punishment for his boldness. Some of the more superstitious were no doubt watching for him (as the Melitans watched for Paul) to have swollen or fallen down dead suddenly. As day after day passed and left him in safety, messengers were frequently dispatched to carry tidings of Jehovah's triumph to the people in the more remote parts of the island; and Malietoa's own spirits rose high.

The patience of the young men, his sons, did not hold out for more than three weeks. "No harm has happened to you, father," said they, "we too will become worshipers of Jehovah." Every chief in these islands has a peculiar animal set apart to him, called his etu, in which the spirit of the god is thought to dwell. The etu of Malietoa's sons was a fish, called anac. To show that they were in earnest, they invited a large company to a solemn feast, and ate, though trembling, of the anac before them all, thus rendering it unholy forever. The people soon followed the example of their chiefs, though some mocked, and said Mr. Williams would never return. When, after more than a year, he did return, how delightful to him was the welcome he received from a people already half-christianized! How rejoiced he was to find that the Lord had already "triumphed gloriously?"

THE OLD MAN AND HIS YOUTH.

FROM KRUMMACHER.

Geron, an old man of eighty years, was one day sitting before the door of his rustic dwelling, enjoying the bright and cheerful autumn morning. His eye rested now upon the blue hills in the distance, from whose tops the mist was stealing upward, like the smoke of burnt-offerings, and now upon his mirthful grand children, who were sporting around him.

A youth from the city now approached the old man, and entered into a discourse with him. When the youth heard the number of years from his own lips, he wondered at his vigorous age and his ruddy countenance. Whereupon he asked the old man whence it came that he enjoyed such strength and cheerfulness in the late autumn of life.

Geron answered: "My son, these, like every other good thing, are gifts which come to us from above, the merit of which we cannot claim to ourselves, and still we can do something here below to enable us to obtain them."

Having uttered these words, the old man arose, and led the stranger into his orchard, and showed him the tall and noble trees, covered with delicious fruit, the sight of which gladdened the heart.

Then the old man spoke. "Dost thou wonder also that I now enjoy the fruit of these trees? See, my son, I planted them in my youth; thou hast the secret of my happy and fruitful old age."

The youth cast a look full of meaning upon the old man; for he understood his words, and treasured them up in his heart.

A SUNDAY IN ROME.

By a correspondent of the Pittsburgh Gazette.

To-day is Sunday—which is always a Festa in Rome. It is the day especially when all the country people turn out. The men in roundabouts, conical hats and knee breeches; the women in gay bright costumes, red, blue, yellow, and all wearing on their heads a piece of cloth or linen, white or striped. It is the rarest thing to see a person dressed unpicturesquely in Rome. In the women particularly there is something in the mode of wearing their dresses as graceful as their faces are beautiful and their figures fine. To-day I have seen numbers gaily dressed from all classes crowding to see the Pope's carriage and horses come from the blessing. For you must know that for some days the annual ceremony has been taking place of all the animals (horses chiefly) going to some church to be blessed.

A picture of half an hour's duration in any principal street in Rome, would amuse you greatly, could I describe it faithfully. For instance, at this moment a Pifferaria or Piper from the country is playing close by, a dull, monotonous no-tune, on a kind of bagpipe, and two little boys squealing away on tiny fifes of their own. He is an old fellow with a gray beard, conical cap, coat and leggins, the very top of Italian picturesque; look out of the window—he is joined by a professional fifer; both squeal away the same old dull strain. These are a couple of the throng of artist models we meet every where; especially on the Spanish steps, where they all congregate in fine weather. Look out again, you will see men and boys on queer little donkeys; side by side with magnificent gilded carriages, the drivers and the trio of footmen shining in their gayest liveries. Beggars all in rags looking wishfully at windows where beautiful faces pop out to see the show, or take off their hats for bajoccos to the passers by. Old withered apple women, as hard and cross as their apples, stand at the corners—others have hot roasted chesnuts twice or three times the size of ours. Respectable black shovel hats, with comely sleek priests under them in black shorts, go by. Troops of snuff-colored Capuchins—sometimes chanting a funeral service with torches, sometimes separate—other troops of students from the Propaganda, likewise shovel hatted and long robed, taking their afternoon stroll, watched from behind by elders, as though they were state prisoners—long-bearded, slouched-hat artists with camp stools and portfolios under their arms—dogs, monkeys, and hand organs, donkeys again loaded with all sorts of wares, Neapolitan Orange Venders, fishermen, screaming at the top of their extraordinary lungs—smells of all shapes and colors—as palpable to feeling as to nose, in fact what is there not that is queer and ancient and cheesy and fishlike and outlandish, mixed up with picturesque and beautiful and stately and venerable objects, in these narrow old Roman streets? It needs a more graphic pen than mine to convey to one who has never been in Italy, the oddity and strangeness of almost every thing he meets.

ORIGIN OF THE SISTERS OF MERCY.

In a sermon preached by Bishop Hughes, on the occasion of a young lady's taking the black veil, he gave the following account of the origin of the order of the Sister's of Mercy:—

"It was about the year 1815, that a girl of very respectable family in Dublin was left an orphan, and adopted by an aged couple, who were members of the Society of Friends. She was a beautiful and highly accomplished girl, and used to spend a great part of her time in reading to these people from such books as fell in her way. She was a member of the Established Church of England. Her mind generally turned on books of devotion, mercy, and benevolence. After a while doubts began to arise in her mind with regard to religion, and finally, after much reading and thinking, she became a Catholic by conviction! But this had no influence with regard to the feelings of the aged couple towards her. They said they loved their dear adopted daughter, and would leave her all their property, which amounted to thirty or forty thousand pounds sterling, because they knew she would make no bad use of it. At last they were brought over themselves to the Catholic faith, and died in that belief. This young girl was therefore left alone. But instead of coming out into the world, and mingling with its pleasures and gayeties, she sought a school in an obscure part of the city, composed of children that she had gathered from the lanes and bye-ways of that city. She was the first who founded the order of the Sisters of Mercy, and when she died, in 1840, seven years ago, she left all her poperty to this institution."

AMBITION.

"I am weary," said the aspiring Cornelia, "of being called Scipio's daughter. Do nobly, my sons, and men shall style me the mother of the Gracchi!"

It is indeed a blessed thing to be a mother, when you are the mother of children distinguished for their goodness. Children grown to maturity, who are eminent for their intellectual and moral acquisitions, marked among men for the expression of noble thoughts and the performance of noble deeds, reflect honor on her who gave them birth. She lives in them. Her character shines in their glory.

Mothers, what shall be your children? Catch the spirit of the Roman matron, and chastening this spirit, by the pure spirit which is from above—baptizing it into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost—burn with an inextinguishable ambition of being the mothers of Christian sons and daughters—sons and daughters who shall be blessings to the church and the world—and receive the plaudit, "Well done, good and faithful servants," in the presence of an assembled universe! These are jewels indeed, whom the Saviour acknowledges to be such, and sets in his crown to sparkle there forever. Shall those now your little ones, so shine in bliss and glory? We hope, we pray, that they may.

PREPARATION FOR DEATH.

When you lie down at night, compose your spirits as if you were to sleep till the heavens be no more. And when you awake in the morning, consider that new day as your last, and live accordingly. Surely that night cometh, of which you will never see the morning, or that morning of which you will never see the night, but which of your mornings or nights will be such, you know not. Let the mantle of worldly enjoyments hang loose about you, that it may be easily dropped when death comes to carry you into another world. When the corn is forsaking the ground, it is ready for the sickle; when the fruit is ripe, it falls off the tree easily. So when a Christian's heart is truely weaned from the world, he is prepared for death, and it will be more easy for him. A heart disengaged from this world is a heavenly one, and then we are ready for heaven, when our heart is there before us. [Boston.

An Example.—Cyrus had taken the wife of Tigranes, and asked him what he would give to save her from servitude. He replied, all that he had in the world, and his life into the bargain. Cyrus, upon this, generously restored her, and pardoned what had passed. All were full of his praises on this occasion, some commending the accomplishments of his mind, others, those of his person. Tigranes asked his wife "whether she did not greatly admire him?" "I never looked at him," said she. "Not look at him! Upon whom, then, did you look?" "Upon him," she replied, "who offered his own life to redeem me from slvavery."

This charming example should be copied into our behaviour in the house of God, where we should behold and contemplate the beauties and perfection of that blessed person alone, who actually did give his life a ransom for all.

[Bishop Horne.

We have high authority for the opinion that perfect loveliness is only to be found where the features, even when most beautiful, derive their peculiar charm from sweetness and gentleness of disposition, which the countenance expresses.

SEPARATION AND SECESSION.

Some good people are easily frightened with the idea of separation and secession among the churches. The New School General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, in 1846, went so far as to declare, that "separation and secession among the churches and their members, are not the methods God approves and sanctions for the reformation of his church." But we believe a candid examination of history will show that this is a mistaken notion, and that separations are invariable, if not indispensable attendants upon reformation. Take the Waldenses as an illustration. Their entire history for a dozen centuries is little else than a history of separation and secession, persevered in with unparalleled tenacity and boldness. They may be found under a variety of titles, such as Novatians, Donatists, Paulicians, Cathari, Paterines, etc., but they are still the same people, ever pursuing the truth, and never afraid to withdraw from those who either reject it or hold it in unrighteousness. Throughout the dark ages they were the conservators of pure religion. They were exposed to every species of persecution which could be invented, and thousands of them perished by violent hands or in dens and caves of the earth. Still they persevered in rejecting the dogmas of Romanism, and steadfastly maintained the simple faith of the gospel. God smiled upon and prospered them, and now the world admires their Christian valor and heroism. Yet more notorious separatists and seceders than these same Waldenses, never had a place upon the face of the earth. It is a mystery to us how any person acquainted with their history, and especially any person who recognizes the hand of Providence in it, can assert that "separation and secession are not the methods which God approves and sanctions for the reformation of his church." Good men of old were commanded to come out from among the unfaithful, and be separate. There has never been a time since the gospel was proclaimed when this command would not apply to them. All the existing denominations—the Presbyterians, the Baptists, the Methodists—are monuments of secession. Those who acknowledge that these denominations are an improvement upon the state of things which preceded them, ought to be slow to denounce secession. But perhaps all that the General Assembly meant was, that separations and secessions from the Presbyterian Church—or that branch of it to which the Assembly belongs—are not the methods God approves for the reformation of his Church! No doubt they think so; but the promulgation of the doctrine does not strike us as indicative of a very earnest desire for the investigation of the foundation upon which their denomination is built. For our part, we are not particularly afraid of secession. We think there is much more reason to fear from the tenacity with which religious men, particularly in the popular churches, cling to their time-honored dogmas and practices, which a little candid investigation would show to be not only unscriptural but unprofitable.

FACTS CONCERNING SOUTHERN SLAVERY.

A correspondent of the New York Observer, who has been in the habit of visiting the South occasionally for the last twenty years, has collected a variety of facts to show that important changes are taking place in public sentiment at the South relative to slavery. He says that the time has been when only a few southern men were accustomed to think of slavery as an evil, whereas it is now generally acknowledged to be a sore and dangerous evil. Once it was a law of Louisiana, that "no black man should presume upon an equality with the whites;" but now they may be seen together in the same church, counting-room, and stage-coach, shaking hands and conversing familiarly. Indeed, they are frequently to be met with in ecclesiastical bodies, taking part in their deliberations, or seated with their white brethren at the same domestic table—circumstances which would have produced a mob twenty years ago, but are now looked upon with approbation. At one time the black man was regarded as incapable of performing any but the most menial services; but now it is a common thing to find him employed in the most curious and difficult branches of the mechanic arts, or standing at the desk of his master, keeping his books, and carrying on his correspondence. The time has been when public sentiment united with the law in prohibiting the education of the slave; but now, although the letter of the law stands, public sentiment is in favor of letting every man do as he pleases about educating those under him. Again, it was the settled conviction at the South twenty years ago, that white laborers could not endure the climate, and that the labor of blacks was therefore necessary; but now this notion is refuted by the thousands and tens of thousands of Irish and Germans who are scattered throughout the South, and may be seen every where, rolling cotton bales or hogsheads of sugar, driving hacks or drays, and actually supplanting the blacks in many departments of labor. Finally, many large planters at the South are coming to the conclusion, that they can make more money than they now do off their plantations, by cutting them up into small farms, erecting little cottages, and renting them to families of emigrants, they bringing to the sugar-houses a certain amount of cane annually for the rent.

The foregoing are given by the Observer's correspondent as specimens of the changes going on—changes which, he thinks, will sooner or later compel slaveholders to inquire, not how they can keep their slaves, but how they can get rid of them. If these statements can be relied upon, we agree with the writer, that there is hope for the slave, and much to encourage the hearts of his friends. But how he can see in these facts, as he pretends to see, an argument for colonization in Africa, is a mystery to us. If the slaves at the South, under such changes of public sentiment as he says are going on, are becoming good mechanics, bookkeepers, and clergymen, mingling freely with the whites in all the avocations of life, surely there is no occasion to transport them across the ocean to a benighted and unhealthy country for the sake of getting rid of them. They may safely be allowed to go free here, and will be sure to take care of themselves much better than they are now taken care of.

FORCED WORSHIP OF THE HOST.

Some time ago, a statement was made by letter-writers, that a portion of the American troops had been compelled, by an order from the Military Governor of Jalapa, to kneel to the Catholic host when carried along the street. This statement, doubted by many, and denied by a few, was soon forgotten. But a returned officer of a company of Philadelphia Rangers, declares that the statement was true. The orders were issued to the officers of the guard and to the officer of the day, Col. Roberts, of the second regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers. Both regulars and volunteers, officers and men, were compelled to obey the order at the peril of their lives! As the host passed by, the men were brought to present arms, then dropped to one knee, the bayonet falling to the ground, the butt of the musket reversed, under the right arm, while the left hand lifted the cap from the head and hung it upon the cock of the musket! The men were during the whole morning drilled to this ceremony by the officer of the guard. The men protested. The officer of the guard replied, 'My orders are to drill you to the performance of this duty. If you refuse to perform it, you know the consequences.' Colonel Roberts kneeled down with the rest. If this story be true, as it certainly has the appearance of being, it is quite time that the question was raised, whether citizens forfeit their rights of conscience by enlisting in the army.

THE WAY TO STOP THE WAR.

David Hale, the senior editor of the Journal of Commerce, a man who is supposed to share in the secrets of the present administration, has come out over his own signature against the origin and prosecution of the war with Mexico. The following paragraph from his letter will show in what way he thinks we are most likely to get out of the difficulty. If the editors of all the leading newspapers of the country would take the same ground, who can doubt that a speedy cessation of hostilities would be witnessed?

"In the midst of the dangers which surround us, there is but one clear way of either sound morality or sound policy. It is to come out of the difficulty by the same path through which we entered it; in short, to abandon the war, to call home our young men, and leave Mexico whole and entirely to her own management, and ourselves to the full enjoyment of the boundless prosperity which Providence bestows upon us. The cry, No more appropriations for the war, must go up from all parts of the nation. It is the only cry that can place us in safety. To express opposition to the war, without declaring that the war is to be abandoned; to oppose it, and still vote supplies for it, is only to support the administration in carrying it on. No man in the nation would be more relieved than the President by seeing an end of the war. If I understand his feelings, he would have been happy if Congress had refused appropriations at their last session. But no one dares to take the responsibility of recommending an abandonment of the war. What a disgrace it implies upon the Christianity of our country!! The President recommended the war, and Congress, afraid of the people, voted it. He points out the means of carrying it on, and they vote the men and money through fear of the people. In my judgment the President and Congress underrated the intelligence and morality of the people. Let the people speak, then, and undeceive their rulers. Let them know that they stand at the head of a nation, not of military rowdies, but of Christian men, full of the wisdom of Peace and Good Will. At any rate, the tide must be turned by the people, and it can only be done by a bold and loud demand that the war should be abandoned. NO MORE APPROPRIATIONS FOR WAR!! COME AWAY!! LET MEXICO ALONE!! must be proclaimed through the land. Let no man call himself a friend of peace who is not willing to take this attitude. All other opinions are, upon the whole, in favor of war. But whatever my countrymen may please to do or say, I do not intend to live or die with any of the blood-stains of this war upon me.

DAVID HALE."

The Church in Persia, N. Y.—Eld. Ray Green informs us, that the church in Persia, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., which has been for some time past in a very low state, is now in an improved condition. Four persons have recently been added to the church, and two have embraced the Sabbath. At Clear Creek, also, some eighteen miles distant, the prospect is encouraging.

The Leland Family Meeting.—Henry Leland was one of the army of regicides who sought an asylum in America during the Commonwealth of England. His lineal descendants have been for some time past making great preparations for a family meeting to erect a monument to his memory. The meeting took place at Sherburne, Mass., about three weeks ago, and was attended by nearly 1,500 persons, from the east, west, north, and south. Services were held in the meeting-house, where an eloquent address was delivered "to the kindred of Henry Leland," upon the perpetuity and importance of individual influence, by Rev. Baron Stow, one of the family. Afterwards the assembly gathered around the place chosen for the monument, where another address was delivered, also by a member of the family, and the monument was let down into its bed of granite. The procession was then formed, and proceeded to a large tent, where a collation was provided, the disposing of which, together with various toasts and speeches, closed the exercises in honor of Henry Leland.

Shameful.—The Washington Union publishes a notice of the commitment to jail, as a runaway slave, of a negro woman, who calls herself Ann E. Hodges. She is about 22 years of age, and says she is free, having served her time out with a Mr. Benjamin Daltey, of Southampton, Va. She has two scars on her left leg, near the knee, one on her left wrist, and one on the point of her breast bone. The owner is required to come forward and prove her, or she will be sold for her prison expenses, as the law directs. So it seems that a woman who claims to be free, may be seized, upon bare suspicion, imprisoned for a while, and then, without any proof that she is a slave, sold into a slavery worse than death. While such things are done in the city of Washington, the Capital of the United States, who can wonder that our boasts of freedom are held in derision by intelligent foreigners.

Missionary Prospects in Siam.—Zion's Advocate publishes a letter from Mr. Jencks, missionary to Siam from the State of Maine. He sailed first to Macao, China, where he arrived on the 6th of October last. He had an opportunity of seeing considerable of China before embarking for Bangkok; which was on the 3d of November—the voyage occupying a fortnight. Riots in Canton he speaks of as being frequent, and questions whether there will be any great change for the better very soon. The city is closed against missionaries as well as other foreigners. Hong Kong, he says, is a British town, and an expensive place, and doubts whether it is more favorable than Canton for missionary operations; but neither of them appear to him as encouraging as Bankok.

◆

Return of a Missionary from China.—Dr. Devan, who was for a while stationed at Canton in connection with the Baptist Mission, is daily expected to reach New York by the ship Houqua. Ill health is the cause of his return. He had become quite familiar with the dialect of Canton, and was beginning to point the followers of Confucius to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. Under such circumstances, it was almost as bad as death to be obliged to relinquish the field. But the advice of the missionary band and the resident physicians, has prevailed with him to return to his native land, where he will no doubt receive a warm welcome.

Baptism at Rangoon.—In a letter to a female friend at Utica, says the Baptist Register, Mrs. Judson thus alludes to a baptism at Rangoon:

"The last time the Doctor baptized was in Utica, and there were crowds of lookers on. Now the only spectator is one of the assistants; and they have gone away to a tank seldom visited. A public baptism would send us from the country, if nothing worse, in double quick step, and expose the candidate to every kind of persecution, which might even result in death. I should be very sad at the strange contrast between the present scene and that nine months ago, but I am too much rejoiced at there being any body to baptize."

Religion among the Cherokees.—A letter from Rev. Evan Jones, dated July 12, and published in the Macedonian, gives the following account of prospects among the Cherokees:

"The friends of our blessed Redeemer will, no doubt, sincerely rejoice to hear that the sacred influences that have been graciously shed on our feeble labors, in past years, have not been altogether withdrawn. Our brethren have received and baptized, since the 20th of April last, fifty-two Cherokees, on the profession of their faith in Jesus."

◆

Noble Example.—We learn from the Boston Whig, that Mrs. Farwell, of Cambridge, Mass., recently deceased, left her entire property, some $30,000, to the Baptist Board of Missions and the Newton Theological Seminary. It is stated that Mrs. Farwell, with her husband, the late Deacon Farwell, gave for benevolent objects, during their lives, equal to $100,000.

The New Hymn Books are now in the hands of the binder, and will be turned out complete at a rapid rate. Several hundred copies will be taken to the Anniversaries next week. It is hoped that the churches in central and western New York, particularly those in which only a few copies are wanted, will make arrangements to receive them at that time.

Eld. James L. Scott requests his correspondents to address him hereafter at Berlin, Rensselaer Co., N. Y.

Wealth of Harvard College.—The New Haven Journal says that the bequests made to this institution are enormous. In the annual report of the overseers of the institution, we notice not less than nineteen bequests, which average more than $20,000 each! The available funds of the College, given for specific purposes, the interest of which is used, exceed six hundred thousand dollars! The Law Department has funds exceeding $40,000, and the Theological School more than $80,000! This opulence is the result of individual liberality of citizens of Massachusetts.

Foreign Missions.—The Missionary Herald for September states the amount of donations and legacies, received by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions during the month of July, to be 21,776 dollars. Total receipts for the year ending July 31, 1847, 209,365 dollars. This is a deficiency, as compared with the receipts of 1846, of about 50,000 dollars. The expenditures of the past year have been 264,783 dollars; and the Board has entered upon the current financial year with a debt of 30,000 dollars.

◆

D. D's.—The Journal of Commerce says that one college has turned out five pair of "D. D's." the present season; and as the 100 colleges in the country would at the same rate yield an aggregate of 500 pair in a single year, suggests the propriety of dubbing all the clergymen in the United States "D. D.," without distinction of sect. This would satisfy all, and leave no room for suspicion of favoritism. And what a glorious country we should be, with 25,000 or 30,000 Doctors of Divinity among us.

Return of a Missionary.—Rev. Daniel B. Bradley, who has spent the last 13 years as a missionary of the A. B. C. F. The children are all between the ages of three and eleven years.

Benefactions of the Wealthy.—The Boston Chronotype publishes a list of Peter G. Stuyvesant's benefactions to the various benevolent Societies, and appends the following timely and suggestive remarks:—

"How this benevolent millionaire came to think of it to leave just one-tenth of one per cent of all his estate to these benevolent institutions, does not appear. Probably he attached to them a value, compared with other things, corresponding to this per centage. If a man worth $1,400 should in his will leave 50 cents to the Bible Society, 10 cents to the Tract Society, 30 cents to the Institution for the Blind, and 50 cents to an Orphan Society, it would be considered rather queer, but it would be precisely proportioned to what has been done by Mr. Stuyvesant. Millionaires appear to be blessed either with small souls or small knowledge of arithmetic beyond addition. If a man worth but $2,000 in the world gives $50 to some public object, it is not thought worth making a very great fuss about—but if, being worth $2,000,000, he gives $50,000, the universal newspaper press is expected to go into ecstacies—and for the rarity of the thing it very well may."

WRITTEN COVENANT AND ARTICLES OF FAITH.

Bro. Hull,—It is with pleasure that I respond to your kind letter in the Recorder of August 26. Perhaps, if we understood each other more perfectly, we should be agreed touching this point. I think you are not in favor of those formularies called articles of faith, or creeds; I mean, in favor of them as they exist, and are used, when they designate, and give identity to, a thousand splits, fragments, parties and sects, each disjointed from Christ's otherwise beauteous Church; whilst each sect, with its own peculiar creed for a foundation, arrogantly proclaims itself the true Church. I think you are in favor of faith—living, practical, good-works-begetting faith—wherein ALL that God has thought of sufficient importance to reveal or record, is of sufficient importance to demand our credence. Have I judged rightly? Can we, or can we not, meet upon this mountain of truth? We ought. But methinks I hear you object, that in your last letter you make certain allegations which, if true, would seem to prevent so desirable a consummation. This brings us properly to a review of your letter. I have read it with care. At first I almost thought that I had fairly become a trespasser against you, my brother, and against truth, my guide. But I soon became convinced that what you had assumed could not be sustained, nor stand the test of sound criticism. Whether I have misapprehended you or not, is of no importance to the question at issue. The negative of the question I am perfectly willing to discuss. Will you meet me on the question? I have proved, and will continue to bring additional proof, that it is not proper for churches to have a written covenant and articles of faith.

But to your letter. I will not pronounce it to be replete with instances of getting away from the question, nor with cunning sophistry. This is unnecessary.

1. After an interval of six months, you deem the question of sufficient importance to introduce it again to the Recorder, when our early correspondence is mostly forgotten; and then charitably conclude your epistle by saying, that "the subject is not worthy the room it occupies." Consistency, thou art a jewel! You, my brother, wrote the first article, and evidently wish to write the last—not per argument, but per force. You seem to understand the saying of Solomon, "He that is first in his own cause seemeth just, but his neighbor cometh and searcheth him out."

2. You disclaim all ambiguity. If at one time saying that you think that a written covenant and articles of faith are proper, and that we may have them, and at another time that you do not advocate the enforcement of man-made creeds and human formularies, is not ambiguous, it is at least very uncertain of signification. But again, you are "in favor of them, only let them be gospel-wise." How are we to know that they are gospel-wise? This position is full of ambiguity, or I know not the meaning of the word. The Methodist, Presbyterian, and Roman Catholic, all profess that theirs is "gospel-wise." The representatives of five hundred others step forward, and each of these conflicting witnesses proclaims his to be the only "gospel-wise;" all the rest are wrong. Last of all, Bro. Hull may be seen lugging his along at six months' intervals, and it of course is "gospel-wise." PROVE that articles of faith and creeds are in accordance with the spirit of the Gospel, the genius of Christianity, which says, "Call no man master," or "Rabbi," or Father, or Pope. "Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ." 1 Cor. 3: 11. "Upon this rock will I build my church." Matt. 7: 24 and 16: 18. Until you can reconcile your creeds with these and numberless other passages of Scripture, and the laws of MIND, to qualify yourself behind a convenient "gospel-wise," is an armor of war which will melt away before the scorching rays of truth. To discover the sophistry of the position, look at its parallel in the following paraphrase on Phil. 2: 27—"You need not let your conversation be as becometh the gospel of Christ, neither stand ye fast in one spirit, with one mind, neither strive together for the faith of the Gospel; only converse, stand and strive gospel-wise." Gospel-wise makes all the wrong right, does it not? Or this—Wrong is proper, only let it be right-wise. How convenient!

3. Infidels do not object to our differences, but to their being written authoritatively, in infallible but contradictory creeds. This objection to creeds amounts to something. See, if you please, Volney's Ruins, an infidel work, p. 94. In his problem of religious contradictions, each creed is represented, speaking of itself, as crying out, "None but ours are true; all the rest are false." Infidel replies, "Be it so, but if they contradict each other, who shall reconcile them?" If you are not satisfied, read for yourself. Human opinions may change and differ on the same subject, on every subject; on religion, on morals even, the same mind may vary its opinion, according to the evidence of truth presented. Not so a creed. However false, a creed has no mind to change. It cannot compromise with or assimilate to truth; but, if false, it is immutably false. Now, says the infidel, "Pray tell which of your multitudinous, contradictory, infallible, and unchangeable witnesses, must I believe?" You reply, "We may take our choice." Suppose you a judge would thus reply to his jury, if a number of witnesses testifying of the same thing contradicted each other? The same objection, based upon the same premises, is found in Thomas Payne's Age of Reason. When Campbell and Owen met to discuss the evidences of Christianity, Mr. Owen offered the same objection. Had Mr. Campbell attempted the defense of creeds in the Christian system, he could not have triumphed over the wily infidel. See Campbell & Owen's Debate. The Church was the exclusive vicar of God. She must have the tonnage and poundage of all free-spoken truth. To accomplish this end, and establish her dogmas (creeds) she burnt men, beginning with Priscillian and the six Gnostics in the fourth century, at Tours, and ending, no one knows where, or when, or with whom. It had such zeal for the "unity of (articles of) the faith," that it put prophets in chains, and asked the sons of God if they were greater than Jacob. It made belief take the place of life. See Parker on Religion, p. 429. "For it must needs be that offences come, but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh." Matt. 18: 7.

4. To prove that it is more our duty to believe some of God's truths than others, great truths rather than small ones, you quote 1 Cor. 13: 13—"Now abideth faith, hope, and charity, these three, but the greatest of these is charity." Faith, hope, and charity, are Christian graces, not truths of God; and if they were truths, I do not dispute that some truth is greater than other, but this does not argue that we have a right to say to God, "This, thy little truth, 'one talent,' we will hide; but this, thy great truth, 'ten talents,' we will put out to usury." You cannot well hold to charity and the creed at the same time; they are opposed in principle. "Thou canst not serve God and Mammon." The reverse of charity is true of the creed. Articles of faith behave themselves unseemly, they seek their own aggrandizement, are easily provoked, think evil, rejoice in iniquity, but not in truth, (all truth,) have little knowledge, are not gospel-wise, shall vanish away. 1 Cor. 13: 4—8. Again, paying tithes of mint, annis, and cummin is not a lesser truth, whilst judgment, mercy, and faith are greater truths! They are acts. Ought the latter to be done? "Leave not the other undone."

5. I have less to do with "Inquirer" than with "Answer," my brother; you perceive, therefore, why I am not so anxious to end the controversy as yourself. "Come, let us reason together?"

6. James says truly, "I will show you my faith by my works;" but you want a creed to show your faith by. Agree with James, if you can.

7. The manner in which human formularies preclude the right of private judgment is plain enough. If a man would join a church having a creed, he has his articles of faith ready "cut and dried." He does not compose, and he must not oppose them, but adopt them as they are, or God's house, the Lord's table, and kindred privileges, are not for him.

8. With reference to your handsome allusion to Balaam and his donkey, and to Ahab, what reason have you to suppose that these are less true than the thunderings of Sinai, or the groanings of Calvary. That Sinai and Calvary are the greatest truths, I doubt not. What if the waters of Abna and Pharper were better than the little streams of Israel? Proud Naama, must dip in Jordan. So I think you may find the smallest truths to be important. Hoping that in truth God "will confirm us unto the end, that we may be blameless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ," is the prayer of your brother in faith,

Jas. Summerbell.

Plainfield, N. J., Aug. 29, 1847.

General Intelligence.

FIVE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Caledonia reached Boston on Thursday of last week, bringing European news to Aug. 19, of which we give a summary below.

A serious depression has taken place in the grain market since the departure of the steamer of the 4th—only occasionally arrested by broken weather. The certainty of a bountiful harvest at home, coupled with the continued large imports of foreign breadstuffs forced upon the market by the necessities of holders, must even exercise still stronger depressing influence upon the trade.

The money market, owing to a variety of causes, has become seriously depressed since advices per Cambria. The pressure continues to effect all branches of trade with unrelaxed severity, forcing prices downward, and necessarily limiting operations to the smallest possible scale.

The political aspect of France is threatening enough. A fierce contest is waging between the Government and the Opposition press. The latter charges Ministers with corruption and the failure of the financial administration.

The affairs of Spain still continue in a very embarrassed state. The Queen has placed the King under complete surveillance, and has done everything to destroy his influence—short of imposing personal restraints upon him. An attempt was lately made to destroy General Serrano, the reputed paramour of the Queen, by sending a 'petard' to him through the office.

In Switzerland the federal diet has required the dissolution of the Catholic Sundenbund as being hostile to the general welfare.

The accounts from Italy are various; the progress of liberal opinions, particularly in the Papal States, is viewed with great alarm by both France and Austria.

Frauds on Travelers.—The Albany Evening Journal tells the sorrowful tale of two Scotch boys, of the ages of 13 and 15 years, modest and ingenuous looking lads who sailed from Aberdeen to join their mother at Buffalo, their father having deceased. After a tedious passage of some forty or fifty days, they landed at Boston, having escaped the dangers of the sea, but not destined to be so fortunate as to the land-sharks that awaited them on shore. The vessel was boarded by a swindler named Ellis, who extorted $18 from the lads, giving them a ticket purporting to be good for a passage to Buffalo. The ticket was repudiated at Albany, where they were obliged to pay between $4 and $5 more before they could proceed. The fair and regular price for sending both these boys through from Boston to Buffalo, in the manner in which they were sent from Boston, would have been $7 80.

☞ We frequently hear of persons who purchase tickets in New York for the railroad or canal west from Albany. They always get cheated. There is but one right way to do the business, and that is to purchase your steamboat tickets on board the boat, your railroad tickets at the regular office of the road, and your packet tickets on the packet. Following this advice will save all extra expense, and secure the best accommodations.

An Indian Prophetess.—The Cherokee Advocate says that a young girl of the Creek Nation recently fell into a trance, and has since been prophesying to the tribe. She says that while in this inanimate state she held communion with invisible spirits, who learned her a song, which she sings with great beauty and effect. She has predicted one or two deaths which have come to pass, and told, from her own feelings, of a murder, at the very time it was committed, at a distance of several miles from her home. She has also purchased her burial clothes, foretold at what time her death would take place, and certain signs which would then be seen, and from which the world could judge of the sincerity of her professions and the truth of her revelations. People from all sections are flocking to see her. There are many who consider her case a remarkable one, and who, believing in her inspiration, have become alarmed and forsaken the error of their ways.

The Slave Trade.—The National Era of Sept. 2d, says that last Thursday forenoon, at 11 o'clock, a coffle of slaves, to the number of eighty-five, was marched from this city, across the Long Bridge over the Potomac, for the South. They consisted of men, women, and children; the men chained together; some of the women carrying children, walking with them; other women and children riding in two wagons which accompanied the train. Some were weeping; many were ragged; nearly all were barefoot; one was playing a fiddle—a not unfrequent accompaniment of such scenes!

The coffle, we presume, was chiefly made up of slaves purchased from the surrounding country in Maryland, which seems as if emptying its slaves wholesale into the "far South."

It is but two weeks since we had occasion to notice the departure of another coffle of one hundred slaves by the same route!

The Annexation of Texas with Slavery is producing its legitimate fruit.

Important Abolition Movement.—The N. Y. Journal of Commerce says that letters received here by the Caledonia, from unquestionable sources, announce that, on the 28th of July last the King of Denmark issued a decree declaring that all persons who should thereafter be born in his dominions, should be BORN FREE; and that all persons in servitude in his dominions on the 28th of July last, and remaining so on the 28th of July, 1859, shall then be absolutely free, without compensation to the owners. In the negotiation with the colonies which preceded the issuing of this decree, he offered them the alternative of three years with a compensation of $60 per head for each slave, or twelve years without any compensation, and they chose the latter. Denmark has three small islands in the West Indies, viz. St. Croix, St. Thomas, and St. Johns. St. Croix contains about 30,000 slaves. St. Thomas and St. Johns perhaps 5,000 more.

SUMMARY.

The St. Louis Union has information from a person directly from the scene of outrage, that the anti-Mormons in Lee county, Iowa, between Charleston and Montrose, have been engaged in stoning the houses of the Mormons who reside there. They made an attack upon the house of Mr. Hatch, a revolutionary soldier. At the time of the attack, the old gentleman and his wife were in bed; he arose, requested his wife to be still, took his rifle, and went out to look after the assailants. Mrs. Hatch became uneasy, also got up, and went out. The old gentleman saw her in the dark, and supposing her to be one of the assailants, fired at and killed her instantly, the ball taking effect in her side.

The Onondaga Standard annonnces the death of E. Sherman Keeney, Esq., editor of the Skeneatelas Democrat, on Friday last,—his death having been caused solely by over application to mental and physical labor. His constitution was naturally feeble, and sunk under the weight of his necessary duties as editor, publisher, compositor and pressman, added to the labor of compiling a history of Mexico, a work upon which he was engaged at the time of his death. He was 30 years of age, and has left a wife and two children to mourn his loss.

During the month of August the number of emigrants arriving here has been as follows:—From Great Britain 8,241; France, 4,476; Bremen, 1,696; Hamburg, 630; Belgium, 1,114; Holland, 605; Norway and Sweden, 100; all other parts, 242. Total, 17,264. This is a very large number. It is a fact worth relating, that of the immense emigration this year, a larger number come with money, and go immediately to the West, than ever.

A correspondent of the New-York Journal of Commerce, writing from Vermont, states that there are in Addison county, in that state, over one hundred thousand good sheep that must be driven to other states or killed for their skins before winter, on account of the scarcity of fodder, owing to the deficiency of the hay crop and the destruction by grasshoppers.

The family of Mr. William Gorham, at Troy, consisting of himself, wife and child, contracted the ship fever from a family of emigrants whom he received into his house a few days since. Mr. G. was seized with delirium, and supposing his wife to be dead, started out to make arrangements for the burial, and fell dead in the street.

The St. Louis Republican of the 25th Aug. says: The telegraph has been fairly put in operation to Cincinnati, and last night's mail brought us the steamer's news and dates from New York to the evening of the 20th—four days from New York! When the connection is made to Louisville, we shall communicate with New York in three days; and, so soon as that wonder is accomplished, we must have the wires put on to St. Louis, and then our readers will be informed in the morning of all that has transpired during the previous day. Time and space will be thus annihilated!

The Louisville Journal of Aug. 27, says: We are informed that House's printing apparatus is to be attached to the battery of the electric telegraph in this city. By this arrangement the managers inform us that they will be able to furnish copies of the President's message for the newspaper offices in this city within five minutes after the reading of it by the Clerk of the House of Representatives!

Lt. Monroe, late of the second regiment of Life Guards, has been found guilty of the murder of Col. Fancett, whom he slew in a duel about four years ago. The verdict of the jury has caused considerable excitement and surprise.

Mr. Kleid, who was sent to Bogota to treat with the Government of New-Granada for the establishment of a railway across the Isthmus of Panama, has returned to France. He has completely succeeded in his mission, having obtained most advantageous conditions for the company he represented. The works will shortly be commenced.

The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser notices the death in that city by suicide, of Mrs. Mary E. Parker, who in a state of mental depression, caused her own death by taking a large dose of opium. She was about 25 years of age, and has left a husband and children in New York city.

The Newark Advertiser, giving a sketch of a recent conversational meeting, at which the subject of iron was discussed, says that iron ships were first introduced into this country by a company at Savannah in 1843, being imported from England in sections, and workmen with them, to put them together.

On Wednesday of last week, says the Amherst Express, there were mowing in the same field in Wendell, four generations of a family named Wilder, consisting of a great grand father, grandfather, father and son. The oldest was ninety-six, and the youngest ten years of age.

There is a starch factory in Lapeer Co., Michigan, which will consume 200,000 bushels of potatoes the present year. The average price paid is 10 cts. a bushel.

Mr. Terence Silby, of Massachusetts, on his way from Buffalo to Detroit, with his wife, left his state-room at night in a state of somnambulic fright, leaped overboard and was drowned.

The site for a Free Academy in the city of New York has at length been decided upon. It is at the corner of 23d street and Lexington Avenue, opposite Gramercy Park. For ten lots $25,000 is to be paid.

It is stated that in the fight between Major Lally's command and the guerillas, Captain Lagall's Company of Georgia Dragoons killed twenty-five Mexicans at one charge.

There was a fire at Potter's Hill, in Westerly, R. I., on Tuesday night last week, which totally destroyed Babcock's dye-house. Loss about $2,000; insurance, $1,000.

It is stated on good authority that the crops of corn from the North to the South of Germany are most abundant, and the harvest in many places is already completed.

In France the harvests are every where abundant, and prices of breadstuffs have declined in all parts of the country except Paris.

The Buffalo Courier says that two young men, who had been employed in the Republic newspaper, in this city, having foolishly got 'on a spree,' entered the office of that paper on Sunday afternoon, and wantonly threw three and a half pages of type, consisting of advertisements and other matter prepared for publication, into 'pi,' as it is technically termed by printers. The young men were sentenced to be each imprisoned in the county jail for three months, and to pay a fine of $10 each—to stand committed until paid. They were previously tried on a civil suit, and a verdict of $50 rendered against them, in favor of Mr. Q. Graves, the proprietor of the Republic, for the damage done him.

As a schooner, (name not ascertained,) was passing down the Connecticut on Wednesday afternoon, she was struck by lightning, and her mainmast shivered to pieces. The vessel was heavily laden with powder, from Hartford, (bound to this city,) and packed away on her deck were no less than one thousand kegs of that combustible material, and the lightning passed within four inches of one of these kegs, but fortunately did no harm.

A strange failure of an attempt to kill occurred in Baltimore on Monday. A Mr. Potts having suspected a Mr. Dorsy of improper intercourse with his wife, met him in the street, told him that he had but three minutes to live, and drawing a six-barrelled revolver, pulled every barrel, but without a single explosion, it being discovered that no barrel was capped. A struggle ensued, but the parties were separated, and Mr. Potts was committed to jail on complaint of Mr. Dorsey.

A baggage car attached to a passenger train, which left Syracuse, was discovered to be on fire when about six miles east of that place. Before the train could be stopped, the flames had made such progress that it was impossible to save the car, or any portion of its contents, which numbered about twenty packages and trunks, belonging to the passengers. The fire is supposed to have originated from a spark thrown from the smoke-pipe of the locomotive.

The steamer Washington will sail on the 24th inst., and she has a good number of passengers already engaged. The alterations in her are completed; they consist in the removal of the top hamper or houses, &c., from her deck, and the enlargement of her bilge, so that she will stand more steadily in the water. The result is that when fully loaded she will draw sixteen inches less water than before; her owners are now confident that she will make the voyage to Southampton in eleven days.

A proposition has been started in Philadelphia, to have a large iron tube, three feet in diameter, to extend from Port Carbon to Philadelphia, a distance of ninety miles, to convey coal from the mines of Port Carbon to Philadelphia. The expense is estimated at about $14,000,000. It is said there is sufficient descent to make it practicable.

Mr. Russell, editor of the Redlander, was killed in San Augustine, Texas, by Mr. Kendall, of the San Augustine Shield. A very bitter newspaper controversy had been going on between the parties for several weeks, and finally led to the shedding of blood. Report says that Mr. Kendall and Mr. Russell fired three shots at each other without taking effect, and that in a day or two after they met again, when Mr. Russell fell mortally wounded.

One day last week, the children of the Catholic School in James-st. N., Y., went on an excursion to New-Rochelle accompanied by several ladies connected with the Church. While there a number of the boys left the main party and went in bathing at some distance from it, when several were drowned. Among the lost were Michael McGowan and John Mullin.

The N. Y. Tribune says that a colored man named Peyton Hays, formerly a slave-driver in Tennessee, was on examination before Justice Downing for tying up his wife, who was formerly a slave in North-Carolina, and inflicting upon her bare skin eight lashes with a rope's end. He had provided brine and molasses to stop the bleeding. At the request of his wife, though he pleaded guilty, sentence was suspended.

The Evening Post says that it is supposed that Silas Wright had prepared before his death the address he expected to deliver before the State Agricultural Society at the next Fair; and the same paper learns that it will probably be read at Saratoga by either Mr. Van Buren or Mr. Flagg.

Louis Philippe's yacht, the Comte d'Eu, during a trial excursion on the 3d of Aug., burst her boiler. Nine men were killed, and thirteen sent to the hospital with little hopes of recovery, two of whom have since died. The Government has decided that the sons of the persons who perished by the accident shall be admitted gratuitously to the Ecole des Novices.

The Prussian Government has consulted all the Universities of the kingdom upon the question whether any inconvenience can arise from the appointment of Jews to Professorships at the Universities. That of Berlin has expressed an opinion in the affirmative.

Two patriotic Poles, Wisniowski and Kaausczinski, were executed on the 31st of July, on the scaffold. They urged the people to persevere for the liberation of Poland.

Great mortality prevails this year in Galicia among the peasants and the lower classes. In the district of Gadowiz, about 40,000 persons have died within a short time.

The Paris Constitutionnel states that the cholera is raging with intense severity among the Russian army of the Caucasus. It is added that the cholera has appeared in some of the mountain districts not under the dominion of Russia.

John A. Sutter, of Helvetia, California, advertises for two threshing machines for wheat, of a size and sufficient power for a crop of forty thousand bushels! He is one of the largest farmers in the world, and supplies the Russian traders with grain and provisions.

The Chicago Tribune says, the recent Convention held in that city, put into the pockets of the citizens from $50,000 to $100,000.

It is said in a letter from London, that Fanny Ellsler has lost 600,000 francs by the failure of a banker at Venice.

The Albany Atlas says the average rate of canal tolls per week the present season, for 12 weeks, is $150,000. At the same rates for the remainder of the season, say 16 weeks, the tolls will be $4,100,000. This would give over 1,000,000 for the public works. What is truly remarkable in connection with this large increase, and the present heavy receipts, is the fact that the average freight of a barrel of flour from Buffalo to Albany, in July, was less than it had ever been in that month, down to 1842. And in such good condition is the Erie canal, that boats make a passage from Buffalo to Albany in less time than they did in 1841, and carry double the cargo!

About a year since Boston capitalists got possession of the Michigan Central Railroad, which is now constructed from Detroit to Kalamazo, and which will terminate, it is thought, at Chicago. The stock which then cost about $75 per share is now selling for $120, an advance of $45 in one year, which is a net gain to the stockholders of $990,000, the whole number of shares being 22,000. The earnings for May were about $41,000. It is estimated that when the heavy track is laid over the road, the receipts will amount to $1,000,000 per annum, and pay a dividend of 15 per cent.

A horrible murder was committed last week near Sing Sing, N. Y., by Amos Northrop, a shoemaker, 45 years of age, on a girl named Mary Goodhart, 15 years of age. She refused to marry him, and he stabbed her with a shoe-knife so as to cause her death. He then fled to the woods, where he attempted in several ways to kill himself, first by cutting his throat, then by opening a vein in his arm, and twice by hanging. He was found alive, however, and it is thought will recover.

The Legislature of New York will reässemble at Albany on Wednesday, Sept. 8, to finish the business left undone at the late regular Session, and to effect such farther changes in our Judicial and other institutes as the two great Commissions may respectively suggest or the New Constitution may seem to render necessary.

Mr. Kendall says, that the northern troops endure the climate of Mexico better than the southern. Seger, in his history of the expedition to Russia, states that the Italian troops and those from the South of France endured the horrors of the retreat better than the more northern men.

J. A. Taplin, of Union Village, Washington County, in this State, has invented a threshing machine, which takes up little more room than a wheelbarrow, and with a Horse Power which the inventor has attached to it will thresh out one hundred sheaves in five minutes. So says the Scientific American.

Gen. Tom Thumb will be among the prominent American productions exhibited at Saratoga Springs during the approaching Great State Fair. In order to accommodate his numerous admirers, he has contracted for the erection of a building 100 feet in length expressly for his exhibitions, the building to be taken down at the end of the Fair.

The Chronotype says that a physician in Manchester, N. H., a few days ago opened the stomach of a patient, and removed several hard substances which had completely obstructed the passage from it. However singular this may seem, it is nevertheless true. The patient, we are glad to learn, is doing well, and will undoubtedly recover.

The Springfield Gazette thinks that the potato rot is more extensive than is supposed, and relates that a gentleman who had dug and put away a quantity in good order, found them fast decaying in a few days.

The Michigan Central Railroad Company are building a freight house at Detroit, of brick, 800 feet long by 400 feet wide. It will be capable of storing 100,000 bbls. of flour and 200,000 bushels of wheat.

The first cotton factory in the United States was built on the Brandywine, about four miles from Wilmington, where Dupont's lower powder mill now stands.

A whirlwind passed over the city of Schenectada, in the afternoon of August 28, prostrating trees, overturning barns, and carrying off portions of the roof of the buildings of Union College.

The Lowell Courier estimates that some fifteen hundred young women employed in the factories of that city, are now absent on summer visits to their friends.

In Stamford, Ct., on Monday, Aug. 30, the boiler of a steam engine used in the Logwood Extract Mill burst, injuring several persons so that they were not expected to survive.

MISSIONARY NOTICE.

Eld. Charles M. Lewis having accepted the invitation to labor for the Eastern Seventh-day Baptist Association, has removed to Newport, R. I., and entered upon the duties assigned him by the Board.

Those churches that have pledged contributions to sustain this mission, will see the necessity of forwarding the same to H. S. Berry, the Treasurer, at Westerly, R. I., as soon as practicable. S. S. GRISWOLD, Rec. Sec.

Hopkinton, Aug. 30, 1847.

TRACT SOCIETY NOTICE.

The Fourth Anniversary of the American Sabbath Tract Society will be held at DeRuyter, Madison Co., N. Y., on fifth day, September 16th, at 10 o'clock A. M. Auxiliary Societies, agents, and tract distributors, are requested to communicate to the Corresponding Secretary, without delay, such facts connected with the circulation of Sabbath Tracts as are calculated to show the usefulness of that field of labor. Annual Members of the Society, Auxiliary Societies, or Churches, owing or having contributions designed to be included in the Treasurer's Annual Report, are requested to forward them to the Treasurer before the 5th of September, at which time he will make up his report.

Paul Stillman, General Agent.

MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

The Fifth Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association will be held at DeRuyter, Madison County, New York, on the sixth day of the week, September 17th, at 9 o'clock A. M. Sermon by Rev. L. Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J.; N. V. Hull, of Alfred, N. Y., his alternate.

"Any person contributing one dollar annually to the funds is a member." "Societies, Churches, or Associations, may become auxiliary by contributing to its funds, and shall be entitled to one vote for every five dollars." "Each subscriber of twenty-five dollars, at one time, shall be a member for life." Churches, Societies, or Associations, would do well to make some of their members life members, by the payment of twenty-five dollars, especially the Pastors of their Churches. W. B. Gillett, Rec. Sec.

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

TOUCH US GENTLY, TIME.

Touch us gently, Time!
Let us glide adown thy stream
Gently—as we sometimes glide
Through a quiet dream!
Humble voyagers are we,
Husband, wife, and children three—
(One is lost—an angel fled
To the azure overhead!)

Touch us gently, Time!
We've not proud or soaring wings;
Our ambition, our content,
Lies in simple things.
Humble voyagers are we,
O'er life's dim, unsounded sea,
Seeking only some calm clime;
Touch us gently, gentle time! [Barry Cornwall.

A TALE OF CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

A farmer in one of the western counties of England, was met by a man whom he had formerly employed, and who again asked for work. The farmer (rather with a view to be relieved from his importunity than with any intention of assisting him) told him he would think of it, and send word to the place where the man told him he should be found. Time passed on, and the farmer entirely forgot his promise. One night, however, he suddenly started from sleep, and awakening his wife, said he felt a strong impulse to set off immediately to the county town, some thirty or forty miles distant; but why, he had not the least idea. He endeavored to shake off the impression, and went to sleep again, but awoke the second time with such a strong conviction that he must start instantly, that he directly rose, saddled his horse, and set off. On his way he had to cross a ferry, which he could only do at one hour of the night, when the mail was carried over. He was almost certain he should be too late, but nevertheless rode on, and when he came to the ferry, greatly to his surprise, though the mail had passed over a short time previously, the ferryman was still waiting. On his expressing his astonishment, the boatman replied, "Oh, when I was on the other side I heard you shouting, and so I came back again." The farmer said he had not shouted; but the other repeated his assertion that he had distinctly heard him call. Having crossed over, the farmer pursued his journey, and arrived at the county town the next morning. But now that he had come there, he had not the slightest notion of any business to be transacted, and so amused himself by sauntering about the place, and at length entered the court where the assizes were being held. The prisoner at the bar had just been, to all appearance proved guilty, by circumstantial evidence, of murder; and he was then asked if he had any witness to call in his behalf. He replied that he had no friends there, but, looking around the court amongst the spectators, he recognized the farmer, who almost immediately recognized in him the man who had applied to him for work; the farmer was instantly summoned to the witness-box, and his evidence proved, beyond the possibility of doubt, that at the very hour the prisoner was accused of committing murder in one part of the country, he was applying for work in another. The prisoner was of course acquitted, and the farmer found that, urged on by an uncontrollable impulse, which he could neither explain nor account for, he had indeed taken his midnight journey to some purpose, notwithstanding it had appeared so unreasonable and causeless. "This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes."

NUTRITIVE QUALITIES OF FOOD.

The relative nutritive and digestive qualities of the food we eat are matters which concern the health of every individual. Various experiments and analyses have been made by competent persons to determine these points, and the result of them appears to be as follows:—Wheat is the most nutritious of all substances, except oil, containing ninety-five parts of nutriment to five of waste matter. Dry peas, nuts and barley are nearly as nutritious as wheat. Garden vegetables stand lowest on the list, inasmuch as they contain, when fresh, a large portion of water. The quantity of waste matter is more than eight tenths of the whole. Only one fortieth of a cucumber is capable of being converted into nutriment. The nutritious part of the different meats varies from one fifth to one eighth of the whole. Veal is the most nutritious; mutton next; then chicken; then beef; last pork. Fruits vary between two and three tenths of nutritious matter, and their order is as follows, the most nutritious being placed first: Plumbs, grapes, apricots, cherries, peaches, gooseberries, apples, strawberries, melons. Milk contains less than one tenth of nutritious matter, as it is mainly composed of water.

Of all the articles of food, boiled rice is digested in the shortest time—an hour. As it also contains eight-tenths of nutritious matter, it is a valuable substance of diet. Tripe and pig's feet (strange to tell) are digested almost as rapidly. Apples, if sweet and ripe, are next in order. Venison is digested almost as soon as apples. Roasted potatoes are digested in half the time required by the same vegetables boiled, which occupy three hours and a half—more than beef or mutton. Stewed oysters and boiled eggs are digested in three hours and a half—an hour more than is required by the same articles raw. Turkey and goose are converted in two hours and a half—an hour and a half sooner than chicken. Roasted veal, pork and salted beef, occupy five hours and a half—the longest of all articles of food.

Co-operation of the Wife.—There is much good sense and truth in the remark of a modern author, that no man ever prospered in the world without the coöperation of his wife. If she unites in mutual endeavors, or rewards his labor with an endearing smile, with what confidence will he resort to his merchandise or his farm, fly over lands, sail upon the seas, meet difficulty and encounter danger, if he knows that he is not spending his strength in vain, but that his labor will be rewarded by the sweets of home! Solitude and disappointment enter the history of every man's life; and he is but half provided for his voyage, who finds but an associate for happy hours, while for his months of darkness and distress no sympathizing partner is prepared.

A WOMAN OF GOOD TASTE.

The following very happy and equally true sketch is from the London Quarterly Review:

"You see this lady turning a cold eye to the assurance of shopmen, and the recommendations of milliners. She cares not how original a pattern may be, if it be ugly, or how recent a shape, if it be awkward. Whatever laws fashion dictates, she follows laws of her own, and is never behind it. She wears beautiful things which people generally supposed to be fetched from Paris, or at least made by a French milliner, but which as often are bought at the nearest town, and made up by her own maid. Not that her costume is either rich or new—on the contrary, she wears many a cheap dress, but it is always pretty, and many an old one, but it is always good. She deals in no gaudy confusion of colors—nor does she affect a studied sobriety; but she either refreshes you with a spirited contrast, or composes you with judicious harmony. Not a scrap of tinsel or trumpery appears upon her. She puts no faith in velvet bands, or gilt buttons, or twisted cordings. She is quite aware, however, that the garnish is as important as the dress; all her inner borders and beadings are delicate and fresh, and should any thing peep out which is not intended to be seen, it is quite as much so as that which is. After all, there is no great art either in her fashions or her materials. The secret simply consists in her knowing the three grand unities of dress—her own station, her own age, and her own points! And no woman can dress well who does not. After this we need not say that whoever is attracted by the costume will not be disappointed in the wearer. She may not be handsome, nor accomplished—but we will answer for her being good tempered, well informed, thoroughly sensible, and a complete lady.

DIFFICULTIES OF GENIUS.

Ambrose Pare, in the time of Francis I., introduced the ligature as a substitute for the painful mode of stanching the blood after the amputation of a limb, namely, by applying boiling pitch to the surface of the stump. He was, in consequence, persecuted with the most remorseless rancor by the Faculty of Physic, who ridiculed the idea of putting the life of a man upon a thread, when boiling pitch had stood the test for centuries! Paracelsus introduced antimony as a valuable medicine; he was persecuted for the innovation, and the French Parliament passed an act making it penal to prescribe it; whereas it is now one of the most important medicines in daily use. The Jesuits of Peru introduced to Protestant England the Peruvian bark, (invaluable as a medicine,) but, being a remedy used by the Jesuites, the Protestant English, at once rejected the drug as the invention of the devil. In 1693, Groenvelt discovered the curative power of cantharides in dropsy. As soon as his cures began to be noised abroad, he was committed to Newgate, by warrant of the President of the College of Physicians, for prescribing cantharides internally. Lady Mary Montague first introduced into England small-pox inoculation, having seen its success in Turkey, in greatly mitigating that terrible disease. The Faculty all rose in arms against its introduction, foretelling the most disastrous consequences; yet it was in a few years generally adopted by the most eminent members of the profession. Jenner, who introduced the still greater discovery of vaccination, was treated with ridicule and contempt, persecuted and oppressed by the Royal College of Physicians; yet he subsequently received large pecuniary grants from government for the benefit he had conferred on his country, by making known his valuable discovery; and at the present time its observance is very properly enjoined by the whole medical profession and the legislature.

"THE UNKINDEST CUT OF ALL."

A jeweler in this city, who shall be nameless, was lately applied to by a "nice looking" man, to make a gold ring for him, having in it a blade very delicate and keen, concealed except on a narrow scrutiny, and opening with a spring. A bargain was made to finish it for thirty dollars. On the appointed day the purchaser paid the stipulated price, (which was fobbed very complacently) and with an air of high satisfaction put it on his finger. The jeweler, of course, very innocently asked what he wanted to do with such an article, to which he replied to "cut pockets open with." "Ah," replied the jeweler, doubtless in amazement, "how can you do such things with such an instrument, and not be detected?" The performer replied, that his art consisted in diverting the attention of people from every thing that looked like a design upon them—that he rubbed his forehead, adjusted his hat, &c., and that discovery came too late. He then bade him good morning, and went his way. Shortly after, the jeweler, as he walked round his counter, was accosted by his clerk—"Why! what is the matter with your pantaloons? How came you to tear them so?" "Nothing," was the answer, "that I know of. Why?" "Why, just look." When lo! his pocket was found to have been cut by the "artist," with his new instrument, and his pocket book gone, with not only the thirty dollars just paid, but four hundred besides. Verdict of the public—"Served him right." [Alb. Spec.

CAPS FOR HAY.

It was an old adage, "in peace prepare for war;" but I say, in winter prepare for summer, so I proceed. A year ago last summer I used hay caps, that is, pieces of cloth about five feet square, with a stick some eighteen inches long fastened to each corner, and spread one over every cock of hay, and the sticks inserted in the hay, which prevented the wind from blowing them off. This I did every night, and did not allow even the dew to blacken my hay. When the weather looked bad I put up my hay, sometimes when it was hardly wilted; and had it stand, at one time, seven or eight days with almost incessant foul weather, and when I opened it, the hay was completely cured to the top. All that was injured was a little near the ground, and this so little, that the hay in winter was pronounced, by good judges, first rate. All my neighbors' hay that was out, was literally spoiled, for none wore caps. I have no doubt but in that single storm fifty tons of hay were spoiled in the town of Sangerville, which would have commanded eight dollars per ton. Yes, four hundred dollars in the little town of Sangerville! [Maine Farmer.

Dog Story.—Mr. S. kept a calf tied in his yard, but the rope occasionally got untied and the calf was left loose. One day a neighbor called in and said, "Squire, I presume your calf has made his escape from the yard." Mr. Stone replied he presumed not, and inquired on what he founded his opinion. He replied, "I know your dog well, though I do not your calf. I overtook your dog near Mill Creek, with the rope in his mouth, leading a calf towards the city," (about a mile west of Mr. Stone's house.) Mr. Stone went into the yard, found the calf gone, mounted his horse, and took the road for the mouth of Mill Creek. When he had gone about half the distance, he met his trusty dog, tugging on with the rope in his mouth, leading the calf. He gave him a word of encouragement, and turned his horse and went home, leaving the dog to finish his undertaking. He had been home but a short time when the faithful dog brought the calf to the gate, and he was let in. [Cist's Advertiser.

Value of a Newspaper.—Dr. Franklin remarks that a man as often gets two dollars for the one he spends in informing his mind, as he does for a dollar he lays out in any other way. A man eats up a pound of sugar and it is gone, and the pleasure he has enjoyed is ended; but the information he gets from a newspaper is treasured up to be enjoyed anew, and to be used, whenever occasion or inclination call for it. A newspaper is not the wisdom of one man or two men; but it is the wisdom of the age, and of past ages too. A family without a newspaper is always half an age behind the times in general information; besides, they can never think much nor find much to talk about; and then there are the little ones growing up in ignorance without any taste for reading. Who, then, would be without a newspaper?

Street Sweeping Machine.—The Scientific American says that a Mr. Whitworth has invented a machine for sweeping the streets of London. It is fixed on a cart drawn by one horse and attended by one man. It has on one of the wheels a toothed wheel working into a pinion, which gives motion to a drum over which pass two endless chains, passing around also another drum, which is at the lower extremity of a light frame suspended at the tail of the machine, forming an inclined plane depending from the drum frame. These endless chains carry a series of broad brushes formed of Indian rush, very elastic and durable; they travel at a velocity depending on the speed of the horse, and sweeping on the ground with a force which is regulated by a coiled spiral spring carrying the dirt up the inclined plane into the cart.

Science for the Kitchen.—Professor Liebig, in a letter to Professor Silliman, says: "The method of roasting is obviously the best to make flesh most nutritious." But it does not follow that boiling is to be interdicted. "If a piece of meat be put in cold water, and this heated to boiling, and boiled till done, it will become harder and have less taste than if the same piece had been thrown into water already boiling. In the first place, the matters grateful to the smell and taste go into the extract—the soup in the second, the albumen of the meat coagulates from the surface inward, and envelopes the interior with a layer which is impermeable to water. In the latter case, the soup will be indifferent, but the meat delicious."

Magic Carriage Step.—The Scientific American says that a beautiful carriage step has been invented by Mr. D. Davis, of Wigmore street, London, called the Alhektobathorn (a Greek word signifying "a step not required to be touched by the hand.") These steps are constructed to be folded up beneath the body of the carriage out of the way, so neatly made as to be invisible and well protected from dirt. From this snug depository the steps are projected by the act of opening the carriage, the shutting of which returns them again to their natural place. This is undoubtedly a valuable appendage to every description of pleasure carriage. The steps are moved by a spring acted upon by the door of the carriage. We expect to hear of some of our carriage makers adopting this step soon.

Glass Pens.—Wonders will never cease. Glass is now made into all sorts of things. There is cloth manufactured in England of glass, and it has even been used as the main-spring of a chronometer, and answered well for such a purpose. But for a pen to be made of glass, who would have believed it? Yet it is so, and most excellent writing pens they are. It is well known that with a flux of lead in combination with the silicon, in right proportions, glass can be made very ductile. Those pens are now becoming not uncommon, and they are perfectly anti-corrosive by the most impure ink. [Scientific American.

A Consistent Servant.—A very good lady in Boston had in her employment a young man from the country. On a certain occasion, he was instructed to inform any company who might ring at the door, that "Mrs. —— was not at home."

One day, John made this reply to an intimate friend of the lady, who shortly went away, leaving a card and a promise to call again. As the card was handed to Mrs. ——, she said,

"John, what did you say to the lady?"

"I told her you were not at home."

"Well, John, I hope you did not laugh?"

"Oh! no, ma'am," said John, "I never laugh when I tell a lie!"

Creatures with Thousands of Eyes.—What would be thought of a quadruped whose head, with the exception of the mouth and places of juncture with the neck, was covered with two enormous masses of eyes, numbering upwards of 12,000 in each mass? Yet such is the condition of the organs of vision in the dragon-fly. In the common bee the same structure is not less apparent. The fiery eyes of many gad-flies, (Tabyni,) when presenting vivid bands of purple and green, are composed of similar lenses, and each eye contains nearly seven thousand. The ant has fifty lenses; the house fly four thousand; while above seventeen thousand have been counted in the eye of the butterfly, and more than twenty-five thousand in that of a species of beetle.
[Batterson's Introduction to Zoology.

VARIETY.

The Eaton (O.) Register says that Preble County is the greatest flax growing County in that State or the Union. This year the crop exceeds any previous one, in the quantity sown; and the yield of seed will be about an average. It is computed that 100,000 bushels of seed will be raised this year; of this quantity one-tenth will be required for home consumption, leaving 90,000 bushels for market. This, at the price at which seed now rates, 55 cents, will bring into the county the neat sum of $46,500. The flax crop, if some means of preparing the lint could be divised, would be very profitable. Lint, just as it comes from the brake, is worth $15 per ton.

The Albany Evening Journal says that a young printer named Boyington, who served his time in the office of the New-Haven Palladium, was hung a few years since in Alabama, upon a charge of having murdered a companion, with whom he was traveling. He protested his innocence to the last; but without avail. Recently the landlord, in whose house the murder was committed, confessed the crime on his death-bed! Boyington was a young man of fine talents, and prepossessing appearance, whose guilt was deemed conclusive only from the fact that he was the last person seen with the murdered man.

The London Correspondent of the National Intelligencer says that it has been calculated, by those who possessed correct materials for so doing, that not more than one book in fifteen pays the expenses of printing, and not more than one in every fifty pamphlets; that only one of about two hundred books reaches a second edition, one in every five hundred a third, and one in every thousand a fourth. He also says, that there are probably not less than ten thousand persons who live by literary labors in London, and more than double that number who strive to do so.

Cowper says:—He that slanders me, paints me blacker than I am, and he that flatters me, whiter, they both daub me; and when I look in the glass of conscience, I see myself disguised by both. I had as lief my tailor should sew gingerbread nuts on my coat, instead of buttons, as that any man should call my Bristol stone a diamond. The tailor's trick would not at all embellish my suit, nor the flatterer's make me at all richer. I never made a present to my friend of what I dislike myself.

The Medical Intelligencer states, that from a Register of the Society of Friends, or Quakers, it appears as a consequence of their temperance, that one-half of those that are born, live to the age of forty-seven, whereas, says Dr. Price, that of the general population of London, one half live only 23—4! Among the Quakers, one in ten arrive at 70 years of age; of the general population of London, only one in 40! Never did a more powerful argument support the practice of temperance and a virtuous life.

The Rev. Eustace Carey, the missionary, was one day visiting a young native convert. Inquiring as to the state of her mind, she replied, "Happy! happy! I have Christ here," laying her hand on the Bible, "and Christ here," pressing it to her heart, "and Christ there," pointing towards heaven. There was no part of the universe in which this happy Christian could be deprived of Christ, or of the enjoyment of his love and favor.

A singular custom prevails among the Sioux Indians. Whenever a white man has resided among them for the space of a month, he is required to take unto himself a wife. The chief of the band, among which he is, at the end of this time, comes to him with a young and handsome squaw, whom he must espouse and protect according to their customs, or leave the country immediately.

Chataubriand, the great writer and good man, bears the following testimony in his closing remarks to a friend:—"If I could begin my life anew, I should not write a single line, and would wish to die unknown; but I should ever be a Christian, as I always have been, and even more than I ever was. All things considered, there is but one thing in life—religion! It is religion that gives order and liberty to the world, and after life a better existence."

An Arkansas hero was lately convicted of horse stealing, and when the sentence had passed on him, he took a survey of the court-room, and gave vent to his feelings in the following manner: "Well, this is rather the briskest place I ever did see. Traveled fifteen miles this morning, stood an election, and unanimously voted by twelve men to be maintained at the public expense ten years."

Prof. Johnson, the celebrated Scotch agricultural chemist, has an interesting article in Blackwood, upon the comparative substance in fine and coarse wheat flour. He argues conclusively to show that whole meal—or flour containing the entire of the ingredients of the wheat—is not only more healthy but more profitable, than fine flour, from which the bran, &c., is excluded.

A clever thief, named Chamescot, was brought up before the Correctional Police of Paris, charged with stealing four five franc pieces. He hustled a man who had money in his hands, and contrived to get possession of the several pieces by treading on them, after having covered the soles of his shoes with cobbler's wax.

The London Lancet gives the particulars of an attorney who burnt his hands by endeavoring to extinguish the flames which had caught his bed curtains—the blisters were not broken, and the patient immersed his hands in a solution of chloride of soda in water, and wrapping his hands in lint, in the morning only one patch remained.

The Salem Observer gives the following—A dividend is the surplus, the remainder, result, end, of a transaction, divided amongst the shareholders—hence the words divide ends. An Apothecary originally carried his medicines about in jars—he was a pot carrier—and from thence came the word A pot he carries.

Some thieves in Paris dress as servants, and visit the different tradesmen, requesting certain accounts; they then dress as tradesmen, take the accounts to the parties, receive the money, and bolt.

THE DAILY NATIONAL WHIG is published in the city of Washington, every day, at three o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted, and served to subscribers in the City, at the Navy Yard, in Georgetown, in Alexandria, and in Baltimore, the same evening, at six and a quarter cents a week, payable to the sole agent of the Whig, G. L. Gillchrist, Esq., on his order. It is also mailed to any part of the United States for $4 per annum, or $2 for six months, payable in advance. Advertisements of ten lines or less inserted one time for 50 cents, two times for 75 cents, three times for $1, one week for $1 75, two weeks for $2 75, one month for $4, two months for $7, three months for $10, six months for $16, one year for $20, payable always in advance.

The "National Whig" is what its name indicates. It speaks the sentiments of the Whig party of the Union on every question of public policy. It advocates the election to the Presidency of Zachary Taylor, subject to the decision of a Whig National Convention. It makes war to the knife upon all the measures and acts of the Administration deemed to be adverse to the interests of the country, and exposes without fear or favor the corruptions of the party in power. Its columns are open to every man in the country, for the discussion of political or any other questions.

In addition to politics, a large space in the National Whig will be devoted to publications upon Agriculture, Mechanics, and other useful arts, Science in general, Law, Medicine, Statistics, &c. Choice specimens of American and Foreign Literature will also be given, including Reviews, &c. A weekly list of the Patents issued by the Patent Office will likewise be published—the whole forming a complete family newspaper.

The "Weekly National Whig," one of the largest newspapers in the United States, is made up from the columns of the Daily National Whig, and is published every Saturday, for the low price of $2 per annum, payable in advance. A double sheet of eight pages will be given whenever the psess of matter shall justify it.

The Memoirs of General Taylor, written expressly for the National Whig, are in course of publication. They commenced with the second number, a large number of copies of which have been printed, to supply calls for back numbers.

CHAS. W. FENTON,
Proprietor of the National Whig.

P. S. All daily, weekly, and semi-weekly papers in the United States are requested to insert this advertisement once a week for six months, noticing the price for publishing the same at the bottom of the advertisement, and send the paper containing it to the National Whig office, and the amount will be duly remitted. Our editorial brethren are also requested to notice the National Whig in their reading columns.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES,

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institntion, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847; and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

ANJIER AND THE ISLAND OF JAVA.

☞ The following letter from Mrs. Carpenter to Mrs. Thomas B. Brown, of New York, will be read with interest by those who have followed the missionary band thus far on their voyage. This is our apology, if one is needed, for making public what was no doubt intended simply as a private letter.

China Sea, April 2d, 1847.

My Dear Mrs. Brown,—I commenced a letter to you before we put ours ashore at Anjier, but threw it aside, and shall now write you, what had then never entered my heart to write, a description of that lovely spot. Fair tropical Island! Never was I so disappointed as in that selfsame place. A heathen isle, yet one that would do honor, as far as improvements are concerned, to many an unheathen spot. Our ship came to anchor after sunset, about three-fourths of a mile from shore; and there, spread out before us, like an enchanted picture, lay the Island of Java. Gradually rising from the shore appeared one hill above another, covered with strange trees, or well-cultivated fields, and the whole crowned with the still higher summit of Anjier hill. The quiet bay reflected the image of many a white sail, for the native fishing boats were scattered thick upon its surface, and those which were near enough to be distinctly seen, were crowded with natives, some of them making their way to our ship, eager to secure the first opportunity of monopolizing a trade with us which all desired. The color of the natives is a deeper copper than I have ever seen before. They wear only a simple cloth about the waist, with few exceptions, for I found that there were those who dressed more, and even some quite tastefully. At 9 o'clock we [passengers, nine in all] were taken ashore, the captain accompanying us. Imagine the luxury of treading on terra firma, to those who for just twelve weeks had trod no firmer foundation than the reeling decks of a wave-tossed ship. Imagine, too, the novelty of stepping from the stone-paved wharves of New York, amid the desolations of a winter which left no green thing for the eye to rest upon, to the "coral strand" of a tropical isle, crowned with the rich verdure of a tropical zone, and thronged with beings who, "in their blindness, bow down to wood and stone." This was our landing place—the coral pavement extending back for some distance, up the street, and from which we almost instinctively turned aside, to indulge ourselves a few moments beneath the deep shade of a mighty banian tree! Its size had been a subject of wonder and delight to us from the vessel, and for a moment every other thought was lost in the luxury of hiding ourselves beneath its wide-spread limbs,

> "Branching so broad and long, that in the ground
> The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow
> About the mother tree, a pillared shade,
> High over-arched, and echoing walls between."

From this delightful spot, we made our way to the Government House, where we deposited our letters, and sat for a long time, enjoying the refreshing breeze which swept through the cool mansion, with its open doors and unglazed windows, its shadowy piazza and well-furnished rooms, and listening to the various remarks which a meeting of this kind naturally excited, especially as we were there joined by another sea captain, just arrived from Rotterdam, and who, of course, had much to ask and answer on the occasion. Leaving this delightful abode, we sauntered up and down the town; now pausing in front of the "Hotel," which stood invitingly near us, and whose exterior was very fine; then stopping to admire the beauty of the Governor's residence, which we should certainly have entered, but that the Governor himself was away for the recovery of his health; thence to the market, which resembled the markets in Philadelphia, but which certainly excelled, in neatness and quietness, many, perhaps I might say any, I ever saw in America. Hundreds were sitting quietly beneath the shade of its bamboo roof, arranging their commodities, or, in the intervals of business, plaiting little bamboo baskets, or performing other little tasks, which seemed to keep all happy, and leave none idle. I cannot write you an inventory of their bills of sale, for such strange-looking marketables never met my eyes before. The animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms were well represented, and untold treasures left, which I could not arrange under either. Plantain leaves served for plates, baskets, napkins, and basins, and neatly and tastefully were they arranged. We saw many whose dresses, too, were really pretty—a neat body garment or petticoat, worn alike by all, was set off, among the ladies, occasionally, by a becoming spencer, made with skirts, and resembling much the outer coats worn by the fashionables in Broadway when we left. All wear the hair long, and done up at the back of the head; but the ladies often displayed much taste in the arrangement of theirs. One thing affected me painfully, the want of life, of enjoyment, of vivacity, which was every where apparent. There was no social chat of neighbor with neighbor, no haranguing matrons or gossiping maids, no frolicksome boys and romping girls; "buy, sell, and get gain," seemed to be the prevailing theme, from the wily speculator who boarded us long before we anchored, and who boasted that he had seen us "seven, eight miles, and said, 'that the Houqua,'" to the little child who could only hold up his tiny shells, and say, "Buy, buy." But our eyes would not linger among these. We were marveling at the well-turned streets and lanes; the bright green leaves; the turf fences, with their flower-crowned sides and tops; the strange tall trees, with their long broad leaves, and huge, crowded fruits; the cocoa tree, with its scores of nuts; the plantain, with its leaves, any one of which would have served mother Eve for an apron without sewing; the enormous spikes of crowded bananas, which looked too weighty to be sustained by ought but an iron trunk; the castor oil tree, with its richly-shaded leaves; and the orange groves, with their deep green foliage. But I cannot enumerate all; indeed there were many of which, neither by fruit, flower, or leaf, nor by any means from the natives, could we ascertain their names. There was no annoyance from beast or insect; only a few goats were quietly ranging around, or reclining on the soft green grass, and two or three horses stood here and there about the market. We scarcely saw a fly, or kindred nuisance, even in the market, the place of all others most liable, one would think, to call them together. One street through which we wandered took us a long way beside the government aqueduct, which supplies the water for ships at a dollar a cask, whatever their capacity may be.

Crossing the bridge that leads to the Fort, we saw suspended from one of its timbers a bamboo plate, on which was spread what could have been no other than an offering to some heathen god,—flesh, fruits, and various articles too numerous to mention, all carefully arranged, and apparently quite fresh from the hand of the devotee. The Fort was guarded by sentinels in full dress, displaying, by the insignia of their uniforms, the dignity of their calling, but looking far from comfortable beneath their broadcloth coats, and glittering buttons. The Fort, like every thing else, was clean, quiet, and picturesque. Even the native huts, with their bamboo walls, and thatched roofs, were entirely destitute of that heathenish cast which I had supposed inseparable from heathenism. But I shall weary you. One thing you will infer, which you may justly, that that day, our first, our only one (as yet) on heathen soil, was one never to be forgotten. It was a full, a deeply-written page, folding as it were over the blank of a three-months sea voyage, and obliterating for the time the whole space which it occupied. What but a dream is the memory of storm and sunshine, mountain waves and yawning depths, sweeping winds, and even death itself, (for death has been among us,) to the rovers on the enchanted Isle of Java? We have seen many isles since; we have threaded the Straits of Gasper as well as the Malay Sea, and are now in the open sea of China, but the memory of that day is still bright in our hearts. I will not trouble you with emotions excited. I will leave you to infer them. One thing I will say—our hearts were deeply enlisted for those poor harmless Javanese, in whose slight figures, and feminine countenances, were conspicuous those traits of mildness and simplicity which have long characterized them, and we could not but mourn over the obstacles which have hitherto prevented a permanent mission among them. Yet these too are numbered among "the isles of the sea," which shall yet "wait for the law of God," shall yet rejoice in His blessed gospel.

ANECDOTE OF A GERMAN FARMER.

In Germany, during the war, a captain of cavalry was ordered out upon a foraging expedition. He put himself at the head of his troop, and marched to the quarter assigned him. It was a lonely valley, in which one could perceive hardly anything but woods. Finding in the midst of them a small cottage, he approached, and knocked at the door, which was opened by an old and venerable man, with a beard silvered by age. "Father," said the officer, "shew me a field where I may set my troop to foraging." The old man complied, and conducting them out of the valley, after a quarter of an hour's march, came to a fine field of barley. "Here is what we are in search of," exclaimed the captain; "Father, you are a true and faithful guide." "Wait a few minutes more," replied the old man, "follow me patiently a little farther." The march was accordingly resumed, and at the distance of a mile they arrived at another field of barley. The troop immediately alighted, cut down the grain, trussed it, and remounted. The officer then said to his conductor, "Father, you have given yourself and us unnecessary trouble; the first field was better than this." "Very true, Sir," replied the good old man, "but it was not mine."

THE NEEDLE.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

What hast thou seen with thy shining eye,
Thou needle, so subtle and keen?—
"I have been in Paradise, stainless and fair,
And fitted the apron of fig leaves there,
To the form of its fallen queen.

The mantles and wimples, the hoods and veils,
That the belles of Judah wore,
When their haughty mein, and their glance of fire,
Enkindled the eloquent prophet's ire,
I helped to fashion of yore.

The beaded belt of the Indian maid
I have decked with as true a zeal
As the gorgeous ruff of the knight of old,
Or the monarch's mantle of purple and gold,
Or the satrap's broidered heel.

I have lent to Beauty new power to reign
At a bridal, and courtly hall,
Or, wedded to Fashion, have helped to bind
Those gossamer links, that the strongest mind
Have sometimes held in thrall.

I have drawn a drop so round and red
From the finger small and white,
Of the startled child, as she strove with care
Her doll to deck with some gewgaw rare,
But wept at my puncture bright.

I have gazed on the mother's patient brow,
As my utmost speed she plied,
To shield from winter her children dear,
And the knell of midnight smote her ear,
While they slumbered at her side.

I have heard in the hut of the pining poor
The shivering inmate's sigh,
When faded the warmth of her last, faint brand,
As slow from her cold, and clammy hand,
She let me drop—to die!" [Union Mag.

THE MOTHER OF JOHN WESLEY.

Of the mother it is difficult to speak without panegyric. Singularly clear and commanding in intellect, she seems to have rivaled her son in her transparent sense of truth. In her powers of mind, we may best compare her with our own Mrs. Hutchinson, whose strong intellect raised such unwonted commotion amongst the fathers of New England. Her prudence and equanimity must have been most admirable, for we read that her husband, having observed that she did not say Amen to the prayers for King William, questioned her upon the subject, when she admitted that she had never done so, not regarding him as king. "Whereat he was so greatly enraged, that he mounted his horse and rode away, declaring he would never live with her as husband while she held to that opinion." The good woman busied herself with her household, and betook herself to prayer; but strongly attached to her husband as she was, we read of no imbecile complaints or misgiving, or any change of political sentiments. Susan Wesley was not the woman to lightly adopt or yield an opinion—she had known too well the sturdy arrogance of the man she loved, and his steady exercise of family authority, to hazard collisions upon this unessential point, and therefore had for years kept a submissive silence, but he at length detected the absence of her voice in the Amen of the household, and demanded the cause. She confessed the truth, and the advocate for political reform rode away as we have seen.

Fortunately King William died at the end of the year, and Samuel Wesley returned to his noble-minded wife, for the founder of Methodism as yet was not, and he was to be the first fruits of this reünion.

It will be seen from these things that the family was made up of no ordinary materials. The fine matronly woman, who gave nineteen children to the world, governed her household with wise yet energetic sway. In the absence of her husband, she was in the habit of sustaining prayer and the reading of the Scriptures in her own family, to which the neighbors upon the Sabbath begged admission, as at that time she read a sermon aloud and went through with the services of the church. This was reported to Mr. Wesley, and he wrote to her concerning it, desiring her to abstain from practices which were not in order in the church and unbecoming a woman. Hear her reply, given partly in the words of Southey:

"As she was a woman, so was she also mistress of a large family; and though the superior charge lay upon him as their head and minister, yet in his absence, she could not but look upon every soul which he had left under her care as a talent committed to her under a trust by the great Lord of all the families of heaven and earth. 'If,' she added, 'I am unfaithful to Him or to you, in neglecting to improve these talents, how shall I answer unto Him, when He shall command me to render an account of my stewardship?' The objections which arose from his own station and character, she left entirely to his own judgment. Why any person should reflect upon him, because his wife endeavored to draw people to church, and restrain them, by reading and other persuasions, from profaning the Sabbath she could not conceive, and if any were mad enough to do so, she hoped he would not regard it. 'For my own part,' she says, 'I value no censure on this account: I have long since shook hands with the world; and I heartily wish I had never given them more reason to speak against me.' As to the proposal of letting some other person read for her, she thought her husband had not considered what a people they were; not a man among them could read a sermon without spelling a good part of it, and how would that edify the rest? And none of her own family had voices strong enough to be heard by so many. After stating these things clearly and judiciously, she concluded this in reference to her own duty as a wife. 'If you do, after all, think fit to dissolve this assembly, do not tell me that you desire me to do it, for that will not satisfy conscience; but send me your positive command, in such full and express terms as may absolve me from guilt and punishment for neglecting this opportunity of doing good, when you and I shall appear before the great and awful tribunal of our Lord Jesus Christ.'" DR. CHANNING'S LAST DAYS.

The Rev. Dr. W. E. Channing, if not the father of Unitarianism in this country, was one of those most active and successful in promoting it. His polished eloquence gave him, in connection with his general refinement and high moral tone, a notoriety which none of his class enjoyed. Dr. Channing was originally orthodox, if we are rightly informed, on the fundamental doctrine of the Trinity, but gradually sunk down till he became a mere Unitarian, regarding Christ only as a highly virtuous man, and his religion only as an excellent system of ethics. With these sentiments, we suppose—we fear—he died; but we find in an instructive little volume, by the Rev. Dr. Burgess, of Hartford, Conn., a statement, which to our mind implies, that in his last days, Dr. Channing felt the chilliness and meagerness of his system, and would fain, if it had been possible, have put into it a life and power which properly belongs not to it, or to any system which does not make Christ "very God," as well as "very man." Dr. Channing died in 1842. During that year the noted Mr. Brownson, who had been a theological follower, and styled himself the spiritual son of Dr. Channing, addressed him a letter, declaring that he had discovered the hollowness of the system which they both in common held, and that it satisfied neither the claims of truth nor the wants of the human heart. What effect this warning had cannot be known; but it appears, that, attending a meeting of a society in Lenox, Mass., soon after, Dr. Channing delivered an address in which he used language, which, to say the very least, sounds strange to our ears, coming from the lips of a man of his views. As if, says Dr. Burgess, through all his negations a gleam from the heaven of truth had shot in at sunset, he said, that "the doctrine of the Word made flesh, shows us God uniting himself most intimately with our nature, manifesting himself in a human form, for the very end of making us partakers of his own perfection." "The doctrine of grace, as it is termed," he said, "reveals the infinite Father imparting his Holy Spirit, the best gift he can impart, to the humblest human being who implores it." In the concluding paragraph, he uttered what, as a rhetorical apostrophe, would be almost profane, and as a prayer would be at variance with the efforts of his life:—"Come, friend and Saviour of the race, who didst shed thy blood upon the cross, to reconcile man to man and earth to heaven!" A few days after, he died at Bennington, Vt. [Southern Churchman.

DAILY RESOLUTIONS OF LAVATER OF DURICH.

I will never, either in the morning or evening, proceed to any business, until I have first retired, at least for a few moments, to implore God for his assistance and blessing.

I will neither do nor undertake any thing which I would abstain from doing if Jesus Christ was standing visibly before me; nor any thing which I think it is possible that I shall repent, in the uncertain hour of my certain death.

I will, with the divine aid, accustom myself to do every thing, without exception, in the name of Jesus Christ, and as his disciple; to sigh continually for the Holy Ghost, and to preserve myself in a constant disposition for prayer.

Every day shall be distinguished by at least one particular wish of love.

Wherever I go, I will first pray to God that I may commit no sin there, but be the cause of some good.

I will never lay down to sleep without prayer, nor, when I am in health, sleep longer than at most eight hours.

I will every evening examine my conduct through the day by these rules, and faithfully note down in my journal how often I have offended against them.

O God! thou seest what I have here written. May I be able to read these my resolutions every morning with sincerity, and every evening with joy, and the clear approbation of my conscience.

ADVICE TO NEWLY-ORDAINED CLERGYMEN.

Make up your minds deliberately, if you mean to be faithful, to lead a life wherein hardy and venturous faith will be daily tested by calls to unflinching self-denial. Your own work is to win souls to Christ, not to produce a certain general decency and amendment in the face of society around you, but, as God's instruments, and through the power of Christ's name, to work in living souls the mighty marvel of true conversion. How painful soever be the thoughts which it excites, never lose sight of this truth, that your ministry has failed as to every soul entrusted to you, who is not under it converted to the Lord, or built up in its holy faith. And such a work must be full of toil and self-denial. The strong man armed will not allow you to spoil his house, and be free the while from molestation. And he is ever ready with his assaults and craft; unless you slumber he will not seem to sleep. Reckon, then, first, on opposition; and then, secondly, remember that in all this you will have a real work to do. Go out to visit in your parish; not because you ought to spend so much time in visiting your people, but because they have souls, and have committed to you, feeble as you are, the task of saving them, in Christ's strength, from everlasting burnings. Be real with them, strike as one that would make a dent upon their shield of harshness, yea, and smite through it to their heart of hearts. When you preach, be real. Set your people before you in their numbers, their wants, their dangers, their capacities; choose a subject, not to set yourself off, but to benefit them, as you would beg your life, or conusel your son, or call your dearest friend from a burning house, in plain, strong, earnest words. Let your sermons be no other than your own, made up of truths learned on your knees, from your Bible, in self-examination, amongst your people. And to make them such as this, spare no pains or trouble. Deal much in the great truths which the blessed God has taught us of himself; beware of always tarrying amongst the graves and corruption of our fallen, tempted state, but rise up to God and Christ and the Holy Ghost, and bear your flock with you there. To lead them for themselves indeed, through the Spirit, to believe in the person of the eternal Son, and so to stand before the Father, accepted in the Beloved—this is life eternal. [Rev. S. Wilberforce.

WILLIAM HERBERT.

"O dear, Martha," said William Herbert, in a tone of despondency, to his older sister, "I don't believe I shall ever be good."

"Why, my dear," said his sister, raising her eyes from the print which she was examining, "what has happened to discourage your attempt to-day?"

"Nothing more to-day than any other day; but somehow it seems as if I don't know how to be good; I can do my chores, and get my lessons, and mind what you tell me pretty well, but," as he continued, he came close to his sister's side, and spoke in a more subdued tone of voice, "I don't love to think about God, Martha. I can't be good, as you and father, and Aunt Hannah are, and as dear mother was good. There is a strange feeling, when I think of the words which she said to me when she was dying. I don't want to forget them, but sometimes they make me feel afraid."

Martha put her arm around her brother's waist, and kissed the cheek, which was glowing with the excitement of unwonted feeling. She felt a christian sister's strong sympathy for the motherless boy, who, it was evident, had just begun to seek for that light, which is darkened by corruption within, and by bad influences without. With a silent prayer for the Divine Spirit's aid, she said—

"I know not what you mean, William. There are times when all around must look dark and cheerless to those who do not love God. And even a loving mother's dying counsel, when it has been neglected, is recalled with a mysterious dread. But, my dear, there is one who is both ready and willing to remove all your gloomy fears. If you will only be persuaded to give your heart to him, you will find a peace and joy in believing, of which you cannot now conceive. You say you can't be good—you don't know how, and that is very true. It is true of every person in the world. No one can change his own heart. But God has promised to do this great work for all who will wait upon him. If you will only sincerely and perseveringly seek his favor, pray for the influences of his Spirit, regard its teachings, and trust in the Saviour, you will be a child of God, and then you will wonder how it could be that you did not love him before."

William listened with much attention to his sister's words, and when she had stopped speaking, he said with an appearance of much feeling:

"I sometimes wonder I don't love God now. He has done so much for me, I will try and seek him, I am resolved."

And this resolution was kept, and William soon happily realized the truth of the promise, "I love them that love me, and they that seek me early shall find me."

DESOLATION OF JUDEA.

As I traveled from Jafa to Jerusalem, some as fine soil as could be found any where, I did not see so much as one blade of grass, though I looked for it as one would search for a diamond. This is to me very strange, for I know that in England grass will grow where nothing else will; but here, neither among the fine stubble fields, nor even along the road side, where no plough comes, was to be found so much as what might with strict propriety be called a blade of grass. This is something very astonishing. Not having seen this ever taken notice of in books of travel that I have read, I cannot help thinking that surely I must be the first English farmer who has paid a visit to this land. Upon my arrival in Jerusalem, and perceiving that all the milk that was brought into the city in one day, for about twenty-four thousand inhabitants, did not exceed ten or twelve quarts; and that even that small quantity was goat's milk well watered; and when I could find no honey, but a small piece which I had the pleasure of tasting while taking tea with the bishop's chaplain; I could not but exclaim, how completely have God's judgments been executed in this devoted land! And most clearly did I perceive that the natural cause of all this evil was the absence of seasonable rain. Rain, which waters the earth and blesses it with fertility, God has withheld, and thus brought all these evils and many more which I need not stay now to enumerate, upon the land which once flowed with "milk and honey." Well Done.—Alexander Hamilton was once applied to as counsel, by a man having the guardianship of several orphans. These infants would on their coming of age, succeed to a large and valuable estate, of which there were some material defects in the title deeds. This fact, and the manner in which it happened, was known only to the guardian, who wished to employ Hamilton as a counsel to vest in himself the title of the estate. He related the whole affair circumstantially, and was requested by his lawyer to call again, before he would venture to give his advice in a matter of so much importance. On his second visit, Hamilton read over to him the minutes of their previous conversation that he had reduced to writing, and asked him if the statement was correct. On giving an answer in the affirmative, Hamilton replied, You are now completely in my power, and I look upon myself as the guardian of the unhappy children. Take my advice—settle with them honorably to the whole amount, or I will hunt you from your skin. It is proper to add, that this advice was punctually followed. [U. S. Gaz.

RADICAL AND CONSERVATIVE REFORMERS.

It falls to the lot of nearly every reform to suffer from the too radical or too conservative policy of those who alike profess to be its friends. Perhaps this is one of the necessary consequences of the great variety of mental constitutions given to men, and can not therefore be wholly prevented. Be that as it may, something certainly ought to be done to bring the radicals and conservatives nearer together, and prevent the lamentable results which often flow from their separation. If either one of them could be induced to compare his theory of reform with the facts in the case, that comparison would be likely to exert a restraining influence over him. But instead of doing this, the radical compares his theory with that of the conservative, and seeing the deficiency of the latter, he endeavors to get as far away from it as possible. Hence the more they are brought into contact, the farther are they driven from the standard of truth, and the less likely are they to see and act alike. Let us look at two or three reforms of the day, and see how fully this view is illustrated.

A great deal has been said within a few years past upon the subject of prison discipline, and the policy of treating prisoners with more tenderness. There is, no doubt, plenty of room for reform in this department. In times gone by, all prisoners, irrespective of their ages or the character of their crimes, were treated as the enemies and outcasts of society. The idea of dividing them into classes, and endeavoring to reform the less hardened, while the condition of the worst was rendered as comfortable as a proper regard for safety would admit of, seems not to have been entertained. But now it is different. Prisoners are regarded as not necessarily beyond the reach of good influences. Indeed, facts have proved that they are in many cases remarkably susceptible of improvement, particularly if the efforts to secure it are tempered by sympathy and kindness. In view of this, a class of reformers have sprung up, who seem to think, not only that kindness is better than severity, but that nearly all kinds of punishment are wrong, and ought to be abandoned. In listening to their addresses, one would think they regarded prisoners as the most abused set of men on the face of the earth, to whom it would be perfectly safe to say, "Go, and sin no more." But another class of reformers doubt this theory, and think they see in it great danger to society. They express their doubts, and are so violently opposed, that they grow stronger and stronger in their opinions, until they are actually frightened at the sight of a prisoner, and would sooner increase than diminish his restraints. Probably the true standard of prison reform lies between these two classes. They may both do good in one way, and that is by calling attention to the subject. But at the same time they give such distorted views of it as either to prejudice or mislead those who become acquainted with their theories.

The Sabbath reform furnishes another illustration of the evil consequences of pursuing too conservative or too radical a course in advocating a favorite theory. Here is a class of men—good men, it may reasonably be hoped—who see the great importance of a day of weekly rest to the social, political, and religious well-being of community. They therefore set themselves to work to secure uniformity in the observance of such a day of rest. They hold conventions, issue addresses, and circulate books upon the subject, in which they urge the cessation of all secular business, public and private, on a given day of each week. Were they content simply to do this, and so preserve and strengthen whatever sabbatic feeling now exists, no one would find fault with them. But with this they are not content. They must go to the directors of railroads, and to the various legislative bodies, for power to compel men to cease from traveling and working on the day which they have decided to be the Sabbath. Hereupon another class of reformers rise up, who think their personal liberty is in danger, and are determined to defend it. They believe—or profess to—that the duty of observing the Sabbath as a religious institution is no longer binding, and that to require its strict observance, either by law or public opinion, is calculated to hinder the social enjoyments of the people, and increase the already overgrown power of what they call the priesthood. With such views, they feel bound to oppose the efforts of the persons first named; and so begins a warfare between the two parties, which waxes hotter and hotter with every new battle. Now the true standard to which efforts for Sabbath reform ought to be adjusted, is no doubt mistaken by both classes. The one, in its zeal to preserve a good institution, invokes aid for which it has no business to apply; the other, in its hostility to all restraint, magnifies the danger to which this course is exposed—thus producing discord and contention between the two. For ourselves, we not only earnestly hope, but confidently expect, that the cause of truth will be promoted by the strife which is going on relative to the Sabbath. It shows how far the whole world is from being agreed as touching the claims of the sabbatic institution, and the consequent necessity of referring "to the law and the testimony" to establish them. Nevertheless, the facts in the case furnish a good illustration of the point in hand, and show how men may defeat their own objects by pursuing them in a wrong spirit.

By what means the radical and conservative reformers are to be brought together, is difficult to say. But it will not be by comparing their various theories; nor will it be by referring them to any world's convention. Indeed, there is no plan which strikes us as at all plausible, except that of squaring all reformatory theories to the one and only authoritative standard, which is the Word of God. Let that be magnified and diffused as it ought to be, and it is capable of settling all differences, and removing every evil under which the world now groans.

Catholic Mission in Abyssinia.—It is well known that Abyssinia (Africa) is chiefly inhabited by a numerous and powerful body of religionists, whose ecclesiastical system is a strange medley of Judaism, Christianity, and Paganism. The Catholic Herald says that "in the year 1838 a Catholic mission, under the direction of the Lazarists, was established among them; and we are happy to learn from a foreign paper that it has lately met with great success. During the past year, twenty-one natives, who had been previously educated and prepared by the missionaries, were admitted to priestly orders. The preaching of the members of the mission has been productive of great good. Ten thousand Abyssinian Coptics have embraced the Catholic faith, and every day crowds of persons are coming forward to be admitted to the same privilege. It is stated that an Abyssinian monk who has ten convents under his jurisdiction, has asked to be admitted, together with all his monks, into the bosom of the Catholic Church; and there is every prospect that the whole of Abyssinia will soon become Catholic." Such is the Catholic account of the matter, which should be received, probably, with some allowance.

Conscientious.—The Free-Will Baptists have a flourishing Biblical School at Whitestown, N. Y. An article from one of its officers, published in the Morning Star, says that no Catalogue has been published this year, "mainly for the reason that we could not voluntarily aid, in the smallest degree, in carrying on the infamous Mexican war. At the last session of Congress, it will be remembered, that one of the expedients devised for raising money to prosecute this war for the extension of the area of slavery, was a tax of three cents each imposed on catalogues, circulars, &c., to be prepaid by the person sending them. Had we, therefore, issued 500 catalogues, in addition to the cost of publication, we must pay $15 to the Post Office department, which expense, as it was, we presume the friends of the School would not wish us to incur."

Dr. Burns.—This distinguished clergyman, a delegate from the General Baptists of England to the Free-Will Baptists of this country, is now visiting the different cities, and giving occasional addresses upon the subject of temperance and peace. He spoke in Albany, N. Y., a few evenings since, to a large audience, who were quite delighted with his facts and opinions. We have in times past had plenty of delegates from the English churches, who were satisfied to be hospitably entertained, and allowed to pay for their entertainment by complimentary notices of this country and its institutions. But now there is a delegate among us who does not fear to identify himself with the reforms of the day, and to speak his mind about them. He is welcome, and ought to be candidly heard.

Property Qualification.—Joseph Sturge, in an address before a large public meeting at Leeds, Eng., told an anecdote of Dr. Franklin to illustrate the folly of depriving a man of a vote because he has not a certain amount of property at his command. At one time in, Pennsylvania there was a property qualification, required. Dr. Franklin in early life possessed property there, but in order to make it sufficient for a vote, he included the value of his donkey. It so happened that the day before the election came on, the donkey died. However, the Doctor went up to the poll to give his vote, and when he came there the officer told him that he had got no vote. "Why?" said the Doctor. "Why," reiterated the officer, "your donkey is dead." The Doctor retired, making this observation, "Then it seems it was the donkey, not I, who had the vote."

Number of Slaveholders.—The National Era says, that in Kentucky, where the number of small slaveholders is greater in proportion than in the Southern States, there are, according to the auditor's books, but 31,000 slaveholders, out of a population of 275,000 whites over twenty-one years of age. The estimate is not too low, which reckons the whole number of slave owners at 250,000. The total white population of the South, over twenty-one years of age, must be, at least, 1,500,000 souls. But, according to Mr. Calhoun, 1,200,000 Southern non-slaveholders are nonentities—the only real persons are the 250,000 slaveholders.

A Christian Colony for Oregon.—A correspondent of the New York Evangelist, at Fort Leavenworth, Mo., states that about 50 Christian families were there in July, on their way to Oregon. Among them were seven evangelical preachers. They were carrying with them a good Sunday School Library. It was their purpose carefully to observe the Sunday on their journey, and they had arranged for a Sunday School.

Sabbath-keeping Churches in England.—The last English mail brought letters from Bro. Wm. H. Black, pastor of the Mill Yard Church, London. In a letter to the General Conference, dated the eighth day of last month, he says that the two churches in London are not increased, but diminished. Yet they maintain regular worship on the Sabbath as heretofore, and are striving to keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. The church at Natton has been much revived. The former preacher, who was not a Sabbath-keeper, died in 1845, and was succeeded by Bro. John Francis, the Elder of a neighboring first-day church, but a sincere and zealous Sabbath-keeper. Under his ministry, the church is "increased and flourishing." Probably Mr. Black's letters, or copious extracts from them, will be published at a future day.

Hard Case.—The Pittsburg Morning Post tells of a colored man, named John H. Winston, who left his home in that city some time last spring, and went as a fireman on a steamboat, and is now in the jail of Henderson County, Ky., committed because of the absence of a certificate of freedom. He will soon be sold unless the jail fees be paid. His mother, brothers, and sisters, reside in Pittsburg, but are quite poor. This man, a citizen of Pennsylvania, guilty of no crime, goes to Kentucky in the regular prosecution of his business, and though, by the Constitution of the United States, he is entitled to all the privileges of citizenship, he is seized and imprisoned because he has not in his pocket a certificate from some magistrate that he is free. Shameful!

Chinese Scriptures.—The April number of the Chinese Repository, published at Canton, says that delegates for the purpose of revising the Chinese version of the New Testament, were to assemble at Shanghai on the first of last June. The following persons had been appointed delegates: From Shanghai, Bishop Boone and Rev. Dr. Medhurst; the Rev. W. M. Lowrie, from Ningpo; the Rev. J. Stronach, from Amoy; and the Rev. Dr. Bridgman, from Canton. Additional appointments, it was supposed, would be made, among them that of the Rev. Mr. Goddard, of Bangkok; the importance of the business to be performed making it desirable there should be a full meeting.

North British Review.—The August number of this popular Review is one of the best that has been issued. The article on China is one of great value. We thought of giving our readers a synopsis of it, but have concluded to publish it entire at an early day. Meanwhile we commend the Review in which it appears to the attention of those in want of a work of the kind. Published by Leonard Scott & Co., 79 Fulton-st., corner of Gold.

Roman Catholic Missions.—A paper published in Paris, gives a table of the receipts and expenditures, during the year 1846, of an institution for the dissemination of the religious views of the Roman Church. The total receipts for the year were somewhat less than heretofore, but amounted to $668,986, of which $15,722 was from North America. The total disbursements were $726,300, of which $190,541 was for missions in America.

Rev. I. T. Hinton dead.—The New Orleans Delta announces the death, in that city, of this distinguished Baptist minister. He fell a victim to the yellow fever, on the 27th of August, at the age of forty-two years. WHAT IS HE GOING TO MAKE?

When one of our young men is inclined to devote to study more time than is generally allowed by this money-making, money-loving age, the question is asked whether he is to make a lawyer, a doctor, or a preacher; as though of necessity he must pursue one of these three professions, if he sought the advantages of school. We all acknowledge the importance of education to the professional man. But do not farmers and mechanics fill a responsible place in our social compact? They have learned by experience, that they too are subject to the shameful intrigues of designing men. To meet these, they need a perception as keen as the tempered steel—a mind that can cut its way through the battlements of error up to the throne of truth. We do not expect that all will charm the multitude by their eloquence, or be versed in all the technicalities of our present lawyers, yet they are to make our governors, and our legislators are subject to their will. Yes, these very youth are to entwine around our social and political interests the silken chords of love and justice, or rivet the galling chains of tyranny upon future generations. How indispensable to our prosperity as a denomination, and our welfare as citizens, that every mind should have a moral and intellectual training. We trust the time hastens, when the question will be seriously asked, what he will make if he neglects to give his youthful days to study and improvement—when fathers and guardians will feel that they are serving God and their country, by making sacrifices to prepare the young for the responsible duties of life.

OUR COUNTRY AND ITS LAWS.

To whatever age of the world we refer—in whatever country we trace the effects of certain causes—a uniformity of sequence is noticed from ages most remote. It were well for politicians of modern times to heed the instructive lessons thus taught, and by more judicious proceedings avoid like calamities. The careful student soon unveils the mysteries of fallen Babylon, nor longer asks, Why has Rome fallen, Greece sunk to barbarism, and the desolate gloom of modern Petræ succeeded to the brilliancy of ancient Edom? Long ages of starless night have hung over the unreserected remains of fallen greatness; the thunders of an insulted God have blasted them from existence, and the march of time is hastening to obliviate them. But why thus fallen? The first step to ruin, in every instance, was the undue exercise of irreponsible power—the subjection of men to the restraints of laws which they had no voice in making, and which threw around them no protection. Rome fell not till internal slavery gnawed upon her vitals, and injected its deadly poison into her life's blood. While Athens was united under wholesome laws, bearing equally upon all, the swarming millions of the east withered before her invincible arm; but when oppressors sat in her high seats, the man of Macedon looked on her, and she perished. Thus it ever has been, and ever will be. That nation whose God is not the Lord, can not escape the scathing lightnings of provoked Omnipotence; but, like shattered Tyre, shall yield to the cankering rust of a stronger chain than galled the limbs of her own oppressed.

While we turn from the gloomy past, and listen to the enthusiastic commendations of our own "free, happy country, basking in the sunshine of just and equal laws," our hearts leap for joy. We love to contemplate the termination of that stern conflict, in the establishment of the heaven-born principle of man's equality. We read with reverence the names of those tried souls who came up from the furnace of oppression seven times heated, and in the integrity of their hearts incorporated the unstained principles of liberty, of universal freedom, into our Constitution. Under its healthful provisions, the most perfect union is formed, justice established, domestic tranquillity insured, the common defense provided for, the general welfare promoted, and the blessings of liberty to every man secured. But is it true? Ah, false, delusive hope! The goddess of freedom has long drooped her weary wings, as she has hovered hopelessly over the unrebuked dominion of sin, more daring and damning than sunken Ninevah ever reveled in, in the night of her deepest pollution. She has taken successive steps in that downward road in which forgotten nations traveled to destruction. Bloody-handed oppressors sit in her high seats, and heartless tyrants have inscribed in her statute books laws more black and hateful than ever found a place in the codes of Algerine piracy. But I am preferring grave charges, and must begin to prove them, in doing which I shall accomplish the object for which I have taken the pen at this time, viz., to examine somewhat critically some of the laws, both State and National, now existing in relation to slavery in the United States—laws which falsify the Declaration of Independence, trample on the provisions of the Constitution, make a nullity of the most sacred obligations and relations which God and nature have ordained to exist between man and man; which seal the Bible, and shut the book of knowledge upon starving millions—make virtue and chastity a prey to unbridled lust—place the life and labor of the defenseless at the control of detestable villains, and forbid the Christian to obey God and humanity by administering to the wants of the crushed and needy. Men! Christians! examine with me some of the laws alluded to, and let us ask ourselves, who is responsible for their existence, and see to it that the declaration of Nathan to David be not applicable to us.

1. Of National laws, or laws enacted by the National Legislature. It is well known, that the District of Columbia is under "the exclusive legislation of Congress in all cases whatsoever." (See Constitution.) Here, then, we will look for specimens of legislation. In the city called by the name of Washington, "any Justice of the Peace may commit to the United States prison any person he may choose to suspect of being a fugitive slave." The commitment being noticed in the papers, and the owner warned to take away his property, if no one appears he shall be sold to pay his jail fees. What civilized government on earth practices more execrable wickedness? Look at it! The nation has built three jails on her very hearth-stone to lock up innocent men and women in, and when sufficient time has elapsed after their advertisement to prove that they were not slaves by the non-appearance of an owner, they are doomed by this damnable act to a life of interminable toil in the rice swamp of some far-off land. But we have not sounded the whole depth of this villainy. The Marshal, or his deputy, the Jailor, is the only person to whom the prisoner can have access—he the sole judge and jury in the matter—the arbiter of liberty or slavery;—at his bidding the victim comes forth to freedom, or sinks to slavery. Ought he to be disinterested? He is required to support the prisoner in custody, and has no means of remuneration but the sale of the slave. Thus, should it appear that the person in keeping was a freeman, the Marshal must sell him to slavery or sacrifice his maintenance. The law then offers a high and tempting bribe to this irresponsible judge to sell men he knows to be free, to pay the cost of their unjust imprisonment. If Turkish despotism is disgraced by an act of equal atrocity, history bears not the record. The practical bearing of this and similar laws appears from a report of a Committee of the House of Representatives on the 11th of January, 1827. Here is official documentary proof, that in one County [Washington] in three years, 179 human beings were arrested on no allegation of crime, but merely to aid the slaveholder in trampling on those great rights for the protection of which the government was formed. Of this number 26 were, by the confession of the Marshals, free men, whom this law empowered him to consign to hopeless bondage, because too poor to pay him for the depredation he had already committed on their rights. The Committee also reported that in that part of the District ceded by Virginia, a free negro may be arrested and put in jail for three months on suspicion of being a fugitive. He is then hired out to pay his jail fees, and if in twelve months he fails to prove his freedom, shall be sold into slavery. In the part ceded by Maryland, the Committee reported that "if a free man of color should be apprehended as a runaway, he is subject to all fees and rewards given by law for apprehending runaways; and upon failure to make such payment, shall be sold as a slave." Strange legislation this; a man acknowledged to be free, and accused of no offence, snatched from all that is dear on earth, and doomed to servitude more intolerable than death, because some soulless shadow of a man happened to suspect that he might be a runaway, arrested him, and incurred a little expense, for the liquidation of which this Christian Republic struck from his brow the image of divinity, and clothed him in the habiliments of brutality. If any citizen of any free State, having black eyes, dark skin, hair somewhat curly, and nose a little flattened, should happen to visit Washington on business, or for a pleasure tour, he may be thrown into prison, shut out from the light of the sun and human intercourse, and then compelled to prove himself free, or be sold to a returnless distance from the scenes of his early days. Strange anomaly this; a government built on the principle of equal rights, requiring shades of complexion, and shapes of face, as indispensable qualifications to entitle men to its protection. A government predicated on the axiom of man's universal freedom, requiring man, under the shade of the high dome of her proud Capitol, to prove the very thing which the founders of that government declared to be a self-evident fact—a fact above all proof, stamped with indelible certainty upon every sane mind. Men are licensed by government, for the payment of three hundred dollars, to traffic in God's image—to sever nature's most tenacious ties. Thus has our Capital been converted into the greatest slave mart on earth. On the 13th of July, 1847, the Government of the United States did levy upon and sell Elizabeth, and her daughter Caroline, for $530, which money lies in our treasury along side the $300 yearly paid by individuals for license to commit the same piratical deeds. Husbands! fathers! look on your wives and your daughters. Are you ready to place them on the auction stand, to be sold as beasts and inanimate things, to satisfy the beastly lusts of vile men. In vain did that mother and daughter point to the free-floating escutcheon above them, and claim its protection. While Manlius pleaded in sight of the Roman Capitol, the people would not condemn him; but here, all the pleadings of virtue and innocence are vain. The people do daily consign, in the shade of the Capitol, hundreds of men and women to a fate inconceivably worse than Manlius eventually met. Did I say the people? It is true, as I will prove, after noticing other acts more heaven-daring and extended than those already alluded to. More anon. D. E. M.

WAR NEWS.

On Friday last, news was received in this city by telegraph, that Gen. Scott arrived at the city of Mexico on the 20th of August—that he had two engagements with the enemy, in both of which he was victorious, driving them from their fortifications into the city, and, creating great consternation—that a truce was demanded and granted for the purpose of allowing time to consider the peace propositions of Mr. Trist—and that there was every prospect of a speedy termination of hostilities. This news comes through such a medium that it is generally credited. A letter from Mr. Lumsden, of the New Orleans Picayune, to the Charleston Courier, says that Gen. Scott has been elected President of Mexico, to serve until the 18th of January next. So say the New York papers of Monday morning.

Yellow Fever at New Orleans.—The present has been an uncommonly sickly season at New Orleans, the yellow fever raging with great fatality. During the 48 hours preceding the last advices, there were 104 deaths from the epidemic in the city, 38 at the Charity Hospital, and 29 at Lafayette. The N. O. Delta describes the condition of the city as follows :—

"How distressing a contrast it makes to compare our city at the present time with what it is in the winter season. One may look upon the broad, populous streets, that during other seasons are crowded with the brave, the beautiful, and the fashionable, and yet now could scarcely find any thing to relieve the eye. Cast your eye from St. Peter up Chartres street—instead of finding the street filled with all that is redolent of life in New Orleans, you find a blank. Here you see a solitary citizen, who, through his business, is obliged to remain tugging at his desk; and another, who, from some cause or other, pulls his occupation after him, in the same manner that a dray-horse pulls his load. The Levee is deserted, and the forests of masts that skirted it have dwindled down to almost nothing. The streets that in the winter time were filled with all sorts of happy, joyous persons, are now almost desolate, and in fact the whole appearance of our city is sadly against the prevalence of health. It is useless to conceal the fact—we are now in the very centre of an epidemic."

Swindling.—Cist's Advertiser tells that a Mr. Tobin, who seems to be very unsuspicious kind of man, visiting St. Louis, was accosted at the public house, where he put up, by a genteel looking stranger, who was also boarding there, and advised to beware of thieves and swindlers who would cheat him if they had a chance out of his last cent. The old gentleman listened with surprise. "Is it possible !" "Yes, even advise you to leave it in their care, just for the purpose of saving it out of the hands of the very people they themselves are." The old gentleman by this time was thoroughly alarmed. "Well, my dear sir, what would you advise me to do with my money ?" "Why, sir," replied his new friend, the best and safest thing you can do is to put in into my hands until you want to use it, when you know you can get it any moment." Tobin accordingly handed his deposits, amounting to one hundred and twenty dollars, over to his honest and disinterested adviser. He has seen neither friend nor money since.

Railroad Sprinkler.—On the Stonington Railroad they carry a "Sprinkler," for the purpose of watering the track and the road bed, thereby diminishing the friction of the cars upon the track, preventing the boxes and journals from being heated, by keeping away the dust, preserving the paint and varnish by not having to clean the cars so often, relieving the passengers from great annoyance, and saving breakmen a large share of their labor at the through stations. This improvement has been fully tested for the past two months upon the road, and found to be very popular with travelers. It requires about two thousand gallons of water for the Stonington Road, (forty-seven and a half miles.) The machine is attached to the train behind the usual water tank, and is under the control of the engineman by a rope attached to a valve which he shuts and opens at pleasure. When it is in operation, there is not a particle of dust inside or outside of the cars. In warm or dry weather the car windows can be left open without objection. [Prov. Jour.

Munificent Bequests.—Julien Poydras, Esq., late of the parish of Point Coupee, in Louisiana, bequeathed to several parishes in the State, individuals, orphan asylums, and other charitable associations, property of immense value, and a large amount of funds. Among the institutions thus aided are the Poydras Orphan Asylum of New Orleans, and the Charity Hospital in that city. To the parish of Point Coupee the deceased gave $30,000, the interest of this sum to be employed in giving a dowry to all the girls of said parish who may get married; the unfortunate to be always preferred. Also $20,000, the interest to be employed towards contributing to an academy or college, to be especially established in the parish. He also bequeathed to West Baton Rouge $30,000, the interest to be employed in giving a dowry to the girls of the parish when they marry.

Sam Patch Outdone.—A fine young heifer a day or two since, says the Rochester Democrat, took the wind out of the sails of Sam Patch, in the way of jumping. She was feeding on the brink of the precipice, over 100 feet high, at the Lower Falls, and by a misstep was precipitated into the water below, which luckily was deep enough to prevent her from being dashed to pieces on the rocks underneath. She disappeared; but soon rose to the surface and attempted to gain footing on "terra firma," but could not from the steepness of the bank. Some men procured a boat, and fastening a rope to her horns, towed her some distance down the river to a place where she clambered up the banks as if nothing had happened.

Jewish Newspaper.—It is said to be in contemplation to commence, at an early day, in this city, the publication of a weekly paper, devoted to the Jewish faith, to be edited by Major Noah and the Rev. Mr. Lyon.

SUMMARY.

A letter from Vera Cruz, dated Aug. 27, says that on Sunday last the city was startled with the intelligence from Yucatan that the whole Indian population of that State had risen against the whites, and in some districts massacred entirely the white population, with the exception of the women, whom they only spared for a fate still worse than death. There is, perhaps, some exaggeration in the accounts of the extent of the massacre, but of the main facts there is not a doubt.

In N. Y., on Friday last, an Englishman, named John Musgrave, who had just arrived n the ship Matilda, attempted to drown his wife by pushing her into the river. She was rescued from drowning by officer Green, who immediately took Musgrave into custody. He stated the reason for attempting to drown his wife was his extreme poverty; that he intended to drown his wife and son, a boy fifteen years old, and then drown himself. He was committed to prison to answer.

John Quincy Adams attended an ordination at Roxbury, Mass., on Wednesday last week. He was a delegate from the Church in Quincy, of which he is a member. The Boston Journal says that, although his steps were feeble, owing to his late severe indisposition and the accumulated infirmities of eighty winters, yet judging from his appearance, from the fire which sparkled in his eyes, and the deep interest which he seemed to take in all the proceeding, the general health of this much respected sage and patriot has recently greatly improved.

The Brooklyn Advertiser says that six or seven months ago, Mr. G. B. Clarke, a merchant-tailor of New-York, who resides in Tillary-st. in Brooklyn, had a valuable silver watch stolen from his house, but by whom, it could not be discovered. A few days since he received the missing property through the medium of a reverend gentleman of the Catholic Church to whom confession of the theft had been made by a girl formerly in the employ of Mr. Clarke, who has since become repentant, and by her priest made the restitution now mentioned.

One of the first efforts of the telegraph to Cincinnati well-nigh proved disastrous to some of the parties concerned. A merchant of that city received an order from the East, by telegraph, to purchase fifteen thousand dollars worth of corn, and ship it to New Orleans. Such an order at this time surprised the recipient, and he concluded to defer the purchase for further information. He was afterwards informed that the order was for coin—a mistake of but a single letter with the operater, but of great consequence to those interested in the speculation.

There has lately been discovered near Sceaux, in the Loiret, a large stone jar, of rude workmanship, containing six hundred Roman coins. The jar is about sixteen inches in height and eight inches in diameter. It was found in a species of chamber about two yards square, the walls of which were coated with a cement of extraordinary polish. It was at the same time enclosed in a niche, which had only one opening of sufficient size to admit a man's hand to drop in the coin.

The Cincinnati Commercial tells of a novel balloon adventure that happened in that city during the storm on Tuesday last. A little girl was seated upon the top of a hay wagon holding an umbrella over her head; the sudden gust which came up carried her entirely clear of the wagon, through the air to the sidewalk, upon which she alighted safely. The umbrella served, of course, as a parachute, and she clung stoutly to it.

The Paris Constitutional states that the cholera is raging with intense severity amongst the Russian army in the Caucasus. It has already carried off the General Kowalewski and Col. Prince Orbelain. The malady has diminished in some detachments of the army and increased in others. It is added that the cholera has appeared in some of the mountain districts not under the dominion of Russia.

By an official document, printed by order of the British House of Commons, it is shown that in five years, to 1826, there were 5,286 persons convicted on capital charges, and 307 executed; in the next five years, 7,077 persons were convicted, and 304 executed; in the next, 3,877, out of which 175 were executed; in the next, 767, out of which 44 were executed.

A correspondent of the Syracuse Journal states that there is more peppermint manufactured in Wayne County, in this State, than in all other parts of the United States. A company of manufacturers of the oil from New York, have recently purchased the manufacturing establishment in Palmyra, with all the mint now growing, and have also bound those engaged in the business not to grow the mint or make the oil for a certain number of years; for all which they have paid $200,000!

The Bunker Hill Aurora mentions the case of a woman in Lincoln, who has done all her home work, and earned eight dollars a week in picking berries, and of a woman and a daughter who did all the work for the family, having several men to work upon the farm, took care of the dairy of eight cows, and earned fifty dollars in one month, in picking berries.

It is stated that 1,800,000 yards of cloth are made at Lowell, Mass., every week, amounting to 93,600,000 yards per year—enough to extend twice around the entire world! Sixty-five thousand bales of cotton are worked up annually. Of printed calico, there are made 14,000,000 yards per year. In these manufactories one million pounds of starch are used annually.

Texas bids fair to be a fine potato country. Both the soil and climate seem to be well adapted to the cultivation of this valuable root. The Galveston News says that a small piece of land on Yoster Creek, has yielded for several years an average of about 500 bushels of Irish potatoes to the acre. This is probably more than an average crop in Texas. The price at which they are now sold in the Galveston market, is $1 to $1 37 1-2 per bushel.

The Journal of Commerce estimates, in view of the number of emigrants who have arrived in this country during the past eight months, that the total number of the present year will amount to a quarter of a million.

In Hingham, Mass., they have the oldest inhabitable church in North America. There are the ruins of one in James-town, (Va.) which is older than this, but this is the oldest now occupied in the country. It was built one hundred and sixty years ago, and in it is some of the timber of the church built by the first settlers in 1635 or 6. It is perfectly sound, and almost as hard as iron.

An emigrant ship, the Emma Watts, which arrived last week, full of passengers, had not a single case of fever on board, nor a death on the voyage. Captain Watts compelled every passenger to bathe daily, and the ship was every morning thoroughly cleansed and sweetened. A surgeon, practicing among the typhus, in one of the most wretched districts in Ireland, declared that with the liberal use of water, externally and internally, he had not lost a single patient.

Some twenty years ago—more or less—a gentleman by the name of Dudley died intestate in England, leaving a fortune estimated at $150,000,000. An advertisement has appeared several times in the London Times to the heirs (if there be such) to come forward and prove their relationship to the "dear departed." The rich are seldom without heirs, and we presume many persons have adduced or offered to adduce, their claims upon the property.

An old man who went by the name of Billy Duff, and who has been an inmate of the Roxbury Alms-house for 90 years, died in that institution on the 23d of August, at the advanced age of 102 years. During the whole of the time he was in the Alms-house, he enjoyed uninterrupted good health, having never been ill until within a few days of his death.

Rev. Dr. Hawkes, a clergyman well known in this city, is now settled in New Orleans, with a salary of $6,000, and a professorship in a University, which increases his income to a round ten thousand a year—a sum which would give a comfortable support to twenty home missionaries, each capable of doing as much good as Dr. Hawkes.

A large establishment for supplying the Philadelphia market with peaches, sold, in 1845, 25,000 bushels, from 50 cents to $2 per bushel, averaging 50 cents per bushel. For several weeks two sloops and one steamboat were required to carry the fruit to market. One of the proprietors has just commenced an orchard in Ohio, beginning with setting out 10,000 trees.

Two men, father and son, by the name of Campbell, were recently drowned in the Passaic, at Patterson, N. J. On account of some disagreement, the father attempted to take the life of the son. The latter escaped and tried to ford the river. The father pursued; and getting in beyond their depth, both were drowned; as neither could swim.

Wall-st., New York, was greatly agitated on Thursday last, by the announcement that the highly respectable exchange and banking house of Prime, Ward & Co. had suspended payment. They have published a card stating the cause to be the failure of certain houses in England, whose bills they have taken to a large amount.

The Editor of the National Watchman, a "colored" paper at Troy, N. Y., says that one of the thirty-seven southerners who issued a circular to establish a pro-slavery paper in Washington, to his "certain knowledge, has a colored family, consisting of a beautiful woman, 'a swarthy prototype of Hagar,' and five children."

The President of the United States is allowed a salary of $25,000 a year. The Queen of England has for her private purse $300,000; household expenses, $862,000; salaries of household, $656,300; royal bounties, $65,000; pensions, $6,000; and some other matters which make up an aggregate of $1,725,000.

Among the medical novelties of the day may be mentioned, on the authority of the Gazette Medicale, that establishments have been recently opened at Berlin, for the open sale of horseflesh as an article of human food. In order to render this innovation popular, a public banquet was recently held in the Prussian capital, at which seventy persons sat down to feast upon the body of a mare which had reached the age of seven years.

A trial was made on the 18th of June last, over seven miles of the London and Birmingham Railroad, of a new locomotive with driving wheels eight feet in diameter. It ran the seven miles, with a full train of twelve cars attached, over a grade of sixteen feet to the mile, in five seconds less than seven minutes, or at the rate of something over a mile a minute.

The Constitutional Convention of Illinois have adopted, by a large majority, the following amendment to the Constitution of that State :—"The Legislature shall pass laws with adequate penalties, preventing the intermarriage of whites and blacks, and no colored person shall ever, under any pretext, hold any office of profit or honor in this State."

Mr. Beauchamp, of Skaneateles, has a sunflower on his farm with the astonishing number of 85 heads on it, and several with 70 heads. Making sun-flower oil has now become a business of no little consequence, and we think that it might be profitably applied to the making of gas for villages and farm houses.

A man named Francis Keeper was arrested on Saturday for cruelty to animals. It appears that a cow broke into his place, and in turning her out he threw an axe at her, cutting her very severely, so that she is not expected to live. He was held in $200 bail to answer.

The highest fountain in the world is on the grounds of the Duke of Devonshire, in England, where a single jet is thrown up to a height of 267 feet, more than 100 feet higher than Niagara Falls. The eight acre reservoir which supplies it is 339 feet above.

All the engine drivers on the Jamaica (W. I.) Railway are American blacks, who have undergone a strict examination by a European engineer, and who are said to discharge their duties with exemplary skill and attention.

The Saturday Evening Post says "the loss of life thus far, in the Mexican war, on the battle field, and by sickness, is estimated by one of our cotemporaries, at twenty thousand men. Few conquests and triumphs are worth what they cost in blood, treasure, broken hearts, and tears."

A correspondent of the Knoxville (Tenn.) Register, writing from Sullivan county, says: "On Thursday last, John Van Hoozer, of this county, who is one hundred and fourteen years old, went one and a half miles to the place of holding the election. He has voted at every Presidential election that has been held in the United States.

The Monmouth Gazette says, "On Monday, a corn stalk, from Sheriff Conover's farm, in Middletown township, was exhibited in this village, which measured fifteen feet two and a half inches in height!! It had two sets on it, to the top of the highest of which was ten feet two inches. The stalk was very heavy as well as tall.

A Massachusetts volunteer, writing from Monterey, makes the following statement: "The mothers here have a great practice of selling their daughters to the soldiers. I saw two beautiful girls, one 18, and the other 16, sold last week, the first for $64, and the last for $60!"

The valuation of the property of Providence, R. I., by the assessors this year, is $57,301,900 against $25,593,200 last year. The rate of tax is 45 cents on the $100. The valuation in 1837 was only $14,516,000, and the tax 31 cents on the $100.

Miss Burdett Coutts, the daughter of the deceased wealthy banker, has contributed the sum of $350,000, at different times, for erecting new churches in England. She gave the fund for endowing two colonial bishoprics, and also for a church and schools in each.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

PLUMBE NATIONAL DAGUERREAN GALLERY AND PHOTOGRAPHERS' FURNISHING DEPOTS; awarded the gold and silver medals, four first premiums, and two highest honors, at the National, the Massachusetts, the New York, and Pennsylvania Exhibitions, respectively, for the most splendid colored Daguerreotypes and best apparatus ever exhibited.

Portraits taken in exquisite style, without regard to weather. Instructions given in the art.

A large assortment of apparatus and stock always on hand, at the lowest cash prices.

New York, 251 Broadway; Philadelphia, 136 Chestnut street; Boston, 75 Court and 58 Hanover streets; Baltimore, 205 Baltimore street; Washington, Pennsylvania Avenue; Petersburg, Virginia, Mechanics' Hall; Cincinnati, Fourth and Walnut, and 176 Main streets; Saratoga Springs, Broadway; Paris, 127 Vieille Rue du Temple; Liverpool, 32 Church street.

THE CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE, formerly under the care of Rev. D. Mead, commences its fourth volume under the editorship of Rev. J. T. Headley, author of "Napoleon and his Marshals," "Sacred Mountains," "Letters from Italy," &c. We hazard nothing in saying that this Magazine, so deservedly popular hitherto, is destined to fill a large place in public estimation; that it will not only maintain its present enviable distinction, but earn to itself a far higher popularity, and become the companion of many a circle to which it is now a stranger, gladdening by its presence, while it exerts an influence pure, elevating, and healthful. The Editor will bend his energies to make this the most popular Magazine of the day, and while he avails himself of articles from the best writers, he will draw freely from his own exhaustless store.

DERUYTER INSTITUTE.

JAS R. IRISH, Principal.
GURDON EVANS, Principal of Teachers' Department.
CAROLINE E. WILCOX, Preceptress.
AMELIA R. CLARKE, Teacher of Instrumental Music.

Other experienced Teachers are employed the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First commencing Wednesday,	Aug. 25, and ending	Dec. 1
Second " "	Dec. 15, "	March 22
Third " "	April 5, "	July 12

Tuition, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
Extras—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

STATE OF NEW YORK, SECRETARY'S OFFICE, Albany, August 3d, 1847.—To the Sheriff of the City and County of New York: Sir—Notice is hereby given, that at the next general election to be held on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday in November next, the following officers are to be elected, to wit:

STATE—A Secretary of State, Comptroller, State Treasurer, Attorney General, State Engineer and Surveyor, Three Canal Commissioners, and Three Inspectors of State Prisons.

SPARE THE BIRDS.

BY REV. GEORGE W. BETHUNE, D. D.

Spare, spare the gentle bird,
Nor do the pretty warbler wrong,
In the greenwood is heard
Its sweet and happy song;
Its song so clear and glad,
Each listener's heart hath stirred,
And none, however sad,
But blessed that happy bird.

And when at early day
The farmer trod the dew,
It met him on the way
With welcome blithe and true;
So, when at weary eve,
He homeward wends his way,
Full sorely would he grieve
To miss the well-loved lay.

The mother who had kept
Watch o'er her wakeful child,
Smiled as the baby slept,
Soothed by its wood notes wild;
And gladly had she flung
The casement open free,
As the dear warbler sung
From out the household tree.

The sick man on his bed
Forgets his weariness,
And turns his feeble head
To list its songs that bless
His spirits, like a stream
Of mercy from on high,
Or music in the dream
That seals the prophet's eye.

O! laugh not at my words,
To warn your childhood's hours;
Cherish the gentle birds—
Cherish the fragile flowers;
For since man was bereft
Of Paradise, in tears,
God the sweet thing hath left,
To cheer our eyes and ears.

THE SAND-HILLERS.

We find in the Winyau Intelligencer, published at Georgetown, South Carolina, the following notice:—

"The poor laborers on Black River, and in that neighborhood, are in a state of starvation, many of them being without corn or meal, and none of them having meat. The occasion calls for the aid of the charitable, and efforts will be made to obtain relief for them."

Who are these "poor laborers?"

There is a class of poor whites in the Carolinas, and most of the Southern States, peculiar in character, and unknown generally to the country. They are called sand-hillers. They are so called because they cluster together in the poorest regions, and there live by hunting, fishing, raising a little stock, making tar and charcoal, and attending to poultry. They are very ignorant. Not one out of fifty can read or write, and, what is worse, they change not as time winnows down the old and supplies their places with the young. As is the sire, so is the son.

And these sand-hillers are as peculiar in dress and look as they are in character. You know them whenever you see them. They are marked in any crowd. Dressed always in the plainest homespun, homemade and widely cut, often without shoes, but when using them wearing the coarsest kind, with slouched hats of the cheapest texture, having no blood in their cheeks, their eyes black, and their hair lank, they are as distinct a race as the Indians. In some respects they are not unlike them. They love to roam the woods, and be free there; and get together for frolic and fun; to fish and hunt; to chase wild cattle;—but here the similarity ends: for they are wanting in personal daring, and in that energy of character which makes a man. We do not know one of them who ever gained station in society, or became distinguished by his deeds. And it is this class to whom the Georgetown Intelligencer alludes, we conclude, when it speaks of the "poor laborers" on Black River and neighborhood.

How came they in their present condition?

Their history is quickly told. It is a sad one, and we never think of it without sorrow.

In the early settlement of the Carolinas, everybody pressed upon the water-courses. Poor as well as rich, made lodgement upon or near their banks. There were, at first, very few negroes; consequently the latter needed the labor of the former, to house their crops and clear their lands. All got along well, then. But the slave-traffic, with its accursed ills, began soon after, and, by and by, planters had their places stocked with slaves. As these slaves increased, the poor began to feel their degradation. A bitter hatred grew up between these classes. It led often to violence. The larger planters, in consequence, began to buy up the poor men's land, and the poor men, in turn, became anxious to sell. And they did so. But where were they to go?—South Corolina was a wilderness; the good lands on the water-courses, in the state, were in possession of rich planters. They had no alternative left, as they thought, but to herd together on the sand-hills, and there they and theirs still live.

Their choice of place is significant enough of their feeling, and of the cause of their removal. They made their location in neighborhoods where neither large nor small planters could molest them. They got where they could live without being disturbed or worried by the continued sight of slaves. Now and then, you will find a few of the more debased sort gathered close to towns; but generally they are some ten, fifteen, or twenty miles back. What the land would yield which they call their own —for often they "squat," as the phrase is, on the state's or others' property—it is difficult to say. But the best of it, on the average, would not return ten bushels of corn to the acre; the most of it not five. They grow sweet potatoes, melons, a little cotton for home use, and now and then a bag, or a half bag, for market. But things are where they are, because slavery, with its biting social ills, beat them away from the richer soil, and keeps them hopelessly down and debased on the barren hills.

What are their peculiarities of mind?

The fact that they left the neighborhood of large plantations, and sought a sort of wild-wood liberty, shows that they have some notions of personal freedom. They have. But they are very crude. It was their condition which induced us to think first on the subject of slavery, and we endeavored, in conjunction with the lamented Grimke, to hit upon some plan by which we could improve this. We sought them out in their hovel-homes. We endeavored to win their regard, and secure their confidence. We succeeded in this, but we failed, wholly, in every effort to induce them to change their mode of life. The ruling idea uppermost in their minds seems to be hatred of labor, under the conviction that it degraded them, because it put them on an equality with the slaves. An anecdote will illustrate this feeling.

One of their number had a fine, intelligent boy. He was one that would have attracted notice in any boyhood gathering. We proposed to the father that he should be educated. "Let him go with us to the town," said we, "and we will send him to school, and see what can be done with him." "And what then?" asked he, eyeing us, as if suspicious that something wrong was to follow. "Why," we continued, "when he has been educated, we can send him to the carriage-maker, Mr. C., and let him learn a trade." "Never!" he quickly, almost fiercely, rejoined, with a harsh oath. "My son shall never work by the side of your negroes, and Mr. ———'s negroes, (calling certain planters' names whose slaves were being taught the trade,) and be ordered about as he orders them about." He was fixed. No argument, entreaty, appeal to interest, could move him. The idea uppermost in his mind was the idea of his class—that labor was degrading; and he would rather his son should be free in the forest, if ignorant, than debased in the city, though educated, by a menial task.

What hope is there for them?

We see none. Nothing, certainly, but the removal of slavery can induce them to change their present condition. They will not labor in the field while they think it degrading; nor become artisans or mechanics, while slaves are such. As for educating them, scattered as they are, the effort seems almost hopeless! Up and down the river where these "poor laborers," that the South Carolina paper talks of, live, and all around Georgetown, there are large rice and cotton estates. Many of the owners of them are very wealthy; a majority rich. Yet there is no sort of connection, or sympathy, between these planters and the sand-hillers. They are as far apart as two races can be. We speak now of social separation: for we are sure the moment they heard the "poor laborers" were starving, these planters did what was necessary, and more, to relieve their wants. But, we fear, coming time will find them as they are now—alone, ignorant, degraded, the victims of a blighting curse!

The condition of these sand-hillers illustrates the effect of slavery in its extreme, or when pushed to its farthest limit. Take one town, near the centre of South Carolina, and make a line for ten miles south of it along the river on one side, looking three miles back, and we question whether you will find over ten planters! They have each from one hundred to two, three, four or five hundred slaves! Many of these slaves, too, are mechanics! Necessarily, therefore, the towns wane, the poorest classes emigrate, as well as the young and enterprising; and the ignorant or sand-hill class escape to the barrens for freedom! according to their notion of it.

So much for the "poor laborers" of Black river and its neighborhood! for the unfortunate sand-hillers of the Carolinas!

NO FICTION.

Not a very long time ago, says the Journal of Commerce, one of the most eloquent divines of Great Britain, occupying one of the most important pulpits of the kingdom, became so much affected by the use of wine repeatedly, that he was summoned to give an account of himself. He could not bear, he said, to stand for trial on such a charge, before men whose only superiority over him consisted in the possession of harder heads, which could endure portions that overthrew him. He accordingly left his high position, and, under an assumed name, took passage in the steerage of a ship bound to America. At one of our principal interior towns he took lodgings at an obscure hotel, where for a while he bore up under all the pressure upon him, and lived without excessive indulgence, but at length he returned to his glass more recklessly than ever, got into a broil with low fellows, for which he was arrested and with others compelled to labor in prison. There of course he was temperate, but the deep degradation of his condition prevented him from disclosing his real name. At length a visitor looking at him thought he discovered traits not common in the prison, and, having procured liberty from the keeper, addressed the prisoner, saying—"Sir, I judge from your bearing that you have seen better circumstances than these which you are in at present." "Yes, I have;" replied the prisoner, shedding tears. By persevering kindness, the visitor was able at length to obtain the real name of the fallen man, and the story of his degradation. He repaired to a clergyman of the place with the secret. The clergyman had a parishioner from the church of which the prisoner said he was a minister. He was invited to the prison. It was so; there was his eloquent pastor, working among felons! By application to the proper authorities, the prisoner was released from confinement, and under the care of kind friends it is hoped that his great talents may be employed in high usefulness again.

THE WIDOW'S DAUGHTER.

One, two, three rings on your finger—four, five—yes, true as we live—there are five gold rings on your finger—and Monday too—the regular washing day. We'll be bound to say you have not been to the wash-tub with your mother to-day. A poor girl as you are, whose mother can hardly earn enough to make both ends meet, and with gold! Shame on you! What could you do, if she should be taken away? You are not fit for a wife, and as for being a lady that is out of the question. You have not beauty to recommend you to some wealthy fop, nor industry to secure an honest mechanic. What in the world are you proud of? Why do you dress so extravagantly? Everybody knows that your mother is not able to support you in this way, and your neighbors will talk so long as you behave so like a fool.

Our advice is, take every ring from your fingers, and commence an apprenticeship to the trade of housewifery. Learn to sew, to knit, to bake, to wash, to cook. You have nothing to expect from rich relations, and the only chance before you is, that you may become the wife of some honest mechanic. This chance will slip, if you are not careful, and you perchance may be thrown for support upon the town. Believe it, or not, many a foolish and haughty girl like yourself, has come to such an end or a worse one. If our advice is worth any thing, take heed to it, and the next time we call upon you, we shall find you more happy in spirits—cheerful and contented. [Exchange.

A STORM IN THE POLAR SEA.

One of the grandest scenes that can be witnessed in this world, is a storm in the Polar Sea, and the collision of the mountain icebergs which tower in some instances several hundred feet above the level of the sea. The ocean violently agitated, is at all times a sublime and awful sight; but when, in addition, it encounters immense masses, which it has set in motion with violence equal to its own, its effect is prodigiously increased. At one moment, says Beechey, in his "Voyage towards the North Pole," it bursts upon the icy fragments, and hurries them many feet beneath its waves; and the next, as the buoyancy of the depressed body struggles for the re-ascendancy, the water rushes in foaming cataracts over its edges, whilst every individual mass, rocking and laboring on its bed, grinds against and contends with its opponent, until one is either split with the shock or is upheaved upon the surface of the other. Nor is this collision confined to any particular spot, but is going on as far as the sight can reach, and when, from this convulsive scene below, the eye is turned to the extraordinary appearance of the sky above, where the unnatural clearness of a calm and silvery atmosphere presents itself, bounded by a dark hard line of stormy clouds, as if to mark the confines within which the efforts of man would be of no avail, the reader may imagine the sensation of awe which must accompany that of grandeur in the mind of the beholder.

ORIGIN OF THE CORONER'S JURY.

The following paragraph, which may convey some information to the unlearned public, we copy from a recent number of the London Times:

"A lady in London, having buried six husbands, united herself to the seventh. For months the newly married couple lived happily together, the lady frequently declaring that she had met with a good husband, all her former ones having disgusted her with drunkenness. To ascertain her real character, her seventh mate pretended drunkenness, which provoked reproaches and menaces. He returned home another evening, apparently very drunk, and, having gone to bed, affected to be asleep. While he was in that state, the wife took from her gown sleeve a piece of lead, which she melted, and then approaching her husband, attempted by means of a pipe, to pour it into his ear. He instantly started up, seized and accused her of the crime, which she could not deny. The bodies of six husbands were disinterred, when it was discovered that they all died by the same means. She was hung, amidst the execrations of the people. To this wholesale tragedy we are indebted for the law which forbids the interment of a body without a proper certificate of the nature of the disease which caused death. Until lately, a personal inspection by searchers was requisite; and to this fact also is the origin of the coroner's inquest attributed."

CHINESE LOVE OF MONEY.

Of all the men on the face of the globe, (and I have sojourned among several nations in my life, says a Canton correspondent of the Journal of Commerce,) I have never seen any equal to the Chinese in the love of money. It is said that this people have many idols, and so they have; but they are all worshiped as a means to an end; and their worship appears to be narrowed down to that one grand end—riches and the enjoyment of riches. Every city, and every street, nay, every house of every street, is dedicated to the god who brings riches. And impious would that man be esteemed, who neglected to light a taper, and burn three incense sticks every evening before that all-adorned idol. Even now, how do my ears ring with the exclamation of horror which burst from my landlord, some few evenings ago, when, on taking possession of his premises, his incense pot was thrown into the street. The landlord now, on his own accord, comes almost every evening to my study to join in reading the Bible, and uniting his prayer to the true God with the disciples.

THE MINT AT PHILADELPHIA.—The machinery in the mint is very beautiful. The engines are constructed in the very highest sense of mechanical perfection. Symmetry, power, and harmony of the parts, are all displayed in beholding the rapid motion and the silence with which the work is performed. Milling in the mint is an interesting process. A man takes a basket full of what appears to be the heads of copper nails, and proceeds to pile them flatwise into a brass candlestick setting closely against a steel millstone that goes swiftly and noiselessly round, catching every single nail head from the brass candlestick, and turning it into the shape of a pearl-edged button. These are given to the die, where, oddly enough, they are first authorized to live. Here, being popped into another candlestick, which holds them each a quarter of a second under the foot of a steel-bottomed lever, which keeps stamping away as if beating time to a perpetual soldier's hornpipe. The last process is the miracle, forming the dead and dingy buttons into a golden, glowing, bright-faced personality of every beholder's hopes.

A CASTLE OF CHEMICAL ICE.—At a lecture last month delivered at the London Western Institution, on the "Qualities and Uses of Ice," a remarkable object in the room was a model castle, with towers and battlements complete, the whole raised of chemically created ice from the manufactory of Lings and Leith, Prince street, Leicester square. The mode of manufacturing the ice is exceedingly simple, viz: A cylinder is half filled with pure cold water, and a preparation of soda being mixed with it, water in a tube, sizeable in proportion as the sylinder is large, freezes at a temperature of thirty-two degrees. The "patent ice safe" is an improvement on the ordinary safe by the introduction of closets that are kept cool by being supplied with ice compartments on either side, and further protected by other compartments filled with charcoal or a similar nonconducting substance.

VARIETY.

Towards the end of the fall may be often observed in the field, marks of footsteps, which appear to have scorched the grass like heated iron: a phenomenon formerly regarded with superstitious dread, but can now be explained upon very simple chemical principles. When the grass becomes crisp by frost, it is exceedingly brittle, and the foot of a man, or even a child, is sufficiently heavy to break it completely down, and effectually kill it; therefore, when the sun has thawed the frosty rime from the fields, these foot-tracks appear brown and bare in the midst of the surrounding green grass.

Paper is now manufactured in all its stages by machinery, and thus, instead of a single sheet being made by hand as in the olden time, a stream of paper is poured out which would form a roll large enough to extend round the globe, if such length were desirable. The proprietors of one of these improved machines in England, it is said, spent the enormous sum of £40,000 in vain attempts to render it capable of determining the exact length of the roll, and at last accomplished the object at the suggestion of a bystander, by a strap revolving on an axis, at a cost of three shillings and sixpence!

A good man—he must have been conscientious and verdant also—residing in the country, and employed as a sort of agricultural laborer, having contrived to scrape together fifty dollars, took it to his employer with a request that he would take charge of it for him. The request was complied with. The year rolled round, and the laborer applied to another friend to know what would be the interest upon it. He was told three dollars. "Well," said he, "I wish you would lend me three dollars for a few days. My boss has been keeping fifty dollars for me for a year, and I want to pay him the interest for it!" This is true, says the Commercial Advertiser.

It is related of a farmer on Long Island, that he planted an ordinary field of fourteen acres with suckers from the locust, (a native of this country,) on the year of his marriage, as a portion for his children. His eldest son married at twenty-two. On this occasion the farmer cut about fifteen hundred dollars' worth of timber out of his locust wood, which he gave his son to buy a settlement in Lancaster county. Three years after, he did as much for his daughter. And thus he provided for his whole family; the wood in the meantime repairing by suckers all the losses it suffered.

Pitcairn's island was visited on the 26th of Feb. by the British Government brig Spy. The officers went ashore and were received by Geo. Adams, son of the founder of the colony. They met with a cordial welcome, and after partaking of a repast in Adams' old cottage, the party returned on board the Spy. Forty-six whalers, mostly American, had called during the year 1846. It will be remembered that this Island (in the South Pacific Ocean) was settled about half a century ago by several Englishmen, mutineers of an English ship, who took with them Otaheitan women.

The N. Y. Tribune says that among the members elected to the Legislative bodies and Executive stations of the Cherokee Nation, we notice the following queer names: Tsoo-wa-loo-gi, Standing Deer, Wee-lie Too-wah-lie, Six Killer, Bark Flute, Takestaskee, Wrinkle-sides, Lightningbug Bowels, The Mortar. Some of the unsuccessful candidates were: Feel-him, Coo-la-chi, Tiger, Ahsena Bag, Tuh-ye-skee, Laugh-at-Mush, Chicken Cock, Ah-quah-tah-kee, Um-mer-su-ya, and Chu-wah-chucker.

An important invention has been brought into use near Philadelphia, by means of which all perishable articles, fruit and vegetable, and even animal, can be preserved for months, and even years. It consists of an immense chamber, so cut off from the influences of heat as always to be at an uniform temperature, a degree or so above the freezing point. There is hardly a perishable article which has not been experimented upon with perfect success.

A man asked another, which was the heaviest, a quart of rum or a quart of water. "Rum, most assuredly," said the other, "for I saw a man who weighed 220 pounds staggering under a quart of rum, when he could have carried a gallon of water with ease."

Adieu is an expression of farewell, familiarly used by classic people; but its derivation, which is a beautiful one, is not generally known. It comes from the friend a Dieu—to God—implying I depart from you, but leave you to the protection of Heaven.

The man of the world looks to himself, and calls those things evil that are displeasing to himself. The Christian looks to God, and calls those things evil which are displeasing to Him.

Many of our greatest men have sprung from humble origin, as the lark, whose nest is on the ground, soars highest in the air. Narrow circumstances are the most powerful stimulants to mental expansion, and the early frowns of fortune the best security for her final smiles.

"Never mind him," said Sir Joshua Reynolds to a friend who complained of the sarcasms of a witty enemy—"never mind him, he only shows his sense of his own inferiority." 'T is ever the least in talent who becomes malignant and abusive.

A person residing in England placed an effigy in his garden to frighten the birds, but soon one of the family, on examining the scare-crow, found in one of the pockets a nest ready for the reception of eggs.

Every man certainly has a fair right to live, and the duty of every just man is, to let him live. Blessed be the day, if come it ever should, when man will learn that his own true prosperity is essentially involved in the prosperity of his neighbor.

Evils in the journey of life are like the hills which alarm travelers upon the road; they both appear great at a distance, but when we approach them we find they are far less insurmountable than we had conceived.

Eternity was well defined by a Parisian mute, on a public exhibition occasion: 'Eternity has neither birth, death, youth, infancy, nor old age. It is to-day, without either yesterday or to-morrow.'

THE DAILY NATIONAL WHIG is published in the city of Washington, every day, at three o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted, and served to subscribers in the City, at the Navy Yard, in Georgetown, in Alexandria, and in Baltimore, the same evening, at six and a quarter cents a week, payable to the sole agent of the Whig, G. L. Gillchrist, Esq., or his order. It is also mailed to any part of the United States for $4 per annum, or $2 for six months, payable in advance. Advertisements of ten lines or less inserted one time for 50 cents, two times for 75 cents, three times for $1, one week for $1 75, two weeks for $2 75, one month for $4, two months for $7, three months for $10, six months for $16, one year for $20, payable always in advance.

The "National Whig" is what its name indicates. It speaks the sentiments of the Whig party of the Union on every question of public policy. It advocates the election to the Presidency of Zachary Taylor, subject to the decision of a Whig National Convention. It makes war to the knife upon all the measures and acts of the Administration deemed to be adverse to the interests of the country, and exposes without fear or favor the corruptions of the party in power. Its columns are open to every man in the country, for the discussion of political or any other questions.

In addition to politics, a large space in the National Whig will be devoted to publications upon Agriculture, Mechanics, and other useful arts, Science in general, Law, Medicine, Statistics, &c. Choice specimens of American and Foreign Literature will also be given, including Reviews, &c. A weekly list of the Patents issued by the Patent Office will likewise be published—the whole forming a complete family newspaper.

The "Weekly National Whig," one of the largest newspapers in the United States, is made up from the columns of the Daily National Whig, and is published every Saturday, for the low price of $2 per annum, payable in advance. A double sheet of eight pages will be given whenever the press of matter shall justify it.

The Memoirs of General Taylor, written expressly for the National Whig, are in course of publication. They commenced with the second number, a large number of copies of which have been printed, to supply calls for back numbers.

CHAS. W. FENTON,
Proprietor of the National Whig.

P. S. All daily, weekly, and semi-weekly papers in the United States are requested to insert this advertisement once a week for six months, noticing the price for publishing the same at the bottom of the advertisement, and send the paper containing it to the National Whig office, and the amount will be duly remitted. Our editorial brethren are also requested to notice the National Whig in their reading columns.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, IRA SAYLES, } Principals,

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

OUR COUNTRY AND ITS LAWS.

We have examined a few of the laws pertaining to the District of Columbia. We will briefly notice a few more, and proceed to the consideration of others more extended in influence. The following has existed ever since Washington became the seat of General Government, in 1801:—"A slave convicted of setting fire to a building, shall have his head cut off, and his body cut into quarters, and the parts set up in the most public places." Again, an Act of May 15, 1820, gave the local authority of Washington power to "punish corporeally any slave for a breach of any ordinance." In the same year, Congress passed a law authorizing the WHITE citizens of Washington to elect WHITE city officers, thus making a white skin an indispensable qualification for office. Now these white officers, on the 31st of May, 1827, enacted, that if any colored person should play cards, or look on and see others of the same color play, he should be fined not exceeding five dollars. Or, if he should appear out of his own house after ten o'clock at night, without a pass from some white man, he might be compelled to pass the rest of the night in a lock-up house. For swearing, or drunkenness, the colored man might be fined ten dollars. We should raise no special objection to most of the last-mentioned Acts, provided they were equal in their bearing. But what language can express the ineffable foolishness, and superlative turpitude, of that distinction on account of color, nowhere found in the precepts of Christianity, or the dictates of common-sense. Upon what system of ethics is the proposition founded that an act performed by a man colored black, is criminal, and yet the same act is not criminal if done by a man colored white? This principle, insulting as it is to the dignity of manhood, opposed as it is to every prompting of the unperverted heart, and blasphemous as it is against the God who created of one blood all nations of the earth, nevertheless enters largely into the code of morals adopted by almost every community. That wicked prejudice which compels the blacks, however virtuous and talented, to occupy the second place in all social relations—which points them to the "negro pew" when they enter the sanctuary of the negro's God, and gives them second-class cars and deck passages on our thoroughfares—is a legitimate offspring of the parent tree. Shame on such a senseless perversion of Republicanism and Christianity!

2d. The General Government is responsible for the existence of slavery in the States; for Florida, Louisiana, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, &c., were once territories, under the exclusive control of Congress. There, on her own soil, Government planted and hoed the noxious weed, the bitter fruit of which she is now reaping. Again, the National Government is constitutionally bound to make sure to every State a republican form of government. Now, any government that enslaves men is not republican. The governments of fifteen States in this Union do enslave men. Therefore, they are anti-republican; consequently, constitutionally null and void.

3d. Not only is this withering Upas cultivated in States bounded north by Mason & Dixon's line, but its seeds have been wafted, on the wings of national legislation, to every foot of soil in the United States, as many can testify who have from time to time been compelled to swallow its bitter dregs. Let that unfortunate man in Pennsylvania testify, whose wife and loved offspring, when locked in the arms of slumber, were torn from his embrace, and hurried, ere the morning dawned, away to perpetual slavery. Think of that man and his feelings, when, in frantic agony, he appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, which, instead of restoring happiness to this ruined family, sanctioned the deed of hell by authority of national law. This law has been in force since the 12th of February, 1793. It authorizes the slave-hunter, with gun and dog, to pursue the fleeing fugitive to any part of any State, and there lay his blood-hound clutches upon him. But not only so; he may seize whom he pleases. No matter if it be ex-President Adams or Van Buren, provided he makes oath before some magistrate that they have been his slaves, and escaped. The children above alluded to had never been slaves. Yet their capture was legal, and so would be the capture of "the old man eloquent." Reader, so would yours and mine. Have we ever sanctioned this law? But we have not yet scanned it. It not only allows bad men to do wrong, but forbids good men to do right. Rev. Owen Lovejoy, of Ohio, was a Christian. The Christianity he taught and practiced inculcated love to man, to be manifested by feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, sheltering the shelterless. He did so. The poor, helpless, hungry, naked, shivering victim of wrong and affliction, knocked at his door in the darkness of night. He sheltered it from the pelting storm, fed, clothed, and bid God speed. John Van Zandt, of the same State, did the same deed of benevolence. God, religion, humanity, bade them do so. They obeyed. The clutches of this law were fastened upon them. The one was fined $500; the other $1,700. A law so glaringly, so manifestly distinctive of every thing good and true, needs only to be looked upon to be hated. The philanthropist looks on it, and weeps, and wonders at nothing more than that it exists in the nineteenth century, in Christian America. He sees the panting fugitive, a child of God, born in the United States, the birth place of Washington and Patrick Henry, fleeing under cover of night, drinking the dew and eating the berries, from the bloody fangs of soul-rusting tyranny, and seeking safety under the protecting wing of a monarchy, nor daring to pause till the more congenial air wafted over British soil bids him stop and be free. Unwilling that the poor boon of living in Canada should be secure, the House of Representatives requested the President, on the 10th of May, 1828, to communicate with the British Government, and secure if possible the return of fugitives from Canada. This disgraceful resolution passed unanimously. Previous to this, in three successive communications, the Secretary of State [Mr. Clay] urged our Minister in London to secure such a stipulation as should shut the doors of Canada against fugitives. Thus has American diplomacy steeped itself in the dirty waters of a system which not only England and other powers of Europe, but piratical Algiers, have became ashamed of and abolished. But the list is too voluminous to pursue farther. Reference might be made to the invasion of Florida for the security of slavery, the invasion of Mexico for the same end, the national slave-trade, the efforts to prevent the abolition of slavery in Cuba, and many other acts equally opposed to the genius of our Magna Charta. Such has been the unwavering devotion of a nation to human bondage, whose Constitution was adopted to secure the blessings of liberty, and established justice. Who will rise and redeem our violated perverted Constitution, and our Christian name?

WORK OF GOD AMONG SEAMEN.

A sailor rose in the conference meeting of Rev. I. R. Steward's church, and gave the following thrilling account:—Between two and three years ago, he shipped in the Siberia, from Boston, bound, I think, for Calcutta. He had heard that there were two religious sailors on board, members of Mr. Steward's church, and being then but a scoffer himself, he thought that he should have a rare chance for fun in ridiculing them on the voyage. He thought piety in a sailor a very ludicrous thing, and over two such companions of the forecastle, he expected often to make himself and others quite merry all the way to India. Soon after he came on board, he said in a jocular way to a sailor, a stranger, "Well, I learn that there are a couple of pious fellows in our crew?" The stranger looked up at him with a meek, but earnest glance, and said, "Yes, sir, and I hope I am one of them." Then, before he could say any thing, a third sailor standing by, added, "And I hope I am the other!" Never was a man more crest-fallen than the scorner then. "My sport," says he, "was all over. Surely, said I, to myself, these men are Christians—the genuine kind—they are not ashamed or afraid to show their colors." He was led to reflection, and with their advice and prayer, he was soon led to the Saviour. These three sailors established a prayer-meeting in the forecastle, and six more sailors were converted before they arrived in India. Moreover, while their ship stopped at the Island of Mauritius, sailors from other vessels in port frequently came on board, and attended their prayer-meetings, and several conversions took place among them. Thus have those two sailors succeeded in laboring for God, and scattered the influence of the New York Bethel over the globe.

THE SOUL RESIGNED TO CHRIST.

When a soul is busy asking after Jesus Christ, if it be inquired, "What would you do with him?" "Why this is my purpose," will it say, "I would worship him; I would not only be saved by him, but I would fall down and adore him, and acknowledge him my King; and if I had any thing better than another, I would offer it him." "But what hast thou? Hast thou rich persons for him?" "Alas! no, I am a foolish and a poor creature, and I have nothing to offer." "Nothing! Hast thou a heart?" "Yes, a heart I have: but, alas! there can be nothing more unfit for him; it is dark, and foul, and hard: all disorder and filthiness." "Yet wilt thou give it to him as it is, and be willing that he use and dispose of it as it pleases him?" "Oh that he would accept of it, that he would take it upon any terms! Here it is: if it would fly out from this offer, I would he would lay hold of it! O that it were once received by him; that it were in his hand, and then let him do with it what seems him good!" "Sayest thou so? Then it is done. Give it really and freely, and he will take and make it better, at its worst, than all the gold, and frankincense, and myrrh, of all those rich countries where they abound; and will purify, rectify, and make it quite another thing than it is; and it shall never repent thee to have made a gift of it to him. He shall frame it to his own likeness, and in return will give thee himself, and be thine forever." [Leighton.

ENTERING IN AT THE CELESTIAL GATE.

BY W. B. TAPPAN.

"Now just as the gates were opened to let in the men, I looked in after them, and behold the city shone like the sun; the streets also were paved with gold; and in them walked many men with crowns upon their heads, palms in their hands, and golden harps to sing praises withal." "There were also of them that had wings; and they answered one another without intermission, saying, 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord.' And after that, they shut up the gates; which, when I had seen, I wished myself among them."—[Pilgrim's Progress.

Would I were with them! They are free
From all the cares they knew below,
And strangers to the strife that we
Encounter in this vale of wo.
From storms of sorrow and of pain
Forever are they garnered in,
Secure from sad defilement's stain,
The mildew and the blight of sin.

Would I were with them! They embrace
The loved ones, lost, long years before;
What joy to gaze upon the face
That never shall be absent more!
There friends unite, who parted here
At Death's cold river, O how sadly!
Forgotten are the sigh and tear,
Their hearts are leaping—O how gladly!

Would I were with them! They behold
Their Saviour, glorious and divine;
They touch the cups of shining gold,
And in his kingdom drink new wine.
How flash, like gems, their brilliant lyres
Along the sparkling walls of heaven,
When from the radiance-catching fires,
The song of songs to Christ is given!

Would I were with them! While without
Are sighs and weeping, they, within,
For every joy and gladness shout,
And well they may, who 're free from sin!
O this, indeed, is heaven above;
This fills the bliss of every soul—
To grow in holiness and love,
As age on age shall ceaseless roll.

DR. CHALMERS.

He is apparently at the age of about fifty-five, with a short, thick-set, clumsy form, and a heavy, pock-broken face, exhibiting no external indications of talent. The first sentence he uttered showed, that the refinements of education have not divested his pronunciation of the broad Scotch accent, which is sometimes so marked, as to render his language scarcely intelligible to an English ear. It is not improbable that these national peculiarities of dialect have added somewhat to his popularity with the lower classes, although he has a much more substantial foundation for his fame.

Dr. Chalmers has none of the graces of oratory, either as it regards his elocution or his gestures. Both of these are positively bad. The effect of his preaching arises from vigor of thought, boldness of conception, and earnestness of manner. He throws himself forward as if he would pitch headlong from the pulpit; he clenches his white pocket handkerchief firmly in his fist, and brings down his hand, as if smiting some one at his feet; this gesture is uniform, answering fully to what Hamlet call "sawing the air," and nothing but the conviction that it is wholly involuntary can reconcile it to the hearer; the orator seems convulsed with the throes of thought, and the grandeur of his periods, rolling out, one after another in rapid succession, leaves the mind little time for dwelling on minor considerations.

His manner approaches very nearly to what in our country would be called methodistical. For some minutes he continues to kindle gradually, and the tones of his voice grow louder and louder, till he fairly thunders. As he ascends these climaxes of all that is sublime in imagery, or violent in gesture, the listener sits astounded at the bolts which are falling around him. The audience is silent as death, and "the boldest holds his breath for a time." Then comes a respite—a break, in which the language of the speaker is in an under-tone, so low as to be scarcely audible. I cannot illustrate his manner better, than by comparing it to a torrent of his native hills, which at one time, rushes impetuously down its rugged bed, and then glides away in a deep and silent current.

THE SUTTEE.

When a wealthy Hindoo of any rank dies, his widow is immediately visited by the priests and brahmins, not for the purpose of sympathizing or praying with her, but to give her her choice, whether to be burnt on the funeral pile of her husband as a sacrifice, or have her head shaved and be sent away in disgrace and infamy to a state of perpetual seclusion. Large numbers prefer being burnt, because it is regarded as so disgraceful to refuse.

Mr. Campbell, when in India, had an opportunity of seeing one of these exhibitions, of the cruelties of heathenism, and has given the following vivid description of the scene. Of the poor woman, he says:—

"I saw her pacing her appointed circuits around the pile. I saw her ascend the bed of death, and tied to the dead body of her husband. I saw her take her jewels from her ears, her neck, and the various members of her body, and distribute them as parting memorials to her friends. I saw her son—whom she had nurtured, and whom she had nursed—take the torch into his hand, and in several places kindle the flame that was to consume his mother. I saw the servants of iniquity cut the ropes to let the canopy of fagots fall upon her head to crush her and to prevent her escape; and as the flames ascended and as the pile became one mass of fire, I heard the horrid yell and the shout of exultation from the surrounding multitude, to drown the shrieks of their victim in the plaudits of their joy. O! I thought I was standing on the borders of the infernal lake. I wondered that the earth did not open her mouth to devour the perpetrators of this horrid murder. Ye mothers of Israel! Ye whom the gospel has elevated to your proper rank! Pity your sex who are thus degraded in India."

Efforts have been made by the English Government to prevent these cruelties, but as yet they have not been wholly successful. Many victims are sacrificed in this manner, every year. Let the gospel be preached and believed throughout Hindostan, and suttees will be unknown. The people, of their own accord, will abandon them, because they will then be convinced of the folly, the cruelty, and the wickedness of such murderous ceremonies. Reader, will you not aid by your prayers and your contributions in the accomplishment of so glorious an object? [Macedonian.

HOW TO MAKE THINGS EASY.

There are a multitude of prescriptions, new and old, and plenty of people to take any nostrum any body may set afloat, to get things to be easy. But we fell in with one the other day, widely differing from most of the counsels of our day on this point. But it pleased us much. That most worthy and excellent divine, John Newton, some sixty years ago, wrote, thus: "When I can find my heart in frame and liberty for prayer, every thing else is comparatively easy." Some people who may have glanced at the heading of this article, may not thank us much for fishing up out of antiquity such an old fashioned way of living comfortably. They had heard of this a thousand times, likely, and they wanted to hear of something new.

Had heard of it! But had they tried it? Newton had, and found it a capital remedy for trouble. And people farther back than he had tried it, and instead of scoffing at it, came out with precisely his conclusion. "Is any afflicted? let him pray," is a presciption given to the world without a fee, near upon twenty centuries ago. And more people than we have time to tell of, have used it, and it has done its work without a single failure.

Devout prayer makes the heart and conscience easy. These are the principal wheels. Get these right, and keep them so, and the whole machinery will run smoothly and pleasantly. The wheels grow dreadfully rusty without prayer, and it is very hard to start them; and when they go at all, they are in danger of breaking, or are sure to go creaking painfully on their way.

Much prayer puts one at ease with God. It is obedience to his will. It is the way of access to him. We then get under the shadow of his wings. We come over to his side, and get harmony of soul with him. And then there is such peace and joy in the heart, that it takes a very stiff breeze of worldly adversity to trouble us much; and when there is such a breeze, we have only to enter still farther into the secret place of the Most High, to the assurance of finding that consolation which the severest hurricanes of life can never sweep away.

And it should once more be said, that prayer makes one easy in circumstances most liable of all others to produce uneasiness. There is nothing that so effectually stirs the depths of the soul, and rouses hateful passions, and makes the blood hot, as the unprovoked ill-treatment of others. It is hard for a man to be easy when scoffed at, ridiculed, or actually injured by those about him. But we have an arrow for this mark. "Pray for them that despitefully use and persecute you."

Prayer is the oil cast upon the troubled waters. They can not rage and foam with this kind of pressure upon them. Prayer will bring one so nigh the infinitely benevolent God, that it will make one ashamed to be seen having any such vile drapery about him as any of the malignant passions. Nearness to so kind a being as God, will cause such passions to appear so hateful, that the soul will turn them out of doors in the greatest haste possible. [Boston Rec.

THE GOSPEL IN JAMAICA.

A remarkable instance of the power of the gospel was given in the case of a mulatto female, a person of some little property, and a proprietor of slaves. Of a most overbearing and tyranical disposition, her conduct towards the unhappy victims of her power was cruel in the extreme. Her house was situated in the country near a public road, and it was proverbial that no one could pass her gate, scarcely at any hour of the day, without hearing the cries and groans of her wretched vassals under the infliction of punishment. Of these, none so often felt the effects of her passion as an aged negress, for praying. A missionary went into the parish, in the hope of securing a piece of land on which to form a preaching station. Disappointed in his expectation, through the influence of a white planter and magistrate, he was returning home, depressed in mind at the apparent hopelessness of further attempts to introduce the gospel into that benighted district, when he was met on the road by this female, attended by several of her neighbors. She heard of his failure, and after expressing herself in strong language against the leading men of the parish for combining to keep religion out of it, requested him to follow her. They ascended a piece of rising ground a little beyond her cottage, and looking round, her eye kindled with animation, she exclaimed, "They want to keep religion out of the parish, but, minister, here is an acre of land; take it, I will give it you; build a chapel upon it; and let them touch it if they dare."* The offer was accepted, and her cheerful consent also given to the occupation of her house or premises for occasional services without delay. These services were accordingly commenced; and for some time, in fine weather, were carried on beneath the shade of a mango tree that spread its wide branches by the side of her cottage. She was denounced and threatened for her conduct by the parish authorities, but with the spirit of a true heroine she ridiculed their menaces, and challenged any one to come upon her premises for the purpose either of molesting her or interrupting the worship. On one occasion, when the missionary was preaching beneath the tree to a considerable number of the poor slaves, a party of white men rode up to her gate, at the sight of whom the whole congregation were agitated, and were about to fly into the woods; she immediately advanced towards the party, and shouted to them to come in; but before she reached the gate they had galloped away. The converting and sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit soon took possession of her heart; and after several months probation she was to be baptized, with several others, in a river that flowed along a part of the boundary of her little domain. The ceremony was performed at the appointed time, amidst a great concourse of spectators. The missionary regained the cottage before her. Her aged slave, whom she had so often punished for her steadfastness to Christ, was left at home to make some arrangements for the future services of the day. Scarcely had the missionary seated himself, when the tall, withered form of the old African disciple appeared before him as though paralyzed; her eyes alternately fixed on some object out of doors, and her clasped hands directed ecstatically towards heaven; he sprang from his seat to ascertain the cause, when he discovered among the trees a tall, noble-looking figure clothed in white, approaching the door. It was her mistress. In a moment they were in each other's arms, and the floor was literally sprinkled with their tears. "O, my misses," said the aged slave, "who ever tink me live to see dis day? Blessed Jesus, make him poor old neger eye see such a ting before her dead." While her mistress, now no longer a mistress, but a sister beloved, implored forgiveness for her past conduct, and ascribed all the glory of her change to God. A more affecting scene was never witnessed, and never can be obliterated from the memory. O, the transforming efficacy of redeeming grace and dying love! the "Lion changed into a lamb,

The vulture to a dove."

The tyrant and the slave, one in Christ Jesus, falling on each other's necks and weeping tears of joy! Surely it was a spectacle that attracted the admiration of angels! [Phillipico.

AFFECTING INCIDENT.

A woman it the state of the greatest distress rushed last evening into the shop of M. Reusset, an apothecary, rue de Jouy. She carried a little girl, of about ten years of age, covered with shreds of clothing blackened by flames. The shopkeeper, seeing that the child was in a horrible state from burning, the skin being completely corroded, the flesh falling in pieces at the slightest touch, and the bones themselves appearing to be calcined, hastened to render assistance, and whilst doing so he addressed several questions to the mother without, however, being able to obtain any reply. All at once he was supprised to hear the child address him, she being, on the very brink of death. The little girl stated that her mother had told her to warm her father's soup, and whilst lighting a fire for that purpose the flames caught her dress and spread all over her person. Being in a distant part of the house, her cries brought no assistance, and she rolled on the floor in the hope of extinguishing the flames, until she became senseless. In making this statement, not a word of complaint escaped the lips of the child, and she bore the dressing of her injuries, which must have caused her acute pain, with extraordinary fortitude. "My poor mother," said she, "has grief enough; I suffer cruelly, and am about to die. Why, then, should I add to her sorrow by cries which would not save me?" The heroic little creature was conveyed to the Hotel Dieu, where in two hours she breathed her last. [Galignani.

CONSOLATION IN THE PROVIDENCE OF GOD.—"Whatever way I turned," says Mungo Park, in one of his travels, "nothing appeared but danger and difficulty. I saw myself in the midst of a vast wilderness, in the depth of the rainy season, naked and alone, surrounded by savage animals, and men still more savage. I was five hundred miles from the nearest European settlement. At this moment, painful as my reflections were, the extraordinary beauty of a small moss irresistibly caught my eye. I mention it to show from what trifling circumstances the mind will sometimes derive consolation; far though the whole plant was not larger than the top of one of my fingers, I could not contemplate the delicate conformation of its roots and leaves without admiration. Can that Being, thought I, who planted, watered, and brought it to perfection in this obscure part of the world, a thing which appears of so small importance, look with unconcern upon the situation and sufferings of creatures formed after his own image?—Surely not. I started up, and disregarding both hunger and fatigue, traveled forward, assured that relief was at hand; and I was not disappointed."

VIRTUE.—The following brief but beautiful passage is from the Albany Citizen:—"The creations of the sculptor may moulder into dust; the wealth of the bard may wither; the throne of the conqueror may be shivered by an opposing power into atoms; the fame of the warrior may no longer be hymned by the recording minstrel; the hope may be disappointed; but that which hallows the cottage and sheds a glory around the palace—VIRTUE, shall never decay. It is celebrated by the angels of God—it is written on the pillars of heaven, and reflected down to earth."

Man is not taught any thing to the purpose till God becomes his teacher, and then the glare of the world is put out, and the value of the soul rises in full view. A man's present sentiments may not be accurate, but we make too much of sentiments. We pass a field with a few blades; we call it a field of wheat; but here is no wheat in perfection; but wheat is sown, and full ears may be expected.

OUR ANNIVERSARIES.

The recent gathering of our denomination at DeRuyter, we trust, will long be remembered by those who participated in the occasion. We have not time to write much, but if the Lord was not with us, we have entirely mistaken the character of our feelings and exercises. Such manifestations of Christian love, such a disposition to yield each to the feelings of the other, such a drawing together of hearts of brethren from the east, west, and middle portions of the denomination, such a desire to let all minor differences go, and to come up in unison to the great work to which God has called us, we have not witnessed for many a day. Heaven grant that such seasons may be often renewed. Could our dear brethren and their wives, whom we have sent out to a heathen land, have witnessed the interest which was elicted in behalf of the Missionary cause, and heard, as we did, the fervent supplications to God for it and for them, it would have inspired them with new courage. We think we do not mistake the spirit of our people, when we say that they will sustain the Foreign Mission to the utmost of their ability. Yes, and Home Mission also; for we have no doubt that the late meeting has served to give an impulse to every department of missionary labor. Our Tract Society, we trust, will also be sustained hereafter with increased energy. True, our operations in this line during the past year have been very limited. We are ashamed that so meagre an account must go to the world. But we are not disheartened; another year will tell a very different story. We may hereafter express ourselves more fully in regard to the action which our people should take in our Missionary and Tract Societies. In the mean time we can not forbear saying, that those who were not present at our Anniversaries have lost much. Many of our people seem not to understand how there can be so much of a soul-reviving and edifying nature connected with these meetings; and they never will know, until they attend and see for themselves. There is, however, a decided improvement in this respect. Another year will probably show a greater improvement. The slowness with which we recover from our long apathy, calls for the most decided activity on the part of those who have begun to be awake. Never had we greater responsibilities resting on us than we now have. Never, perhaps, was there a crisis in the world's affairs, when God demanded so much at our hands.

We give below the account of our meetings at DeRuyter.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE TRACT SOCIETY.

The American Sabbath Tract Society held its fourth Anniversary at DeRuyter, Madison Co., N. Y., on fifth-day, Sept. 16, 1847. Eld. Nathan V. Hull, the President of the Society, took the chair, and gave out the 498th hymn of "Christian Psalmody," after singing which, the throne of grace was addressed by Eld. Wm. B. Maxson.

A question arose soon after the opening of the meeting, in relation to the reception of the delegates of auxiliary societies. By a rule of the Executive Board, auxiliaries are required to report themselves to the Board, giving a list of their officers, whereupon they may be received, and become entitled to the privilege of sending delegates. But for the present meeting several delegates were admitted from auxiliary societies which had not complied with this rule. A hope was expressed, however, that there would not hereafter be any occasion for setting the rule aside.

The Treasurer's Report was presented and read by Paul Stillman. From this it seems that the receipts have been somewhat smaller during the past year than heretofore, owing, probably, in part, to the extra effort which has been made to raise funds for the Foreign Mission. About five hundred dollars, however, has been received and expended since the last report in carrying forward the objects of the Society.

The Annual Report of the Board of Directors was read by Eld. Samuel Davison. It commenced by alluding to the fact that the receipts of the Society had been small and the operations consequently limited. It was determined at an early period to employ no agents, or tract distributors at the expense of the Society, but to make the American Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association the principal medium through which to distribute such tracts as the Board thought prudent to appropriate to gratuitous distribution. Tracts to a considerable amount have accordingly been furnished to the missionaries of that Association. Besides this, tracts have been furnished for gratuitous distribution whenever an opportunity has offered which promised much usefulness. The Board presented to the Society for consideration, the question whether it would be expedient to employ a suitable person as a General Agent, who should devote his whole energies to the advancement of the objects contemplated in its organization. Since the last Anniversary, the Board have been enabled to stereotype and print three additional publications. The first, (Tract No. 10, of 16 pp.,) is entitled "The True Sabbath Embraced and Observed, by Eld. Samuel Davison." It is designed to show the operation of the truth in bringing the writer to a knowledge of God's Sabbath, and also to show some of the difficulties through which he was led. The second, (Tract No. 11, of 16 pages,) is entitled, "Religious Liberty endangered by Legislative Enactments, an Appeal to the Friends of Equal Rights and Religious Freedom," presented to the General Conference at Shiloh, N. J., in September last. It is designed to show the evil tendency of the Sunday laws now in existence. The third publication is a book of 168 pages, in defense of the Sabbath, written by George Carlow, in reply to Mr. Ward's Treatise on the Fourth Commandment. A branch depository has been established at Alfred, N. Y., for the purpose of furnishing to individuals who may wish tracts for circulation, a supply with less difficulty. A large part of the Report was occupied with encouraging extracts from journals, letters, &c., designed to show the great usefulness of the Society's publications.

Eld. W. B. Gillett, moved the adoption of the Report, and its publication under the supervision of the Board of Directors. He thought that such a detail of what had been done by the Society during the year could not fail to interest and encourage every friend of the tract cause. Several other speakers followed, who alluded to suggestions made in different parts of the Report, and all of whom seemed to regard the facts which it presented as quite cheering.

The subject of Sunday Laws was brought up in connection with certain suggestions in the Report of th Board of Directors. Several brethren engaged in its discussion, among whom were Eli S. Bailey, Wm. B. Maxson, James H Cochran, James Bailey, Leman Andrus, Samuel Davison, T. B. Brown, and David Dunn. The only point of difference between the speakers seemed to be in relation to the policy of asking legal protection upon the Sabbath for ourselves, (as the friends in the State of New York have done for years past,) and of asking the entire abolition of all Sunday laws. After a free and somewhat lengthy comparison of views upon the subject, the following resolution was passed:—

Resolved, That the laws of most of the States of the Union, which enjoin the observance of the first day of the week, and consequently subject the observers of the Sabbath to numberless social annoyances and civil vexations, are oppressive, and in violation of the spirit of our National Constitution, which guaranties to every man the rights of conscience, and prohibits any preference of one sect over another.

A resolution was presented by Eld. Varnum Hull, "that the present agitated state of the Christian world requires us to be zealously engaged in the diffusion of our denominational sentiments through the medium of tracts and other suitable publications." In advocating this resolution, Bro. Hull stated a great many facts designed to show the actual state of the Christian world, particularly in relation to the Sabbath. He believed that the views heretofore entertained, were by many either seriously doubted or held with very little tenacity. This renders it easy to find readers for tracts and other Sabbath publications, which he thought it would be highly criminal to neglect to furnish. He was followed by Elds. N. V. Hull and Eli S. Bailey. The latter expressed the opinion that the world was in danger of losing all respect for Sunday, and abandoning it entirely, as had been done in France. Under such circumstances, he deemed the instilling into the minds of the community of true views in relation to the claims of the original and only heaven-appointed Sabbath, a work of immense importance. The resolution was unanimously passed.

The following resolution was presented by Eld. James H. Cochran:—

Resolved, That an increase of the number and variety of our publications is greatly needed, and that the churches of our connection be requested to favor this object by generous donations to the treasury of the Society.

Mr. Cochran advocated this resolution in a very earnest and effective manner. The public meetings upon the subject of the Sabbath, and most of the pulpits, he said, were closed against us. But the press can be employed, and the public mind is accessible through the medium of tracts and other publications. There should be, therefore, such a variety of them supplied, that every case can be met. It was his opinion, that our publications prepare the way for many of the unconverted to become consistent Sabbath-keepers whenever they are brought to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. He was followed, in the advocacy of the resolution, by Eld. Wm. B. Maxson, who insisted upon our ability to furnish the publications spoken of in the resolution. He also referred to the difficulty of obtaining such publications years ago, and the duty of making the most of the advantages we now enjoy.

The foregoing are the principal items of business transacted. The question of appointing a general agent was referred to the Board, in whose judgment respecting such things the utmost confidence was expressed. The next Anniversary was appointed to be held at Piscataway, N. J., on the sixth-day before the second Sabbath in September, 1848.

THE MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

The American Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association held its fifth Anniversary at DeRuyter, on sixth-day, Sept. 17th. The meeting was opened by singing the 800th Hymn from "Christian Psalmody," after which the President, Thomas B. Brown, delivered a short address expressive of his feelings respecting the present meeting.

Mr. Brown said he knew not whether all had come to the meeting with such feelings as he had; yet, as far as those feelings were not stamped with the impurity and selfishness of human nature, he could wish they might find a response in the hearts of all. Never had the denomination been called to attend so important a meeting. We had come, not for the purpose of deliberating upon points which concerned only a narrow sphere within the scope of our own personal observation; but we had come to enter upon deliberations in which the whole heathen world were interested. Myriads of souls might, peradventure, feel the effects of that day's proceedings. And when I reflect that we can not prosecute our work in a foreign land without coming under the notice of other Christian sects, and perhaps coming into collision with them by reason of our peculiarities, and consider what a mighty bearing this may ultimately have upon the whole character of Christian missions, I look upon this day's proceedings as invested with an importance beyond what ever attached to any of our denominational actions. The idea, when contemplated in all its possible and probable bearings, is indeed overwhelming. May God be present with us, and by the unction of his Holy Spirit, make us wise for the present undertaking.

Bro. James H. Cochran offered a short and fervent prayer. The Constitution was then read, several churches reported themselves auxiliary, and letters from them were read, while a list of delegates was being made out.

The Treasurer's Report was presented by Bro. A. D. Titsworth. We learn from it, that there was in hand at the last Anniversary, June 5, 1846, $1,234 44. There has been received since, from churches and private individuals, $1,691 74, making in all the sum of $2,926 18. This money, with the exception of $554 38, now in the treasury, has been expended in carrying forward the objects of the Society.

The Annual Report of the Executive Board was read by Bro. Thomas B. Brown. It commenced by alluding to the embarrassments which surrounded the Board three years ago from the want of men and means. These embarrassments have passed away, or at least become greatly diminished. During the year, Eld. V. Hull and Eld. Alexander Campbell have been employed for a time in collecting funds and preaching upon the subject of missions. Eld. A. A. F. Randolph has continued to occupy the field in Crawford Co., Pa., where a precious revival has been enjoyed. Eld. Azor Estee has performed a missionary tour in Massachusetts, where an opportunity was found to lecture to some extent upon the subject of the Sabbath. The missionaries designated to a foreign field have had a prosperous voyage to the land of their destination, where a wide field of usefulness is open before them. Their passage to China was obtained in a first class ship at $225 each. They were furnished with money to the amount of $500, and the same amount has since been remitted to them. The Report explains very fully and satisfactorily the reasons for changing the field of labor from Abyssinia to China. It is a lengthy and able production, and will soon be published in a form for extensive circulation. For this reason, as well as because we feel unable to do it justice, we shall not attempt to make a complete summary.

Eld. Wm. B. Maxson moved the adoption of the Report, and its publication under the direction of the Executive Board. He spoke of the change which had taken place in the appearance of things connected with the mission within two years past. In this change he thought he could see the hand of God, and a pledge that his blessing would attend it. He was followed by Eld. Nathan V. Hull and Geo. B. Utter.

The following resolution was presented by Eld. W. B. Gillett:—

Resolved, That we acknowledge with devout gratitude the care of our heavenly Father over those whom we sent out to preach the gospel to the heathen, in preserving them from the perils of the sea, and in encouraging them, after a successful voyage to the country which is to be the field of their labors; and that we will not cease to implore the blessing of the Most High.

This resolution was spoken to by Elds. Gillett and V. Hull, who enumerated some of the circumstances in which God's protection was manifested, and the encouragement properly derivable therefrom. After the adoption of the resolution, at the suggestion of James H. Cochran, the whole audience kneeled, while Eld. Hull led them in prayer, expressive of gratitude, and invoking continued protection.

Resolved, That in order to the successful prosecution of the missionary enterprise, the influences of the Holy Spirit are indispensible, and that we therefore request our brethren throughout our denomination to observe with renewed interest the monthly concert of prayer.

Eld. Eli S. Bailey spoke to this resolution in an earnest and eloquent manner. He referred to various examples recorded in Scripture of the power of prayer, and closed with urging the necessity of relying, not upon the lives of men, or the multiplication of means, but upon the sustaining and guiding hand of God. He was followed by James Bailey, Wm. B. Maxson, H. P. Burdick, and V. Hull.

The following resolution was presented by Samuel Davison, and seconded by Thomas B. Brown, both of whom sustained it by interesting and appropriate remarks:—

Resolved, That the providence of God calls us, as a denomination, to prosecute zealously the work of foreign missions; and that the cultivation of a right spirit in regard to this work ought to be an important object with our ministering brethren in their pastoral labors.

The following resolutions were presented and passed after brief remarks by different members of the body, among whom were H. P. Burdick, Gurdon Evans, James Bailey, Wm. B. Maxson, Samuel Davison, and James H. Cochran.

Resolved, That the Western States and Territories of our own country demand the united missionary efforts of the whole denomination.

Resolved, That in view of the great field now open for missionary labor, and which is daily becoming wider and wider, it becomes us to employ every available means to prepare laborers for the field, that when, under God's blessing, they are needed, many may rise up to say, "Here am I; send me."

Resolved, That while we would bow with submission to the dispensations of Him who doeth all things well, we lament the removal by death of Bro. Franklin W. Stillman, a member of the Executive Board, and a sincere friend of the missionary cause.

At an early stage of the meeting, a Committee was appointed to consider certain changes in the Constitution which had been proposed. They recommended but one change. According to the second article of the Constitution, "Societies, churches, or associations, may become auxiliary by contributing to the funds, and shall be entitled to one vote for every five dollars, but in no case shall one representative be entitled to more than one vote." The Committee recommended that the last part of this article, (which we give in italics,) should be stricken out. Their recommendation was unanimously adopted.

After a lengthy and exceedingly interesting session, the Association adjourned to meet at Piscataway, N. J., on the fifth day of the week before the second Sabbath in September, 1848.

EDWIN G. CHAMPLIN.

Progress of Romanism.—There is much said, and often great fears expressed by some people at the rapid spread of Romanism; especially in the United States, so great is their increase by immigration. Some even fearing that Papal influence will ultimately preponderate in our elections, and finally control all our institutions, as well as those of Great Britain. The new and startling movements of the Puseyites, which have resulted in the apostacy of so many clergymen of the Established Church—the changing of chapels and churches to mass houses—the indifference with which these things are looked upon by the dignitaries of the church, have awakened serious anxiety in that country. But in estimating the true advance of Romanism we must look at it as a whole. Admitting that there have been many defections in England, that the Episcopal Church has furnished its quota for Rome, and that there are many others who turn towards her a kindly side, still that does not prove that she is marching to universal conquest with steady and giant strides. Nor does the declaration that she has "commenced a crusade against the world," prove that she has or will conquer the world. There is much for her to do yet before that is the case. In regard to their increase in this country, it must be remembered that the natural increase of the twenty millions of this country, who are Protestants, must be very great. It must also be taken into account that here great numbers have already forsaken the Romish Church. In New York, a congregation has been gathered, and an evangelical church formed from the Roman Catholics. So in Vermont. There are strong indications of such a movement on a large scale in Cincinnati. In addition to this, there are thousands of children who are becoming daily more and more assimilated to our customs, imbibing our education, and constantly breathing a free air, which is fitting them for better things. The Bible is finding its way into Roman Catholic families and silently working powerful changes. Abroad, the case is still brighter. In France, it is said that more than twenty thousand have renounced Popery and embraced an evangelical faith. The movement in Germany, in which one hundred and fifty thousand left the Church of Rome, is fresh in the minds of all. Light is dawning in Belgium. Asia is awaking from a long slumber. But while such is the flattering prospect of things, let us not idly fold our hands and wait to see the work go on; for this is the time—not for alarm, but—to work diligently and zealously. Whatever may be the truth, and whatever may be the end of these things, now is the time to be doing. ☞

Jewish Celebration.—We observed in one of the papers of last week a notice of the Jewish celebration of the creation of the world. Appended to which was a note, that an efficient police force would be in attendance to preserve order. The fact, that it is necessary to have a police force to preserve order at a religious celebration, is a painful comment on the state of that society, notwithstanding the professions to tolerate perfect freedom in religious sentiments and liberty to worship according to the dictates of conscience. ☞

"A PLEA FOR THE SABBATH IN PALESTINE."

Such is the heading of an article going the rounds, from the Constantinople correspondent of the New York Observer. The following paragraph from it shows the drift of the article and illustrates what has been repeatedly asserted, that it is impossible to create such a sense of obligation to keep the first day of the week as restrain even good men from desecrating it, when tempted to do so. Though they do not acknowledge it, still they feel that the fourth commandment applies to a different day, and when once they have begun to take liberties by changing the day, it is easy to take liberties in regard to the manner of observing it. Here is the paragraph:—

"During the present season, among the great variety of foreigners that find their way to Palestine, we have had some half a dozen companies of Christian travelers. Some of these are from the United States, and some from different denominations in Great Britain. Their Christian intercourse has cheered us, and we have been encouraged by their counsels and their prayers. But in one respect, their example has failed of being such as to promote the great object for which missionaries are laboring. All of them, with the exception perhaps of a single company, have traveled on the Sabbath. Some were anxious to reach a steamer that was to sail on a certan day; some found themselves on Sabbath morning in uncomfortable quarters, and could reach quieter lodgings, or perhaps a missionary station, by traveling a part of the day; and some thought that they could have more retirement on horseback than where they had spent the night. All thought themselves justified, and it is not for me to say that they were not. Some of them are men of high standing in the church, from whom on any occasion, I should esteem it a privilege to take advice, and and towards none of them would I consider myself worthy to take the attitude of a reprover."

Another Favorable Indication.—Under this head the Christian Palladium gives an account of a very interesting pamphlet which has been written and published in South Carolina, by a native of that State. Whether the author is known as such where he resides, is more than we can say. He simply signs himself "A South Carolinian." But what is still more singular, the pamphlet treats wholly of American Slavery, and, as a trite saying is, "handles it without mittens." The author shows up two points in the most conclusive manner. 1st. That slavery has impeded the growth and wealth of the slave states. And 2d. That slave labor is actually the dearest and most unprofitable labor employed. On both these points he evinces deep and thorough research. The numerical facts he presents in defense of his positions, are overwhelming, and his arguments clear and conclusive. He writes, not like a fanatic, but like a cool, deliberate, and thorough reasoner. Such a publication, not coming from the North, but originating in South Carolina, the most inveterate slave state of the whole fraternity, must and will do good. The genius of liberty is not idle even in the south.

Colleges of New York.—Dr. Hale, President of Geneva College, in his late Baccalaureate address, states that according to a report of the Comptroller made to the Senate last February, Union College has received from the State $374,000, besides 5,500 acres of land; Columbia College $44,755, besides the botanic garden in the city of New York, valued thirty years ago at $74,000; and Hamilton College $106,000. In 1838 an Act was passed granting to the University of the City of New York, and to Geneva College, each an annuity of $6,000, all for five years and "until otherwise directed by law," which annuities have been paid until interrupted by the new Constitution. ☞

Free Church of Scotland.—It is said that not one of all the churches (772 in number) connected with the Free Church of Scotland, has failed to send up their contributions to the Boards of Missions and Education during the last year. The sum received for these objects amounts to $350,000. What a noble example this for other churches. Many of them pressed with famine, and with heavy liabilities for local objects, yet not one delinquent church. The whole amount of their benefactions for religious purposes, since the disruption, only four years, is more than six millions of dollars. ☞

Bequests to the Protestant Episcopal Church.—In the summer of 1829, Frederick Kohne, a native of Germany, died in Philadelphia, leaving in his will specifications of sums to be paid to various Protestant Episcopal churches and institutions belonging to that church, on the decease of his widow. Which event has recently taken place, and the sums are now to be paid over; amounting in all to $375,000. ☞

Becoming Impoverished.—Some people are very fearful that the multiplied calls of benevolence will impoverish them or the churches. With a view to quiet this fear, Dr. Adiel Sherwood, formerly President of Shutliff College, discourseth as follows:—

"It was supposed last fall, all that could be done for benevolent objects had been accomplished; but when the cry of distress came from famishing Ireland, and waxed long and loud from Scotland and France, we sent out more than a million of dollars to their relief, and thousands of bushels of grain as a gratuity. Are we impoverished? The prospects for a crop are generally bright and promising. You can not impoverish a people that gives in obedience to the calls of Providence. God is able, and will repay a hundred fold into your own bosom, and garner too. He will supply, in your crops and purses, more than you give away in a good cause."

General Intelligence.

WAR NEWS.

Since our last, intelligence has been received confirming the report of Gen. Scott's arrival before the city of Mexico; also the particulars of two severe battles fought by about 7,000 Americans under Gen. Scott and about 30,000 Mexicans under Santa Anna, which continued for two hours, when the Mexicans were completely routed, and dispatched a flag of truce desiring a suspension of arms. An armistice was dictated by the Americans, the terms of which were, that "neither army should be reënforced, nor build new defenses during the armistice, nor go beyond their present lines, without forty-eight hours' notice to the other." This being accepted, the Mexican Congress assembled to consider the propositions of peace. What the result will be, yet remains to be seen. The American loss is variously estimated at from 1,000 to 1,500; the Mexican at about 5,000 killed, and 1,300 taken prisoners, with an immense quantity of amunition, arms, &c.

FOREIGN NEWS.

By the French steamship Union, Capt. Herbert, which arrived on Thursday morning, eleven days later advices from Europe have been received.

The Union left Cherbourgh on the 31st of August.

The King of Denmark has conferred the Grand Cross of the Order of Danebrog on Baron Berzellus, the celebrated chemist, to which dignity the title of Excellency is attached; Retzius and Eckstrom, the Swedish physiologists, also received at the same time from his Majesty the cross of Chevalier of Danebrog. The King of the Belgians has also followed the example of the King of Denmark, by creating M. Oafila an officer of the Civil Order of Leopold.

An astonishing instance of female heroism took place recently in England. A young girl, named Sarah Rogers, risked her life to save an infant, who had crept out of the parlor into the garden, and found its way to the well, and slipped in. The girl missing it, ran to the well immediately, and saw the infant at the bottom. She raised a loud scream, but without hesitating, lowered the bucket gradually, and then descended by the rope the depth of 63 feet, when she seized the child with one hand, and with the other upset the bucket, which had filled with water; she then placed the child in it. By this time a number of neighbors had arrived, and the child and girl were pulled up. The girl, in descending by the rope, suffered serious injury in her hands. The effect will incapacitate her from ever using them again. A subscription is proposed to be raised for the noble act of this poor girl.

In Spain, the public excitement is still unabated. The Queen has intimated her intention of calling Narvaez to the head of her councils; and also declares her determination to leave the throne.

Italy still remains in a state of ferment. The town of Ferrara has been invested by the Austrian troops, and a declaration of war seems to be unavoidable on the part of the Pope. The king of Sardinia has declared his intention to aid the pontifical power, and England warmly sympathises with him.

HORRIBLE TRAGEDY.—An aged lady named Mary Morrison, wife of Samuel Morrison, residing in Mifflin Township, in Alleghany County, about three miles from McEeesport, was murdered on Friday, 10th inst., and afterwards burned to ashes by her step daughter. The facts as far as we have been able to learn, are these:—On Friday morning Mr. Morrison started to the city with produce for the market, leaving his wife and daughter at home. The daughter is a woman about 35 years of age, rather a simple creature, and considered by the neighbors as insane. Mrs. Morrison has from her childhood been subject to spasmodic spells. On the afternoon in question she was taken with one of these spells, and being on the floor, under the influence of the fit, her step daughter, Sarah Morrison, beat her on the head with a fire shovel, until, it is supposed, she killed her, and then threw her into the fire and kept piling on the fuel until she burned her almost to ashes, there not being bones enough of the body to fill a quart measure. The step daughter, after consummating the horrible and tragic act of burning the mother, carefully scrubbed the floor to obliterate the traces of blood, and made her escape to the woods. Mr. Whitaker, a brother of Mrs. Morrison, visited the house on Saturday morning and found it deserted but there being a very disagreeable stench, he suspected that all was not right, and immediately commenced a search of the premises. On examining the fire-place, from whence the smell proceeded, he discovered a number of small bones, and the jam spotted over with blood. Several of the neighbors were called in and started in pursuit of the step daughter, who was arrested a few miles from the scene of the tragedy; she confessed the atrocious murder, and assigned as her reasons for doing so that "her father, step mother, and herself, could not agree, and she thought the best thing she could do was to burn her up." She also confessed the manner in which she consummated the act.

A CREEK MURDER AND EXECUTION.—A gentleman who recently visited the Creek Nation, has furnished us with the following particulars of a murder and execution among the Creeks, (says the Cherokee Advocate of the 5th August,) the latter of which he witnessed: "In the early part of last week, a difficulty occurred between two men, who were cousins, near the Verdigris, and not far from the line between the Creeks and Cherokees, relative to some property, and in which one stamped the other to death. The survivor was immediately arrested, and the next day was put upon trial for murder. The jury being equally divided in opinion as to his guilt, his brother was called upon to decide, which he did by declaring his brother guilty and worthy of death. Steps were immediately taken to prepare for the execution, and in which the doomed man participated by hurrying those engaged in digging his grave, in seeing that it was well done, and in making every thing ready. The hour for execution, which was to be by shooting, soon arrived; when he marched out with the two persons selected for this purpose. When he reached the grave he seated himself by the side of it, faced his executioners, who stood with guns presented within less than ten paces of him; bared his breast, and, looking them firmly in the face, said that he was ready—the guns fired and he fell back along side of his grave, his clothes deposited in it with him, and the newly dug earth rolled in upon them. On one day, while somewhat intoxicated he had murdered his fellow-man—before the next closed, he himself had been tried, condemned by the verdict of his own brother—assisted in preparing for his last moments, met unmoved the death-fire of his executioners, and occupied the grave selected by himself.

IMPORTANT INVENTION.—The New Hampshire Journal says that the grand desideratum of applying steam and water power to propel common stocking-looms, on which vast sums of money and much time have been unsuccessfully spent in England, has at length been discovered, and three common looms are now in successful operation in Portsmouth, (N. H.) On Wednesday last one girl attended the three looms, and, spending much of her time in sitting to watch the operation, she presented 23 pairs of stockings, and 22 pairs of drawers as the result of her day's work. Twelve pairs of stockings is a girl's day's work on common band-looms. The expense of knitting by this machine on Wednesday was less than a dollar, while the same work on the hand-looms would cost over five dollars. We learn that any hand-loom may be fitted for operation by power at an expense of thirty dollars. The inventor is Mr. John Pepper, a young man of about 23 years of age, son of Mr. Daniel Pepper of this town, a stocking-weaver.

THE MORMONS.—The St. Louis Republican says, that a passenger in the Lake of the Woods, from the Upper Missouri, informs us that the Mormons are in a flourishing condition, in their new location on the fine lands of the Pottawatomie purchase, on both sides of the river, above Conncil Bluffs. They have planted immense fields of corn—to the exent, it is estimated, of 30,000 acres—and other grain and produce. They have built, also, a town called "Winter Quarters," which already contains a population of some seven thousand souls. This town is entirely picketed in. It is represented that the Mormons are on friendly terms with the Indians, and rarely molest them, although they are accused of occasionally stealing cattle. Immense herds of buffalo were seen on the plains, and crossing the Missouri, at the mouth of a stream called Stillwater.

FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE IN SEABROOK.—We learn from the Newburyport Herald that the house of Major Samuel George, in Seabrook, took fire on Monday evening, and the owner, his daughter-in-law, and her child had a narrow escape, having just retired to rest. Widow Jane Dow, the housekeeper, perished in the flames. She first, on discovering the fire, which was accidental, ran across the street and roused four young men who came with water. She was not seen to enter the house again, but it is supposed that while those inside were getting out some furniture, she entered the house and went up stairs, to secure her money and papers, which were in the north front chamber, and while there the smoke and heat overpowered her. Her remains were found among the ruins.

SUMMARY.

We ara informed of an incident which displays the wonderful speed of the telegraph. A merchant of this city wishing to draw upon a debtor in Cincinnati for $2000, sent a telegraphic dispatch. Within forty minutes from the time of writing the order in his counting room, a draft was returned, and the merchant had his money in his pocket. Fourteen hundred miles besides the business detains in less than forty minutes! A message was recently received in New York, over the telegraphic wires from Montreal, delivered, answered, and the receipt of the answer acknowledged by the operator in Montreal, in the short space of thirty minutes.

The New Orleans Picayune of the 5th inst. says the past has been the most fatal week of the epidemic, which scourges us with a severity which is appalling, the interments for the week in the cemeteries of the city up to 9 o'clock on Saturday morning were 533, of which 427 were of yellow fever; the corresponding numbers of the previous week were 442 and 311. Add the interments from New Orleans at Lafayette, 43 cases, and we have a total of interments for this city for one week of 576—being an average exceeding 82 each day. This awful mortality needs no comment.

The Germantown, Pa., Telegraph says:—"The past week has been moist, hot and sultry—precisely such weather as we experienced nearly the whole of September last year, and precisely such weather as is likely to damage our potatoes again. Indeed, we hear of the reappearance of the rot in varicus quarters, but we hope it is merely sectional and partial, and not to an extent likely to interfere with a full supply, considering that Europe will be able to supply her own wants in this article. Twice the quantity of land is planted this year with the potato compared with last year."

The French army in Africa have discovered an edible substance rolling about on the ground, like little rolls of leather, in the desert of Sahara. It is a sort of lichen or moss which grows on the ground after the rainy season. When the dry weather comes it cracks in the sun, rolls up and is carried about by the wind. The little rolls are found lodged under the tufts of thyme bushes, the only bush that grows in that part of the desert. The substance is hard, brittle and farinaceous, and when powdered makes a tolerable bread of itself, but better when mixed with a tenth of flour.

Dr. Henry U. Onderdonk, who resigned the Episcopate of Pennsylvania a few years ago, and who was suspended from the exercise of his functions, on a charge of too freely indulging in the use of ardent spirits, will, we understand, be most likely restored to his bishopric by the Convention about to sit; the evidence being that he has entirely abstained during the intervening time. We hear, farther, that a church will be erected for him, by some of the Episcopalians of Philadelphia.

The Hon. Edward Bates, of Missouri, the President of the Chicago Convention, said, when he emigrated, in 1842, to the French village of huts called St. Louis, which has now 50,000 inhabitants, he was obliged to hire a guard against hostile savages, to accompany him across the unbroken wilderness, which is now the State of Illinois, with a civilized population of 600,000 freemen.

Iceland has probably been the scene in past ages, of the most tremendous convulsions of nature. In proof of this, Henderson mentions that in many parts of the Island large bubbles still remain, which formed on the enormous streams of molton lava that flowed from Hecla. Some of these lava bubbles which he saw, were fifteen feet high, and were occupied as huts or dwellings by the natives, entrances being made by breaking through the crust.

Those ladies who so gracefully dangle their elegant purses over the forefinger, as they promenade the sidewalks, are informed that a moderate quantity of brown paper deposited in a careless wad in one end, and and a mixture of coppers and bright steel buttons in the other, will be found a cheap and easy method of keeping up appearances. This rule has been tried in the "best society," with uniform success.

On Friday, a lad named John Walker, employed in the factory at Gloucester Point, was accidentally caught in the machinery, and almost instantly killed. He was standing near what is called the roller beam, when his head was caught between it and the carriage—completely crushing the left side of the head and face, and drawing him underneath the spinning mule, very seriously brusing his body. He was taken out immediatly, but survived only a few minutes.

Deacon Grant, the renowned tempraance leader in Boston, (whose house was so outrageously injured and defiled by the enemies of that cause, some months ago,) has applied, it seems, to the Common Council for recompense; and, on the authority of a good appraiser of such things, states the damages to be within a few dollars of $500.

A woman named Mrs. Frey, living in Pennsylvania, near the Maryland line, committed murder lately, by pouring molten lead into the ear of her husband while he was sleeping. This is the woman who was accused of being accessory to the murder of a former husband, some two or three years since, for which Wm. S. Crise suffered death upon the gallows.

The steamer Washington, of the New York and Bremen line of ocean steamers, having received important alterations in her structure and machinery, and a reörganization of her officers, went to sea on Wednesday, for a trial trip, from which she returned the succeeding day. Those who witnessed her performance are confident that she will now rank as the fleetest ocean steamer afloat, and will answer every reasonable expectation.

Several old copies of the Holy Scriptures have lately been noticed in the papers. The following is the imprint of a copy in the possession of Henry Holden, Esq., of Providence, and which was brought from London by a cotemporary of Roger Williams, in 1664. "Imprinted at London by Christopher Barker, dwelling in Pater noster Rowe, at the sign of Tygres Head, 1577."

The Ogdensburgh Republican mentions that Martin Thatcher, of that county, was one of the unfortunates who found it necessary to resort to the bankrupt law a few years since. He was subsequently elected county clerk, and has just finished up the paymeut of which he became legally released by the application of the bankrupt law.

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

PLUMBE NATIONAL DAGUERREAN GALLERY AND PHOTOGRAPHERS' FURNISHING DEPOTS; awarded the gold and silver medals, four first premiums, and two highest honors, at the National, the Massachusetts, the New York, and Pennsylvania Exhibitions, respectively, for the most splendid colored Daguerreotypes and best apparatus ever exhibited.

Portraits taken in exquisite style, without regard to weather.

Instructions given in the art.

A large assortment of apparatus and stock always on hand, at the lowest cash prices.

New York, 251 Broadway; Philadelphia, 136 Chestnut street; Boston, 75 Court and 58 Hanover streets; Baltimore, 205 Baltimore street; Washington, Pennsylvania Avenue; Petersburg, Virginia, Mechanics' Hall; Cincinnati, Fourth and Walnut, and 176 Main streets; Saratoga Springs, Broadway; Paris, 127 Vieille Rue du Temple; Liverpool, 32 Church street.

THE CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE, formerly under the care of Rev. D. Mead, commences its fourth volume under the editorship of Rev. J. T. Headley, author of "Napoleon and his Marshals," "Sacred Mountains," "Letters from Italy," &c. We hazard nothing in saying that this Magazine, so deservedly popular hitherto, is destined to fill a large place in public estimation; that it will not only maintain its present enviable distinction, but earn to itself a far higher popularity, and become the companion of many a circle to which it is now a stranger, gladdening by its presence, while it exerts an influence pure, elevating, and healthful. The Editor will bend his energies to make this the most popular Magazine of the day, and while he avails himself of articles from the best writers, he will draw freely from his own exhaustless store.

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold th reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ADDRESS TO A WIFE.

BY WM. H. BURLEIGH.

Deem not, beloved, that the glow
Of love with youth will know decay;
For, though the wing of time may throw
Its shadows o'er our way,
The sunshine of a cloudless faith,
The calmness of a holy trust,
Shall linger in our hearts, till Death
Consigns their dust to dust.

The earnest passion of our youth,
The fervor of affection's kiss,
Love, born of purity and truth—
All pleasant memories—
These still are ours while looking back
Upon the past with moistened eyes,
O, dearest!—on our life's brief track
How much of sunshine lies!

Men call us poor—it may be true—
Amid the gay and glittering crowd
We feel it, though our wants are few,
Yet envy not the proud.
The freshness of love's early flowers,
Heart-sheltered through long years of want,
Pure hopes and quiet joys, are ours,
Which wealth could never grant.

Something of beauty from thy brow,
Of lightness from thy household tread,
Hath passed; but thou art dearer now
Than when our vows were said.
A softer beauty round thee gleams,
Chastened by time, yet calmly bright;
And from thine eye of hazel beams
A deeper, tenderer light.

The mother, with her dewy eye,
Is dearer than the blushing bride
Who stood, three happy years gone by,
In beauty by my side!
Our Father, throned in light above,
Hath blessed us with a fairy child,
A bright link in the chain of love,
The pure and undefiled!

Rich in the heart's best treasure, still
With a calm trust we'll journey on,
Linked heart with heart, dear wife! until
Life's pilgrimage be done.
Youth, beauty, passion—these will pass,
Like every thing of earth, away—
The breath-stains on the polished glass
Less transient are than they.

But love dies not—the child of God—
The soother of life's many woes,
She scatters fragrance round the sod
Where buried hopes repose!
She leads us with her radiant hand
Earth's pleasant streams and pastures by,
Still pointing to a better land
Of bliss beyond the sky!

THE DOG OF BRUSSELS.

After visiting many of the interesting objects which that pleasant capital offers to the notice of strangers, my companion and I turned our steps towards the Chamber of the Deputies. The building is extensive, and occupies three sides of a square, the fourth being open towards the parks. There is a large smooth court in front, which forms a pleasant promenade; but in one corner of it, and somewhat marring the stateliness of the scene, I noticed a common little wooden dog-kennel, which I supposed to belong to a watch-dog. Humble as was this little tenement, it was connected with an incident, of which I had the following history from my loquacious conductress. "Here," she said, "in this place was the fiercest fighting in the revolution of 1830; for several days after the battle the ground was red with French and Belgian blood."

Just then a shaggy-looking dog, somewhat resembling a large terrier, but, as I thought, an ugly specimen of his race, walked slowly towards us. He looked good-natured, and I stooped to pat him.

"Ay," said the old woman, "madam may caress him now with safety, as he is not on 'the spot."

"What spot?" I inquired; and in reply she told me the following anecdote. "In the revolutionary army that assembled to oppose the Dutch, who invaded our city in the month of September, 1830, was a young French officer, who, wherever he went, was followed by the dog you see. The poor lad was in the thickest of the fighting on the fatal 21st, and fell, covered with wounds, on a spot which I will show you."

She led me towards the centre of the court, but the dog went before and lay down near a stone, looking up at us with an expression of fierce defiance in his eyes.

"Ah, poor fellow!" said the old lady, "we're not going to disturb you. Don't go near him, madam, while he's there. This was the spot where his master's dead body lay, and he sat beside it, licking the bleeding wounds. At length it was removed for burial, but the dog followed it, and stayed for three days beside the grave. At the end of that time he returned here, and lay down where you see him now, growling savagely, and attacking any one who tried to dislodge him. Some of the people about beat him with sticks and drove him away; the next day he returned, but was again cruelly hunted off. When he came back for a third time, he was worn to a skeleton from fatigue and hunger, and looked as if he would never rise again from his master's death-place. My husband and I had gone away for awhile, or we would not have suffered the creature to be ill-treated; but one of the directors, who is a very humane man, chanced to pass by just as a rabble of boys were preparing once more to torture the poor faithful dog. He immediately dispersed them, and having inquired into the circumstances connected with the animal, directed that he should never be molested; that the kennel which you see should be built for him; and procured a small sum to be allowed weekly for his maintenance. He soon recovered his strength, and you may see by his appearance that he is taken care of. Indeed he is well known in the town; and the little masters and misses that play in the park delight in bringing him sweet cakes, of which he is very fond. However, they know very well that although he is as gentle as a lamb while he is walking up and down, they must never attempt to touch him when lying on his chosen spot, from which, indeed, he never stirs in any direction farther than about a hundred yards. Many of his young friends have tried to entice him to a greater distance; and we have sometimes allowed him to be hungry, and then coaxed him on with his most favorite food; but in vain. He always turned back, and lay down where his master fell. Seven years have now passed away, but it is still the same; the dumb creature never forgets."

During my stay at Brussels, I often walked by the place, and never missed the dog from his accustomed haunt, nor saw him pass the self-imposed limits mentioned by the good woman. Her story was confirmed to me by others, so that I can see no reason to doubt its truth. I do not know the name of the dog, of Brussels: his faithful limbs have no doubt long ere now mingled with the dust, but memory often recalls the story of his enduring love.

Perchance the tidings of his young master's fall, brought darkness to the chambers of some vine-covered cottage of France—robbed fair faces of their smiles, and covered graceful forms with the grab of woe. They wept and lamented; but a year passed over, and the brothers and sisters laughed and conversed as before. The vacant place of the dead was no longer heeded, and his name had become an unspoken word. Another year, and his fair affianced one had consented to become another's bride. No tear in that eye, no shadow on that smooth brow, now told that even one sorrowing thought ever turned towards his lonely grave.

Years still passed on, and even in the widowed mother's heart the memory of her soldier boy waxed dim.

She did not forget him quite, and often some trifling object or event would serve to renew her grief. But at other times she could sit and smile, pleased and contented, as though that sharp arrow of bereavement had never been felt. The brothers and sisters had each other still—the fair betrothed had another love—the mother had many sons—the dog had but one master. Fond and faithful to the end, with constancy that knew no change, that dumb creature's cold vigils on the stone at Brussels put evermore to shame our vaunted human love.

THE CANARY BIRD.

A little girl named Caroline had a charming Canary bird. The little creature sang from early morning until evening; it was a very beautiful bird, of a bright yellow, with a black head. Caroline gave it seeds and green vegetables, and, at times, a piece of sugar, and every day fresh and pure water.

But all at once the little bird began to droop; and one morning, as Caroline came to bring it water, it lay dead in its cage.

The little girl raised loud lamentations over the beloved bird and wept bitterly. But the child's mother went and purchased another with colors still more beautiful, and which sang as sweetly as the former one, and placed it in the cage.

But the little girl wept still more when she saw the new bird.

Then the mother wondered greatly, and said, "My dear child, why dost thou still weep? why art thou so very sad? Thy tears will not call the dead back to life again, and here thou hast another equally beautiful."

Then the child said, "Ah, dear mother, I have acted unkindly toward the little creature, and I have not done all for it that I could and ought to have done."

"Dear Lina," answered the mother, "thou hast tended it very carefully."

"Ah, no!" replied the child. "A short time before its death, I did not bring it a piece of sugar which you gave me for it, but ate it myself." Thus spoke the little girl with a heavy heart.

But the mother did not smile at her complaints, for she recognized and revered the sacred voice of nature in the heart of the child.

"Alas!" she said, "what must be the feelings of an ungrateful child, when it stands by the grave of its parents!"

WONDERFUL STATUE.

A piece of statuary has just been exhibited in London, which shows what miracles art can do. The artist to whom the merit of this curious affair belongs, is named Naffaelle Monti. The Spectator describes this wonderful piece of sculpture as follows:

"The effigy of a veiled vestal tending the everlasting flame, is a curiosity in sculpture—a feat of art. The figure is the size of life, it is clothed in a robe, and a veil thrown over the head envelopes the face, shoulders, and part of the arms; the veil is transparent. Not merely do you discern the covered forms where they actually swell out and touch the veil, but you think you can see through the veil underneath, the full and delicately finished features of a most beautiful face; you can detect the retreating curves of the profile, and the swelling forms of the lips, with a space between the softly but crisply rounded flesh and the covering gauze. You are deceived.

"Working in the transparency of the marble, with cunning skill, the sculptor has so arranged the thinness and thickness of this material, that the refracted light suggests the forms beneath, which are not carved. The artist has chiseled the outward form of the veil, and in doing so has painted the veiled face in the light and shade glancing through the marble. He calls it 'uno scnerzo,' and it is so; but it much more—it is a very beautiful figure."

Abdication of Sovereigns.—Throughout the history of Europe, there never existed similar examples of so many sovereigns threatening to resign their thrones as at the present moment. No fewer than three or four potentates are declared to entertain serious intentions of abdicating their power and authority. The autocrat, of Russia stands highest in political importance. He is said to be suffering great mental anxiety from some unexplained cause; and, having provided the means of supporting himself liberally during life, by considerable investments in the English and French funds, under color of a great financial operation, he intends, it is said, to retire to Italy, and there pass the remainder of his days. The King of Wurtemburg, the father-in-law of the Prince of Orange, has repaired to the Hague, solely for the purpose of dissuading the Prince of Orange from the decided resolution, which he is said to have taken, to renounce the crown of Holland. The King of the Belgians seems to be equally afflicted. He has returned to the Palace Laecken at Brussels, from Paris, in such a mentally debilitated state, that he is unequal to the cares of government, and all parties seem at a loss to conceive what will be the upshot. Turning to Spain, the last accounts from Madrid state that the Queen has expressed to her Ministers her resolute intention to abdicate the throne, and it was reported, that a special council was summoned to deliberate upon the subject.

Punishment of Idle Husbands.—The head chief (of New Ireland) often interferes in minor matters of a domestic nature; for instance, if a lazy fellow has a wife or two, and a few children, and, through his love for fishing, dancing, and loitering idly about, neglects to bring in the necessary supplies for his family, a complaint is made, the chief visits the house in person; and, if he sees just grounds for punishment, he orders out the whole population of the village. Men, women, and children, arm themselves with a stiff birch, made of small canes; they then form a long double line, about six feet apart, and wait with anxious glee the approach of the delinquent. At last, he is placed at one end of the lines, amidst a shower of yells, screams, jibs, &c. The word is given by the chief, and away he darts at his utmost speed through the ranks, every one endeavoring to hit him as he passes. According to his deserts, he may get off with running the line once, or he may have to do so twice or thrice; but he is skilled in cunning and fleetness that can run the lines even once, without having his skin tickled for him by the hearty application of the birch wielded by some strong woman! As the punishment is not of a fatal kind, the whole affair creates unrestricted merriment.

Vitriolic River.—Although sulphur is found to exist more or less in the vicinity of every volcano, the only instance of sulphuric acid being found in a state of nature, is in the island of Java, near Batavia, the capital. A lake of sulphuric acid occupies the crater of an extinct volcano, from which reservoir it flows in a rivulet down the sides of the mountain to a considerable distance, During the dry season of the year, this remarkable stream becomes absorbed by the thirsty arenaceous soil through which it runs; but in the rainy season it forms a confluence with another stream, called the White River. The water of the later, though saturated with a whitish clay, is not pernicious, far less fatal, either to fish or other animals. But the moment it is joined by the acid rivulet, the stream becomes transparent from the acid precipitating the earthy matter which it holds in solution, and it destroyes not only the fish, but also the whole of the vegetation over which it passes.

"They Say."—"They say" tells that which is not true at least three-quarters of the time. He is about the worst authority you can produce to support the credibility of your statement. Scarcely was there ever a suspicious report put in circulation, but this Mr. They Say was the author of it; and he always escapes responsibility and detection, because, living just no where, can never be found. "Who said that Mr. E., the merchant, was supposed to be in a failing condition?" Why "they say" so. Plague on this Mr. They Say; he is half brother to that Mr. Nobody, who does all the mischief, and lives nowhere but in the inventive brain who, underserving respect themselves, are desirous to pull down others to their own level. We always suspect the truth of a report which comes from the authority of "They Say."

Remedy for Cramp.—A writer in the Medical Times, asserts that he has discovered in the following simple process an effectual remedy for this distressing and frequent complaint, to which he had himself been for many years, a martyr. His plan is to sleep upon an inclined plane, which is effected by taking care that the bed or mattrass should incline at least twelve inches from the upper to the lower portions of the bed; and for this purpose either the lower feet may be cut down to the requisite inclination, or the inclined plane may be made by an arrangement of mattrass, or by removing the feathers from the lower end of the bed. The writer was led to adopt this plan, by observing that while sleeping in a chair, with the lower limbs nearly touching the floor, he never, in that position, was disturbed by cramp.

The Chances of Battle.—"At Waterloo," said Napoleon, "I ought to have been victorious. But Ney, the bravest of the brave, at the head of 42,000 Frenchmen suffered himself to be delayed a whole day by some thousands of Nassau troops. Had it not been for this inexplicable inactivity, the English army would have been taken flagrante delicto, and annihilated without striking a blow. Grouchy, with 40,000 men, suffered Bulow and Blucher to escape him; and finally, a heavy shower of rain made the ground so soft, that it was impossible to commence an attack by day break. Had I been able to commence early, Wellington's army would have been trodden down in the defiles of the forest, before the Prussians could have had time to arrive. It were otherwise lost without resource. The defeat of Wellington's army would have been peace, the repose of Europe, the recognition of the interests of the masses, and of the democracy."

[Montholon's History.

Peach Pickles.—One of the most delicious pickles ever tasted, is made from ripe Clingstone Peaches. Take one gallon of good vinegar and add to it four pounds of brown sugar; boil this for a few minutes and skim off the scum that may rise; rub them with a flannel cloth to remove the down upon them, and stick three or four cloves in each; put them into a glass or earthen vessel and pour the liquor upon them boiling hot. Cover them up and let them stand in a cool place for a week or ten days, then pour off the liquor and boil it as before; after which return it, boiling to the peaches, which should be carefully covered up, and stored away for future use.

To Preserve Peaches.—Clean your peaches by pouring hot water upon them, and afterwards wiping them with a coarse cloth; put them into glass or earthen jars, cork them up and fasten the corks with wire or strong twine; then place the jars in a kettle of hot water, until the atmospheric air is expelled from the jars; after which seal them up tight with wax. Peaches prepared in this way retain their original flavor and are equally as delicious, when cooked in the ordinary manner, six months or a year after being put up, as if just taken from the trees.

VARIETY.

A celebrated divine, who was remarkable in the first period of his ministry for a loud and boisterous mode of preaching, suddenly changed his whole manner in the pulpit, and adopted a mild and dispassionate mode of delivery. One of his brethren observing it, inquired of him what had induced him to make the change. He answered—"When I was young, I thought it was thunder that killed people; but when I grew wiser, and I discovered that it was the lightning—so I determined to thunder less and lighten more in future."

Mr. A. Kelsey, of Ohio, has patented we believe a most excellent improvement in the bee-hive. It affords positive and complete protection from the bee moth or miller, and is so arranged as to admit of a free circulation of air through it at all times. The honey can, at any time, be removed from the hive without disturbing the bees, or more can be added for the sustenance of the swarm if necessary, while the bees are kept healthy by living in new comb, all the time.

The queerest object in nature is a Spanish beggar; for these fellows beg on horseback; and it is an odd thing to see a man riding up to some poor foot passenger and asking alms. There is an old proverb about setting a beggar on horseback. A gentleman in Valparasio being accosted by one of these mounted beggars, replied, "Why Sir, you come to beg of me who have to go on foot, while you ride on horseback." "Very true, Sir," said the beggar, "and I have more need to beg, as I have to support my horse as well as myself."

Rev. Richard Cecil said to one of his parishioners, who had previously asked for counsel, and whom he had not seen for some time, "I understand that you are very dangerously situated." "I am not aware of it," was the reply. "I hear you are getting rich," said Mr. C——; "take care, for it is the road by which the devil leads thousands to distruction."

Cotton is cultivated in all the central provinces of China, and from one of the towns, Koton, we derive the name. The plant has the nankeen color, and is not white as in this country. In 1845 the total supply of cotton in the markets of the world was 1,169,000,000 pounds, of which the United States produced more than seven-eighths.

An emigrant is one who migrates or removes bag and baggage, out of a country. An immigrant is one who migrates into a country. The same person who was an emigrant at the beginning of his journey or voyage, is an immigrant at the at the end of it, because it is evident that he has then got the bag, but not the baggage.

"Boy, who do you belong to?" asked a gentleman the other day, as he stepped on board of a steamboat, of a darkey listlessly leaning on the guards. "I did belong to Massa Williams, sir, when I came aboard, but he's been in the cabin playin' poker wid the captain 'bove an hour, I don't know who I do belong to now."

The air in the lungs is exposed to 170,000,000 of cells, having a surface thirty times that of the body, and during respiration the air is deprived of oxygen and becomes loaded with deadly carbonic acid gas and rendered totally unfit for a second respiration, being in reality no longer atmospheric air, but a poisonous gas.

Rev. Andrew Fuller being one day in the Bank of England, one of the clerks showed him some ingots of gold. Mr. Fuller took one of them up, and, after examining it, laid it down saying, "How much better to have this in the hand than in the heart!"

In an old paper, the London Literary Gazette, for the year 1824, we find an account of a dwarf even more Lilliputian than Tom Thumb. Her name was Crachami, a Silesian by birth, and at ten years of age, she was only nineteen inches in height, and weighing but five pounds. She was exhibited in London, in May, 1824.

Leigh Hunt, the British poet, is the son of American parents, though he was born in England. His father was a royalist, and fled to the mother country at the time of the revolution. His mother was a sister of the celebrated painter, Benjamin West.

Sir Philip Sidney left this as his last farewell among his acquaintance—"Govern your will and affections by the will and word of your Creator: in me behold the end of this world, and all its vanities."

A little ebony applied to a to a grocer, in the name of her mistress, for a sample of cheese. The article was given, and in a few moments the ebony returned with "Missus say berry good cheese, and tank you to send two more samples!"

When Franklin was appointed U. S. Ambassador to France, a medal was struck in his honor at Paris, the exergue of which was, 'Eripuit coelo fulmeu scep trumque tyrannis,'—'He snatched the thunder from heaven and the sceptre from tyrants.'

The Northampton Gazette says:—"The idea, quite common among pious young men, that they cannot fulfill their mission of good to mankind, without getting into the pulpit, has filled the sacred desk with a great many poor preachers."

A pair of white rats has been captured at Randolph, Vt. They are similar to the common rat, only larger and more active. Their color is of a spotless white, their fur soft and downy, and their eyes red.

Habitual indecision is an evidence of weakness; for it evinces either a want of capacity to apprehend what is best, or a want of energy to pursue it.

Lord Castlereagh made so many new words, that Canning called him the literary coiner. "He has got a mint in his mind," said he. "Mint in his mind," replied Tierney, "would he had sage in his head."

A malignant praise has always been the most successful vehicle to insinuate slander, as poison is never more artfully conveyed than in perfume.

It is said that a bowl containing two quarts of water, set in an oven when baking, will prevent pies, cakes, bread, &c., from being scorched.

THE DAILY NATIONAL WHIG is published in the city of Washington, every day, at three o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted, and served to subscribers in the City, at the Navy Yard, in Georgetown, in Alexandria, and in Baltimore, the same evening, at six and a quarter cents a week. payable to the sole agent of the Whig, G. L. Gillchrist, Esq., or his order. It is also mailed to any part of the United States for $4 per annum, or $2 for six months, payable in advance. Advertisements of ten lines or less inserted one time for 50 cents, two times for 75 cents, three times for $1, one week for $1 75, two weeks for $2 75, one month for $4, two months for $7, three months for $10, six months for $16, one year for $20, payable always in advance.

The "National Whig" is what its name indicates. It speaks the sentiments of the Whig party of the Union on every question of public policy. It advocates the election to the Presidency of Zachary Taylor, subject to the decision of a Whig National Convention. It makes war to the knife upon all the measures and acts of the Administration deemed to be adverse to the interests of the country, and exposes without fear or favor the corruptions of the party in power. Its columns are open to every man in the country, for the discussion of political or any other questions.

In addition to politics, a large space in the National Whig will be devoted to publications upon Agriculture, Mechanics, and other useful arts, Science in general, Law, Medicine, Statistics, &c. Choice specimens of American and Foreign Literature will also be given, including Reviews, &c. A weekly list of the Patents issued by the Patent Office will likewise be published—the whole forming a complete family newspaper.

The "Weekly National Whig," one of the largest newspapers in the United States, is made up from the columns of the Daily National Whig, and is published every Saturday, for the low price of $2 per annum, payable in advance. A double sheet of eight pages will be given whenever the psess of matter shall justify it.

The Memoirs of General Taylor, written expressly for the National Whig, are in course of publication. They commenced with the second number, a large number of copies of which have been printed, to supply calls for back numbers.

CHAS. W. FENTON,
Proprietor of the National Whig.

P. S. All daily, weekly, and semi-weekly papers in the United States are requested to insert this advertisement once a week for six months, noticing the price for publishing the same at the bottom of the advertisement, and send the paper containing it to the National Whig office, and the amount will be duly remitted. Our editorial brethren are also requested to notice the National Whig in their reading columns.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant andeconomical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25
EXTRAS PER TERM.
Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, includin board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

THE HOLY LAND.—BY HARRIET MARTINEAU.

I.—ENTRANCE.

It was on Sunday, March 28, that we were to enter the Holy Land. I had been too much engrossed by the objects which interested us at every step in Egypt and Arabia, to think much of this beforehand; but when I came forth from our tent in the dawn of that morning, there was enough of novelty in the scene around me to make me feel that we were about to enter upon a new country, and a new set of interests; and I became eager to know at what hour we were to pass the boundary which separated the Desert from the Holy Land—the home of the old Faith from that of the new. We had followed the track of Moses from the spot where his mother placed his bulrush cradle, to that on which he died; for to the East we could this morning see the mountains overhanging the Dead Sea; and among them the summit of Nebo, whence he looked abroad over the Land of Promise; and now we were to enter upon the country of Jesus—certain to walk in His very footsteps, and see what He saw—perhaps this very day. I never remember feeling such an interest in every wild flower, in the outlines of all the hills, and the track of all the water-courses.

We had left the stony Desert behind us, and were encamped in a nook of the hills where the ground was green, and weeds grew thick. There was grass under my bed in the tent; and when I came out this morning, the dew was heavy on the daisies, and buttercups, and flowering mallows which grew abundantly on the turf. After breakfast, while the camels were loading, I walked in the early sunshine on a strip of sand overlooking the valley, impressing on my memory every feature of the landscape, and impatient of the rising ground to the north, which prevented my seeing where we were going. It was about ten o'clock when we passed the boundary. It was impossible to tell the exact moment; but within a mile or two we felt that we were, indeed, in the native land of Christ, and probably on His very track. He might have been here. His relations lived at Hebron; and during the first thirty years of His life He had probably visited them, after meeting them at the feasts of Jerusalem. He might have walked over the hills which swelled higher and higher as we advanced, and rested beside some of the wells which yawned beside our track. At any rate, the trees and flowers which we saw must have been familiar to His eyes; the thorny acacia, which began here to rise and spread from the stunted shrub of the desert to the dimensions of a tree; the scarlet anemone—with us a precious garden flower—which here strewed the ground for acres around; the cyclamen, which pushed forth its tufts of white and lilac blossoms from under many a stone and bush; and the poppy, mallow, hemlock, and wild oats, which grew as thickly as in any English hedge. I did not know before that these weeds were as common here as with us; and never before did the sight of them give me so much pleasure. It would have been pleasant any where to meet these familiar weeds so far from home; but the delight to-day was to think that He and His disciples were as much accustomed to them as ourselves, and that a walk in the early Spring was, in the pure country, much the same thing to them as to us.

But we soon came upon traces which showed that the expanse of pure country here was small in those days, compared with what it is now. The towns must have been more thickly set here than in any country I ever was in. Patches and masses of ruins showed themselves on every hand, so near each other as to indicate that the land must have been peopled to a degree now no where known. The first plowing we had seen for many weeks was a striking sight to us; a mere scratching of the soil at the foot of the hills; but close by lay a heap of building stones, the remains of a town or village. Presently we saw a rude plow, with a single camel at work; and at hand was a long foundation wall, laid in a far distant century. On a hight farther on were the remains of a large ancient building, with two broken pillars standing, marking the site of the Aroer of Scripture. Then, though there were water-courses about every hill, wells began to abound; substantial, deep wells, built with a rim with holes in it, to receive the covering stone; such wells as tell of a settlement beside them. We stopped early this day—partly because it was Sunday, and partly because our Arab guards, who know nothing of our Sunday, found a convenient place among the hills, somewhat sheltered from the cold wind; and here, a very few miles from the boundary, the gentlemen of the party discovered that we had sat down in the midst of what was once a large town, though the place appeared a mere stony tract, like many that we had passed. In the morning early I went out to see for myself, and was astonished at the extent of the ruins, which I should not have observed while merely riding by. I could trace the lines of foundation walls for half a mile; and building stones, overgrown with grass, lay in hillocks for a considerable distance round. The many caverns in the limestone rocks, now used as beds for the goats, were found to be the vaults of large buildings now gone to ruin. In a few minutes we traced three temples, or other such buildings, by their overthrown pillars. Our eyes being now opened, we this day saw more and more remains, till we were convinced that all the way from the boundary to Hebron, the land was thick-set with towns, and swarming with inhabitants, in the days of its glory—the days when the Teacher went up and down in it, meditating the changes which must make it what I have seen it now. Its hills and streams, its skies and flowers, are to-day what they were before His eyes: but where He saw towns on every hight, and villages in every nook, there is now hardly left one stone upon another. A group of black Bedouin tents on a hill-side, a camel or two browsing here, and a flock of goats there, are all that relieve the utter solitude where there was then an innumerable throng of men.

As we advanced, on the Monday, the soil became richer, and field was joined to field, so that we began to look for the landmarks which are here used, instead of fences, to bound field property. We entered upon the thickets and shrubberies, where white roses, the cyclamen, convolvulus, and fragrant herbs, abounded. Soon after noon a new scene opened upon us. On our left hand lay a wide, deep basin among the hills, full of vineyards and olive-grounds, where the stones from the soil were built up into fences, and in almost every plot rose a garden-house. This was a sure sign that we were near a town; and as we rounded the hill on our right, we came in sight of the two eminences on which Hebron is built. There stood the town where John the Baptist was born; and here were the scenes which he must many a time have talked of with his cousin, in their boyish meetings at Jerusalem for the feasts. Hebron, too, is only twenty miles from Bethlehem; only twenty-six from Jerusalem; and in those days, when a large amount of yearly traveling was a solemn religious duty, incumbent upon every family, it is scarcely possible but that relatives must have often visited each other, and that Jesus and his parents must have come to Hebron.

The Cave of Machpelah is there; and the burial-place of Abraham and his family was a sacred locality, and an object of pilgrimage to Jews of all ages. As we inquired for it, and walked round the inclosure, which the Mohammedans now permit no Christian to enter, I could not but think who might have been before us in the same quest.

II.—BETHLEHEM—ZION—JERUSALEM.

As I sat on a tomb in the Turkish cemetery the next morning (March 30) watching the preparations for our departure, I almost dreaded the interest which every day would now bring, after the calm and quiet weeks we had spent in the Desert. Our encampment looked much the same as it had done every morning for a month past; the Arab servants, busy in taking down and packing the tents, and a noisy quarrel going on in the midst—(this morning about a pistol having been stolen from one of the tents)—and the differences were only that there were spectators standing by, and that our camels had given place to horses and asses. But, instead of the rocks and sands of the desert, Hebron was before my eyes, and the hills where Abraham spread his flocks, and the spot where he and his family lay buried. And before night, I should see the place where David was born and lived his shepherd life, and where Jesus was born. We had only twenty miles to travel this day to Bethlehem; but it was quite enough, for we were eager about every old tree, and well, and hill-top. The shrubs grew finer, and the wild flowers more abundant, the whole way; though the hills of Judah were wild and stony in parts, and no longer fit for pasturing such flocks as covered them when Abraham lived among them, or when the Hebrews drove in their cattle from the Desert, or when David in his boyhood amused himself with slinging smooth stones from the brook, while his father's sheep were feeding on the slopes. We sat down to rest and eat under the shade of a rock and a spreading tree; and for the hundredth time since we left Egypt it occurred to me how little we in England can enter into the meaning of David when, in his divine songs, he speaks of the shade of rocks, and of the beauty of "a tree planted by rivers of water," and all such cool images. When one has been slowly pacing on, hour after hour, over glaring sands or heated rocks, under a sun which makes every bit of leather or metal, and even one's outer clothing, feel scorching hot, and oppressing one's very breathing, the sight of a patch of dark shade is welcome beyond belief; and when one has dismounted and felt the coolness of the rocky wall and of the ground beneath it, and gathered the fresh weeds which cluster in its crevices, phrase after phrase of the Psalms and prophecies comes over one's mind, with a life and freshness as sweet as the blossoms in one's lap.

Our first sight of Bethlehem was beautiful. We came upon it suddenly, just when the yellow sunset light was richest. Bethlehem was on the rising ground on our right, massive looking (as all the villages of Palestine are), and shadowy, as the last sun rays passed over it to gild the western hills, and another village which there lay high up, embosomed in fig and olive orchards. The valley between one of which we were rising, lay in shadow. Before us, perched on a lofty ridge which rose between us and Jerusalem, was the Convent of St. Elias, which we were to pass to-morrow. I was sorry to turn away from this view; but we had to take the right-hand road, and ride through the narrow street of the village to the great convent, built over the spot where Jesus is believed by the friars to have been born.

It was too late this evening to see any of the sacred localities; but it was quite enough to have the moonlight streaming in during the whole night through the window of my lofty convent chamber, and to think that on this hill took place the greatest event in the history of the world; and that in the fields near, the gentle Ruth went about her gleaning, little dreaming, in those days of her poverty, that, from her meeting with Boaz among the reapers of his harvests, would arise such events to the human race; that the shepherd grandchild, whose divine songs were to soothe her old age, should be the mighty king he was, and the father of a yet mightier, who should build the great Temple of the Lord; and that a more distant descendant should make these glories appear as childish toys in the presence of His greater sovereignty over the universal human soul. A wise man of a late century has nobly said, that "Prosperity is the promise of the Old Testament, and Adversity that of the New." On this hill was born the prosperity of the Old Dispensation; and on this hill was born the Man of Sorrows who knew the secret of true peace, and taught it in the saying that it profits not a man to gain the whole world if he lose his own soul.

In the morning we went into the church of the convent. I cared little for the upper part, with its chapels for Greek, Latin, and Armenian worship; and not much more for the caverns under ground, where the friars believe that Joseph and Mary remained while there was no room for them in the inn. If the town was too full to receive them while the people were collected for the census, it is hardly probable that they would repair to an under-ground cave; but in this cave mass was going on this morning; and striking was the effect, after coming down from the sunshine of the crowded cavern, with its yellow lights and their smoke, and the echoes of the chanting. We returned when the service was over, and saw the star in the marble floor, which marks, as the friars believe, the precise spot where Jesus was born, and the marble slab which is laid in the place of the manger. When I saw, throughout the country, how the Arabs now use the caves of the hills to bed their goats and cattle, this belief of the friars appeared less absurd than it would with us; but still, it is so improbable that the precise spot of these transactions (whose importance was not known till afterward) should have been marked and remembered, that I felt little interested in them in comparison with the landscape outside, about whose leading features there could be no mistake.

From the bottom of the garden we overlooked the great valley which expanded to the north-east; and one inclosure there—a green spot now occupied by olive trees—was pointed out to us as the field where the shepherds were abiding on the night when Christ was born. Behind it, to the east, lay range behind range of hills, stretching off to the north; and among these, we knew, lay the Dead Sea, and the Jordan, where it pours its waters into that lifeless and melancholy lake. As we left the convent and village, and descended the rocky road, with terraced vineyards and olive groves on either hand, we knew that Joseph and Mary must have come by this way from Jerusalem when summoned to the census; and this was more to us than all the sights the friars had shown us in their zeal and kindness. We looked in at the Tomb of Rachel, and at the Convent of Elias; but our eyes and thoughts were bent toward Jerusalem. I remember, however, that here I first saw the waters of the Dead Sea, lying blue in a little gap between the hills.

As soon as I had mounted my ass before the Convent of Elias, I saw from our ridge some buildings on the rising ground which now showed itself before us. I was not immediately certain what they were; but the news soon spread among us. That rising ground was Zion, and those buildings belonged to Jerusalem though they stood outside the walls. Immediately after, the walled city itself came into view, lying along the hills. Most of the party were disappointed. I was not—partly because I knew that we were approaching it from the least favorable side, and partly because my expectations had much underrated the size and grandeur of the city. What we now saw was a line of white walls on a hill side, with some square buildings and small white domes rising within.

I walked the rest of the way. On our right were hills, the summit of one of which was Aceldema, bought by the priests with the money which the wretched Judas returned to them, when he found too late what he had done in his attempt to force his Lord to assert His claim to a temporal sovereignty. On our left was the plain of Rephaim. When we arrived at the brow of the high ground we were on, we were taken by surprise by the grandeur of the scene. Zion now appeared worthy of her place in the hymns of David, and in history. We were now overlooking the Valley of Gihon, more commonly known by the name of Hinnom. From its depth, and its precipitous rocks on our side, I should call it a ravine. This deep dell contains the Lower Pool, now dry; and the aqueduct from Solomon's Pool is seen crossing it obliquely. Its opposite side is Zion rising very steeply, still terraced for tillage in some parts, and crowned by the city wall. To the right, sweeping away from the ravine of Gihon, is the deep and grand Valley of Jehoshaphat, clustered with rocks, relieved by trees, and leading the eye round to the slope of Olivet, which, however, is best seen from the other side of the city. The black dome of the Tomb of David was the next object; and after that, the most conspicuous roof in the city—the great dome of the Mosque of Omar, which occupies the site of Solomon's Temple.

By this time, there was silence among us. I walked behind our calvalcade, as it slowly ascended the beautiful rocky way—glad of the silence permitted by each to all; for it was not possible at the moment—nor will it ever be possible—to speak of the impressions of that hour. We entered by the Jaffa gate; and every echo of our horses' feet in the narrow, stony, picturesque streets, told upon our hearts as we said to ourselves that we were taking up our rest in Jerusalem.

THE SEVEN CHILDREN.

FROM THE GERMAN.

Early in the morning, as the day began to dawn, the devout father of a family arose with his wife from the couch, and they thanked God for the new day and for their refreshing slumber.

But the red glow of morning beamed into a little chamber where their seven children lay in their beds and slept.

Then they gazed at the children one by one, and the mother said, "They are seven in number: alas! it will be hard for us to find them food." Thus sighed the mother, for there was famine in the land.

But the father smiled and said, "See, do they lie there and sleep, all the seven? And they have all red cheeks, and the beams of the morning stream over them, so that they appear lovelier than ever, like seven blooming roses. Mother, that shows us that he who creates the morning and sends us sleep, is true and unchangeable."

And as they stepped from the little chamber, they saw at the door fourteen shoes in a row, growing smaller and smaller, two by two, a pair for each child. The mother gazed at them, and when she saw that there were so many she wept.

But the father said, "Mother, why dost thou weep? Have not all the seven received sound and active feet? Why, then, should we be anxious about that which covers them? If the children have confidence in us, should we not have confidence in Him who can do more than we can comprehend?"

"See! his sun rises! Come, then, like it let us begin our day's work with a cheerful countenance."

Thus they spoke, and toiled at their labors. and God blessed the work of their hands, and they had enough and to spare, they and their seven children; for faith gives strength and courage, and love elevates the soul.

ABOU BEN ADHEM AND THE ANGEL.

Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel, writing in a book of gold;
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
"What writest thou?" The vision raised his head,
And, with a look made all of sweet accord,
Answer'd, "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said, "I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow-men."
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again, with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blessed,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest. [L. Hunt.

A MISSIONARY'S CALL.

The following, from the Missionary Magazine shows the feelings of Mr. Dean in entering on his work as a Missionary. It is worthy of a perusal:—

My resolution to go to the heathen was not the result of a dreamy vision which sober Christians never realized, nor of any extraordinary influence which my brethren in the ministry do not understand. I never saw the "burning bush," nor listened to an audible voice from heaven bidding me to go to the heathen. If such a voice and such visions are necessary to constitute a "call" to the missionary work, then I have never received such a call. I found in the Bible the blessed truth, that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotton Son, that whosever believeth on him might not perish but have everlasting life." But as my mind fixed on these words, and pondered over the benevolent assurance of the passage, I remembered that it was also written, "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." I listened with delight to the merciful promise, "Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved;" but before I could finish my congratulations in view of a world saved, saved, came the startling inquiry, "How shall they call on him in whom they have not believed—and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard—and how shall they hear without a preacher—and how can they preach except they be sent?" It seemed a plain case, which a child could understand, that without faith it was impossible to be saved, and without the gospel there could be no faith in Christ, and the gospel could not be preached to the heathen while we all stayed at home; and it required no great logical skill to force upon my mind the conviction, that it was the duty of some to go; and if others would not, I would try. I offered my services, and I have since seen no cause to regret the offer. I have, in the execution of my purpose, been required to sacrifice the enjoyments of home, the pleasures of domestic life, the society of friends, and the blessings of my country;—for all of which I acknowledge no less attachment than is claimed by other men. I have met in the way some of the toils and privations I anticipated, and have encountered some perils and sorrows which were unexpected. My children have been committed to the dust on a desolate island by the hands of a lonely parent; my companions have gone to the grave in distant lands, leaving a husband twice bereft and smitten to the earth, while surrounded by the heathen, who saw his sufferings but could not soothe his sorrows. I have then looked into the grave which had entombed my domestic hapiness and earthly hopes, and then upon the face of a helpless infant who could recognize a mother's smile, but who knew not a father's anguish or its bereavement, and then looked around upon the wide-spread darkness abroad and the still more dreadful desolation at home, with no kind father or fond mother near to whose arms I could flee for succor, and no tender sister in whose ear I could pour the tide of my grief and be soothed by her sympathy;—even then the inquiry arose, Do you not now repent and wish you had not enlisted? No! I would not part with this hour, in exchange for all it has cost. I did not before understand the practical divinity of the Christian religion. I did not before know how even God Almighty could make a man so peaceful and happy under circumstances like these. I will never again doubt the divinity of that doctrine I bring to the heathen.

POWER OF THE PULPIT.

The English sermonizers have rarely been distinguished for the highest eloquence. Barrow is a mine of rich thought, all gold and precious stones. Jeremy Taylor was a wilderness of sweets. Howe was serious and mighty in the scriptures. Tillotson wise, elegant, but cold. Baxter was heart-searching, pungent, and sometimes pathetic. But all of them, except perhaps the last, were deficient in oneness and concentration, and still more in self-abandonment to the great emotions which the tender and awful themes of the New Testament are calculated to inspire. Old John Bunyan, with his comparative ignorance, his colloquialisms, and violations of taste, was more effective than either of them.

Whitefield belonged to two continents. He had a deep experimental perception of gospel truth, and an almost infinite sense of its importance. He saw, or thought he saw, the English and American churches reposing on the pillows of a dead orthodoxy, or in the freezing slumbers of a delusive Arminianism. The doctrines of regeneration, and by faith alone, had to a great extent faded out of view. He looked upon many congregations as in immediate danger. He looked upon the cross of Christ as the only refuge. He felt the great truths of our religion, as almost no other man ever did. To him they were an almost present reality. He thought himself raised up to enforce them: they were as a fire in his bones till he spoke. With great majesty and persuasiveness, he went forth as a divinely commissioned messenger, to announce the wrath and mercy of God. At one moment he stands by the roaring flames of hell, and cries, flee, flee, flee, O, sinner, flee!—at another, by the cross, crying, come, come, come, poor sinner, come! He united the courage, the judgment, and the passions essential to a perfect popular orator, and by a complete self-abandonment to his work, and to its appropriate emotions, he became the most effective of preachers.

Our own great Edwards was eloquent, but in a different way. His mind was of crystal clearness, acute, logical, ratiocinative, ardent. His convictions of truth were as decided as Whitefield's. He was more solid; if possible more solemn, soul-searching, and soberly earnest. But he had not that power of appealing to all the passions of men in popular address. He wrote his sermons, and confined himself to his notes. But he went on, uncovering men's hearts, bringing out evil from the deepest recesses; exhibiting the hideousness of sin in the magnifying glass of truth; arresting the guilty and arraying them before the judgment seat of Christ; painting heaven above and hell burning beneath, and wretched sinners suspended by a hair over its horrors; till a whole assembly on one occasion rose and stood pale and trembling, ready to exclaim, where, O, where shall guilty souls find refuge?

SUPERSTITION OF INDIANS.

The superstition with which the Indians are so deeply imbued, is adverse to the inculcation of pure religious faith; it is the more difficult to be eradicated, inasmuch as it has its origin in early tradition, and has in later times been singularly blended with the Catholic form of worship. Of this superstition I may here adduce some examples. As soon as a dying person draws his last breath, the relatives or persons in attendance put cocoa leaves into the mouth of the corpse, and light a wax candle. They then collect together the household goods and clothes of the deceased, and wash them in the nearest river. They put on the dead clothes, which are made after the fashion of a monk's habit, and they hang around the neck of the corpse a little bag, containing seeds of cocoa, maize, barley, guinua, &c., for his plantations in the next world. In the evening, ashes are strewed on the floor of the room, and the door is securely fastened. Next morning the ashes are carefully examined to ascertain whether they show an impression of footsteps; imagination readily traces marks, which are alleged to have been produced by the feet of birds, dogs, cats, oxen, or llamas. The destiny of the dead person is construed by the footmarks which are supposed to be discernable. The worst marks are those of hen's claws, which are believed to denote that the soul of the deceased is doomed to irrevocable perdition. The marks of the hoofs of llamas are considered favorable, and are believed to indicate that the soul, after a short purgatory, will be transferred to the joys of paradise. The funeral is conducted acccording to Christian forms, and under the superintendence of a priest. But as soon as the priest takes his departure, food is put into the grave along with the dead body, which is interred without a coffin. I have sometimes seen one of the nearest relatives leap into the grave and strike the body with his foot, but the meaning of this strange proceeding I never could clearly understand. Some curious ceremonies are observed on All Soul's Day. In every house in which a member of the family has died in the course of a year, a table is laid out with brandy, cocoa, tobacco, together with some of the favorite dishes of the deceased person, and the chamber is kept closed during the whole day. [Travels in Peru.

Mrs. Grant has a school at Singapore, for little Chinese girls. She was one day teaching a class of little girls, and asked them this question: "Were you sure of dying to-morrow, what would you do to-day?" One said, "she would be getting her grave ready," which is a very important business among the Chinese; but another, with a resolute countenance, said, "I would believe STRONGLY in Jesus."

The universal definition of a mile by the Arabs is, the distance at which you can no longer distinguish a man from a woman.

WORKING MINISTERS.

The number of persons who can justly claim this title is comparatively small. They are occasionlly to be met with, however, and the sight of them is exceedingly cheering.—Such men have their characteristics, which are not easily mistaken. They are always ready to do what duty dictates to be done, be the labor public or private, pleasant or unpleasant. If the field to be occupied and tilled is a hard one, that circumstance is quite likely to increase their ardor for the work. The sin of Jonah, who fled from his duty, does not cleave to them. They never trouble themselves about the question who is to be greatest, but prefer to show their own title to that distinction by doing work worthy of the greatest. It is not an uncommon thing for men to imagine that they would make first-rate leaders, and to refuse to do any thing if they are not put into that station. Not so the true working minister. He understands the teaching of his Saviour, that the greatest is to be the servant of all, and prefers the gratification of deserving the name of a great one, to the mere possession of the title. There have been a few illustrious examples of this class. Richard Baxter was one. Though long a sufferer from ill health, he found time to prepare for his numerous public exercises, to visit and catechise the families of his congregation, and to write during the short period of fourteen years, nearly sixty different works, many of them quarto volumes of considerable size. Such working ministers are needed at the present day—men who are not afraid to take responsibility, and go forward where they see work to be done. Such men will always find a field, and whatever field they may occupy will soon flourish and bring forth fruit.

LIFE IN HONGKONG, CHINA.

From a private letter, dated, HONGKONG, May 19.

As my custom is, I will gather up the fragments, and send you the "odds and ends" of our life in this Her Majesty's namesake colony, Victoria. First, then, let me say, that I occupy a large room in the second story of a fine brick building, (the property of a kind gentleman, who offered us the use of the house as a donation to the mission,) at the corner of Gage and Peel streets, overlooked on one side by a very high mountain, Victoria Peak, as it is called, and overlooking in its turn the beautiful bay or harbor far below. Nothing is wanting to make this decidedly the most romantic, the most picturesque, of all spots, at least as far as I have yet seen. Terrace after terrace, one house above another, horizontal streets intersected by passes from one flight of stone steps or steep ascent to another, as you gain one landing place after another far up the side of the mountain; habitations, I believe, comprising every variety of architecture, from the rudest mat-walled tent of the simple native, to the elegant palace of the rich Orientalist; all religions and ceremonies, too, from the deepest shades of heathenism, to an enlightened Christianity, including the worshipers of "the Beast" and "False Prophet," and representing perhaps most of the nations upon the earth, with their varied costumes, dialects, and manners. We are surrounded by Europeans, and were it not for the sight of the natives who constantly throng the streets, and the outlandish jargon of the cries, with which our ears are continually saluted, we might forget that we were in a heathen land. I have twice attended worship conducted by the native assistants, once at Mr. Dean's, when he was present but indisposed; another time at the Chapel, and was pleased with the proofs that were presented of power of religion to change the manners as the well as the heart.

We have for the present suspended our study of the language, although we had acquired a pretty good knowledge of the radicals on the passage out. Our inability to find a teacher or speaker of the Shanghai dialect, which is the one we now expect to pursue, will leave us quite an interval of leisure, until we hear from and join Mr. Carpenter. This cannot probably be less than a month or two, perhaps much more. However, we are not necessarily idle. The manners and customs of the Chinese must be studied, as well as their language; and in our present coustant association with them, we cannot avoid learning those. We do not wish to acquire the dialect of our "cooley," yet when sending him to market, it is as easy to say get "me" as rice, and "me-paou" as bread, and "cha" as wood; yet I believe he thinks us very stupid that we do not at once understand all he says to us. Sometimes when he returns from market, eager to explain some good bargain, or to tell us that the "cashee" was insufficient for the purchased articles, he tells his story in the most impressive manner possible, and stopping with his never-omitted query, "savey?" (understand) he meets the response, "no savey!" he exclaims with a most rueful shake of the head, and emphatic gesture of astonishment, "no savey?" and redoubles his efforts to make us "savey," in spite of our dullness. And when at last he succeeds in throwing a ray of light upon our dark minds, his joy knows no bounds; he laughs outright, and says, "Yesee, very good, yesee, very good," until we almost wish that his was the language we want to learn, that we might at once make him our speaking teacher. It is pleasant to hear him chant his scripture readings, for although not a member of the church, he seems to be well instructed, and is among the inquirers who meet constantly at Mr. Dean's. We hire him at $4 00 per month, and he finds himself, a custom universal among the Chinese. He sleeps on his own mat, and prepares his own meals, while we are eating ours, and this, as rice and fish constitute Chinese staples, is not much trouble for him. These are cheap, as are indeed all the necessaries of life here; but the luxuries are quite another thing. All imported articles are very high. Take as proof a shopping excursion of mine. I went with Mr. C. up and down Queen's Road, the Broadway of Victoria City, inquiring at all the shops for something suitable to make a cap, and also a light summer dress. At all the native shops, we met one answer, "no got." We then called at the foreign stores, where we knew every thing was high, but expected at least to find plenty, at their own price. Yet nothing in the cap line could we find, and of summer dresses only three patterns, (French muslin,) one at $6 00, one at $7 00, and the other I did not ask. At an Italian milliner's I was shown "dress hats," one of which, a very ordinary Tuscan, would not probably be bought in New York, and if priced at all would hardly come up to two dollars, was valued at the very respectable sum of eleven dollars. I assure you my purse did not suffer by this excursion, although I had no wish to purchase a hat at any price. Silks are cheap, and constitute the common dress of the natives—not such as are sent to America, for their best, as I am informed, and as my own observation teaches me, are kept at home for their own use. Black, blue, and white, are the prevailing colors, and I assure you, I consider the costumes of the well-dressed Chinese, especially the females, not only becoming, but truly elegant. White is "all the rage" among foreigners here, and rarely indeed will you see the hat, cap, or umbrella of a gentleman, that is not covered with bleached muslin. The object is doubtless a better protection against the rays of the sun, which at this season of the year, and in the middle of the day, are very severe. We, who remain in the house, have but a faint idea of their intensity; we are always cool, and find the morning and evening air, (our walking seasons,) most delightful.

A few evenings since we went, accompained by Mr. Dean, to the cemetery, where sleep the remains of Mrs. Dean, Mrs. Ball, and Mrs. Shuck, names henceforth dear to the heart of every missionary. Being too far to walk, we took a little boat, at the landing, which carried us very near the spot. But in reaching it from the water we were obliged to climb up by stone steps which projected like pegs from the side of a stone house, with not so much as a straw to catch at in falling, and plenty of space between every two steps for another, which instead was only a most frightful void. But I am learning to climb, and considered this test of my improvement in the art as most flattering, especially when I came to descend, which process, you know, is always acknowledged to be the most difficult, in the ups and downs of life. The cemetery abounds in monuments; very few if any tomb is so humble as to possess only a simple slab; yet none awakened in our minds the emotions called up by that little spot, where very near together sleep those whose memories are hallowed by self-denying lives, works that will long follow them, and calm, peaceful deaths. They all died far from the land that gave them birth; they were not gathered to the graves of the forefathers; yet their flesh shall rest in hope, and arise in the morning of the resurrection, surrounded by many who through their instrumentality shall be raised from the shades of heathenish darkness, to sing the song of the redeemed, and be forever with the Lord. Mrs. Shuck's grave is marked, as yet, only by a simple enclosure. At the head has been suspended a board covered with leather, the inscription on which is already almost all torn away by the elements, which are so destructive here.

From this consecrated place, we went by the boat to the foot of Morrison Hill, on whose summit is established the Institute, called also after the same devoted missionary. The school at present numbers about 25 Chinese youth, who are said to be making good improvement in their studies. The building is a noble one, and has a most eligible location for one who is a thorough amateur in the art of climbing, but I doubt whether the Temple of Truth ever had a better representative in nature, and even Application himself might hesitate, did not the well-worn path give evidence of being often trod. But nobody should come to Hongkong who cannot command strength, or coolies, sufficient for a tiresome march. For myself, being well supplied with the first, I have no occasion for the second. I much doubt whether I shall ever overcome my natural feelings sufficiently to enjoy a ride in a sedan chair. I imbibed too early the spirit with which Cowper sang, "I would not have a slave to carry me." Yet many an unconcerned face do I see, both of men and women, peeping out from the open doors or windows of these men-borne vehicles, and hear them spoken of with just that kind of indifference with which we speak of getting into an omnibus.

There are both horses and carriages on the Island, yet I seldom walk out without wishing them all in their mother country, or at the bottom of the sea; for the streets, being designed only for footmen, are narrow and well thronged with people; yet those who can, will ride, and every horse must go at the top of his speed. Just imagine yourself on the side walks of New York, suddenly startled by the quick tramping of a horse's hoofs behind you, yet almost sure to halt just as you spring one side to let it pass; and when you are again a good distance ahead, you hear it again coming at full speed, thus keeping you in constant excitement. It may be the result of standing armies, and military tactics. Our waking ears are saluted every morning, at dawn or before, with the firing of cannon, the voice of the bugle, and the beating of drums, to say nothing of the howling of dogs, and the shouts of the street criers; and if we go out, we shall meet soon after sunrise the soldiers returning from parade, to pass the day in idleness until the evening shade shall again call them out. But in our evening walks, we are most interested in the heathen offerings to their deities. These consist mostly of burning gilt paper, or lighting little reed-like torches, which are fastened to the side of the house or boat where the family live, for many have no earthly possession except a home in a "fast boat," as they are called, and seldom come ashore. I have only seen these fires lighted by small children, who will stand and wave their little clasped hands before them, and as they catch your inquiring eyes in turning away, they will laughingly answer your supposed question by calling out, "Chin-chin Jos," an offering to Jos, their household God. Dear, innocent heathen children! I cannot look upon them without loving them, and many of them are truly lovely. How long will it be ere we can tell them of a better way, and teach them the folly of trusting to gods of their own hands' making? Very few have yet received the light, and after all the wonder is that the number is so great, when so many conflicting ways are pointed out to them. The Romanists enjoy this week their ascension festival. Such floating of banners by day, and illuminations by night, seems well adapted to lead away the ignorant; still I cannot learn that they have many converts—the number was very small of those who seemed such to-day, when I entered for the first time their place of worship. PROGRESS OF SUNDAY DESECRATION IN SCOTLAND.

We promised to inform the readers of the Sabbath Recorder of the progress of Sunday desecration here, and in redeeming that promise have to announce two decisions which doubtless will operate extensively in breaking down the human institution which has so long usurped the place of the heaven-blessed Sabbath. In farther adverting to this, we would still say, that while anticipating results favorable to the cause of righteousness, we are far from approving the professed principles of those who are mainly instrumental in effecting them. We grieve that the church should so persist in the refusal to yield true obedience to God's commandments, and thus cause us to look with interest and hope to the doings of her enemies, and her members acting an enemy's part. But so it continues to be. By her refusal to return to the old paths formed in love by the Lord, from which she has strayed, the church of Christ, led by those who cause her to err, clings to the sad apostacy—proving thus her want of that love to her Lord which would lead to a different course.

In many forms in the present day is an indifference to the sanctity of Sunday manifesting itself in Scotland, where it was wont to be observed with greater strictness than in any other country. The votaries of Mammon, extending their aid to the lovers of pleasure, are affording additional facilities and presenting inducements to Sunday travel, which cannot but change materially the aspect of that day, and which will necessarily involve upon it the labor of thousands who hitherto have nominally, at least, held it sacred. The Caledonian Railway, which connects the west of England with Edinburgh and Glasgow, is just about to be partially opened, and is expected to be completed in two months; and at a meeting held this week, the shareholders, by a majority of several thousands, have decided that Sunday trains shall be run along their line. The day following this decision, the Edinburgh and Northern Railway, which is the commencement of a line of railway which extends from the Scottish metropolis to the northern counties, came to a similar determination by a majority of six to one.

These are important decisions; for the lines named are the most important in Scotland, and are connected with nearly all the others. They each possess numerous branches, which will be under the same Directors, and on which, therefore, the same course is to be expected. The result, in the case of the Caledonian, occasions no surprise, as nine-tenths of its capital is supplied by English shareholders, in which country nearly all the railways run Sunday trains. The Edinburgh and Northern line, however, is mostly in the hands of Scotchmen, and those principally of proprietors in its course. The decision which they have given is therefore a remarkable indication of the state of Scottish feeling on the subject now, especially when it is known that numerous parties, including not a few ministers of the gospel, had become proprietors for the very purpose of preventing, if possible, the threatened flood of Sunday desecration.

The North British and other two smaller lines already run Sunday trains, and the results of this week are likely to have influence on others which hitherto have abstained. Competition is expected to have this effect even upon the Edinburgh and Glasgow line, which at present only runs the mail on Sunday. When the first day comes to find its pace among "the six working days," we hope that some will give its true place to "the Sabbath of the Lord," on which we are required by better authority to rest for blessing. GLASGOW, Sept. 3, 1847.

LEGAL PROTECTION OF SABBATH-KEEPERS.

The following Address to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate of the State of New York, was presented by James Bailey in February last. It gives a very true picture of the difficulties which we encounter from the existing Sunday laws. The Address has but recently fallen into our hands, or it would have appeared before.

HON. GENTLEMEN OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE:—I am directed by the denomination of Christians to which I belong, to lay before you the reasons why we ask for legal protection in the observance of the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath.

I will first premise, that however much we may differ from the Christian world generally on this subject, we are unable to find a scriptural warrant for a change of the Sabbath, from the seventh to the first day of the week. From the nature of the sabbatic institution, we judge that a change in the day would be equivalent to the destruction of the institution itself; because the sabbath is a memorial of creation, and fixed by the authority of God, at the close of creative operations on the seventh day—the day in which he ended those works, and which he blessed and sanctified. We are unable to find in the scriptures any limitation, abrogation, or supersedure of this law by divine authority. Its observance has been continued in all ages of the world. Jesus Christ observed it, and enjoined it upon his disciples. His apostles and the primitve Christians continued its observation. But I am aware that it is not proper for me to lay before you a detailed argument in support of our practice. I will only say, that we have examined and re-examined the subject in all its bearings, and have often and freely invited information from those who differ from us on this subject; but as yet we have always been compelled to fall back upon the original sabbath, as the only means of satisfying our consciences. Hence, we feel ourselves religiously bound to continue its observance, as a duty we owe to God. In doing so, we subject ourselves to innumerable embarrassments. Places of honor and trust—profitable business operations—schemes of speculation, and honorable and evenhanded competition in trades and manufactures, together with an almost endless variety of pursuits and privileges in the political, literary, and business departments of society, we are compelled to forego. This, so far as necessary, we are willing to do, for the love we have for God's honored sabbath; and expect it as an inevitable result of our difference in practice from the majority of christendom. Aside from these embarrassments, notwithstanding the safeguards of our constitution, we are exposed to the merciless harrassing of evil disposed persons. From the well disposed of every community we receive nothing but that christian courtesy and kindness, that it is our never failing wish to exercise towards all who differ from us. But there are in every community, those who "fear not God nor regard man," to whose malice and evil designs we are weekly exposed. From such we seek protection. We ask no exemptions from the performance of civil duties, or from bearing our part in the maintenance of good order, and the laws of the land. We have never been found recreant to these, nor to the high obligation of law-loving, and law-abiding citizens. Our practice does not hinder the equitable administration of justice, nor interfere with the good order of society. The embarrassments connected with our religious faith and practice are all our own.

Some of the wrongs we have suffered in consequence of our adherence to the original sabbath of the Bible, and from which we now ask protection, are these:

We have been called to answer in civil suits, on the sabbath we keep, to places near and remote from our homes, by those who knew our conscientious practice, for the sake of obtaining judgment by default, against us, on unjust and illegal claims. We have been called and detained as witnesses and jurors, on the sabbath we keep, when it was not necessary for the administration of justice. We have been disturbed, and needlessly annoyed, by the service of civil processes on the sabbath, when another time would have been in every respect as well. We are exposed to have our property attached, or taken upon executions, on the sabbath, for the sake of adding vexation to misfortune, when another day would answer the purpose of justice as well. We have been compelled to perform military duty on the sabbath, or be exposed to the vexations and fines of court martials. We are required to work on the highways on the sabbath, or pay our commutation in cash, thus unjustly taking from us money, when we can much better perform the required labor. School district meetings have been called on the sabbath, and schools ordered kept thereon, where a very large majority of the inhabitants were Seventh day Baptists, and where schools before were kept only five days in the week; thus giving a very few undue advantage over the many. We have been exposed to the performance of all civil services and public duties, on the sabbath we keep, the same as any other day of the week, or compelled to suffer for the neglect. Tax bills for school districts, and other expenses, have been made out, on which we have been taxed equally with others, when we have enjoyed one sixth less of the benefits thereof. These and kindred vexations we have suffered long and patiently; while large sums of money have been extorted from us, and evil minded persons have triumphed in the injuries they have inflicted.

We now come to you as the guardians of liberty, and the protectors of equal rights, and ask, must we continue thus exposed to the malice of designing men, on account of our religion? We ask, in the name of society and civil equality—in the name of religious liberty, and the freedom of the conscience—in the name of our constitution—that our rights and property be secured to us by the passage of a law in accordance with the constitution, guaranteeing to us the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship according to the dictates of our consciences. We do not ask that the seventh day of the week be made a "non juridicus dies," but we ask, that by a special statue it may be made so to all whose religious faith and practice it is to observe it as the sabbath of the Lord God.

It has been objected to this, that granting our request would interfere with the rights of others. To which I answer, that it would no more than making the first day of the week a non judicial day interferes with our rights. I submit farther, that no rights are or can be so sacred as the rights of conscience, nor can any human laws bind the conscience. Neither should the convenience or pecuniary interests of the many, that may be served five days in the week, demand another day at the expense of the religious rights of the few. Ample protection is granted to all who observe the first day of the week as the sabbath. We ask no more than they enjoy. It would be unequal and oppressive to grant us less. Your wisdom, I have no doubt, will be able so to arrange a bill as to grant us the protection we ask, without interfering with the rights of others—the due administration of justice—or the maintenance of good order.

Let all officers be prohibited from calling on us for services of any kind, or requiring us to attend as parties, witnesses or jurors, on the day we observe as the sabbath. Make provision in the higher courts for trying out of their order all causes where a party or material witness is an observer of the seventh day of the week as the sabbath, also for excusing jurors who are of the same faith. And grant us the same protection in the observance of the seventh, that others enjoy in the observance of the first day of the week. Be assured that we do not come as disorganizers, or to ask indulgences. We come to seek the protection which our constitution guarantees; and which has long been denied us. We hold it our duty to respect our constitution and laws. But as a body of christians we feel our superior obligation to God. His laws we must obey, though they may be contravened by the laws of men.

THE PICTORIAL READER; containing a variety of useful and instructive Lessons upon Familiar Subjects, with illustrations to render them interesting and attractive. By RENSSELAER BENTLEY, author of the Pictorial Primer, Pictorial Spelling Book, Introduction to the Pictorial Reader, &c. New York: Published by George F. Cooledge & Brother, 1847.

Such is the title-page of a neatly-printed book of 240 pages, which has been placed upon our table. It is a continuation of Bentley's series of pictorial books for the young, and is designed to present the every-day business of life in such a manner as will render it interesting and attractive. Farming is dwelt upon at length, and the principal implements of husbandry are represented by cuts, and their uses described. The instruments used in the various trades, and the articles manufactured, are also accurately represented, with explanations adapted to render the mechanic arts inviting to children. The whole is interspersed with moral and instructive lessons, intended to excite the young to virtuous actions. We do not remember ever to have seen a book better calculated to interest and improve the class for whom it is designed. We take pleasure, therefore, in commending it to those who have the care of youthful minds.

ADVENT MEETING.—The Adventists last week held a five-days meeting in their big tent at Niblo's Garden, in this city. Mr. Himes delivered the introductory discourse, from Matt. 6 : 10, on the kingdom of God. His aim was to show that this kingdom was in the future, and would be set up at the second personal appearance of Christ. As to the time of the event, he would not attempt to fix upon any definite day, but thought that nearly every thing predicted in Nebuchadnezzar's Vision had been fufilled, and that the next event, and the last in the series, would be the setting up of the everlasting kingdom in the new earth, which may be expected at any day. To this opinion, we believe, agree nearly all the Adventists.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE for September, republished by Leonard Scott & Co., has come to hand. Its character is already too well established, to need any commendation from us. The following is a list of its principal articles: "How I stood for the Dreepdaily Burghs," "The Crusade of the Children," "Taxidemy in Rome," "Materials for a History of Oil Painting," "Le Premier Pas," "Coulter's Cruise," "Three Months at Gaza," "Byway's of History," "Requiom," "The Student of Bologna," "James's Life of Henry IV." Office of republications, 70 Fulton-st., corner of Gold.

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCHES.—The following is stated to be the condition of the Congregational Churches in Massachusetts for the last year, as drawn from the minutes of the General Association for 1847: Churches 437; pastors 355; stated supplies 43; vacant churches 60; ministers without charge 84; church members 62,185; admissions by profession 761; deaths 872; excommunications 167. So it appears that the deaths and excommunications exceed the admissions, between 200 and 300.

MINUTES OF THE CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.—I am informed that several packages of Minutes of the Central Association have not been received. I received the manuscript, and the amount paid for by the churches in the Association was forwarded to the clerk of the church, to the church address, as given in the minutes. I also forwarded a copy to the clerk of every church in the denomination, to the Secretaries of the several Associations, and all that the Association ordered, and they were forwarded from this post-office some time in June.

LUKE P. BABCOCK.

General Intelligence.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The Boston correspondent of the New York Evangelist gives an interesting account of a visit which he recently made at the house of the venerable statesman. He says:—

I found him much reduced in point of strength and activity from what he was a year ago, before the alarming illness he had last Fall. He was also much overcome by the heat, which was quite severe at the time. But his general health is comfortable, his spirits cheerful, and his intellectual powers bright and vigorous. He has a great deal of company, being an object of such wide-spread interest, both to our countrymen and to foreigners. His memory of historical events, which has always been so remarkable a feature of his mind, is apparently as minute and exact as it ever was. Nor is his familiarity with passing events apparently diminished, though he himself observes that there are now but few classes of occurrences that attract his attention sufficiently to fasten themselves in his memory.

The present condition of the country, the war with Mexico, and the question of Slavery, of course, occupy much of his thoughts and his conversation. He gave it as his opinion that a nominal peace will take place shortly after Gen. Scott arrives at the City of Mexico—that some party will be found or can be placed in possession of the Government with whom a treaty can be made, including a cession of as much territory as our Government thinks prudent to take, and the payment of as much money, to be scrambled for by the Mexican chiefs, as our Government dares to give. * * *

The people of the United States will be interested—and generally pleased—to learn that Mr. Adams expects to be at his post in Congress at the opening of the session. The delicate health of Mrs. Adams requires a milder climate for Winter than Massachusetts, and Mr. Adams himself thinks he shall winter more comfortably at Washington than at Quincy. Beside, he feels that he is bound, by duty to his constituents, to be found at his post as long as he has any remnant of strength that he can employ in their service. He observed that the only national question on which he now feels any deep interest is that of Slavery, with the Mexican War, its adjunct. On this, his patriotic anxieties are intense and unceasing. He has had a great longing to see the question of Slavery brought to issue in his day. When he read Mr. Calhoun's late declaration, that "the issue is before us, and it mmst be met," Mr. Adams said he exclaimed aloud, "God grant that I may see it!"

In conversation, he dwelt much on the importance of bringing out the power of the Christian religion against Slavery. He says nothing else will answer—no other principle but the spirit of religion and the power of conscience can ever bring about the voluntary and peaceful emancipation of the slaves of this country. He watches with deep interest every movement among religious bodies which tends to withdraw from Slavery the evident countenance, or at least the acquiescent endurance, which the churches have long given to the institution.

An hour spent in drawing wisdom and patriotism from such a full fountain, could not but be profitable and interesting in a high degree. Serus in cœlum redeat—Long may the life of the patriot sage be preserved among us, as the Mentor of our statesmen and the model of youth! is the spontaneous exclamation of every true heart that visits at this shrine of patriotic devotion.

WONDERFUL FEAT.—A brick building at the corner of Tremont and Bromfield streets, Boston, was moved eleven or twelve feet, on Saturday week, including the cellar and cellar-walls, upon a temporary railway, by means of jack-screws. The building was estimated at two hundred tons in weight, but scarcely a jar was felt in the process of moving—not so much as the rolling of a barrel of flour upon the floor—and the contents of the grocery store, for which it was used, were not removed, but the ordinary business continued all the while without interruption. This is the first feat of the kind ever accomplished, and, as may be readily imagined, was a work of much difficulty. The process was first to dig the new cellar and lay a foundation wall to correspond with the old one. Upon this wall two iron bars we affixed, several inches apart, over which the building was to move on small iron rollers. Underneath the old wall a similar preparation was made. The difficulty of moving was made greater by the unevenness of the stones composing the wall, many of which were taken out, and their places substituted with others of a smooth surface. Six screws were used in the operation.

A HARVESTING BARROW.—The Democratic Pacifique notices a newly patented harvesting machine invented by Adolphe Nouviaire of Langwy (Moselle,) which, it says, will supersede the use of the sickle on the Continent, and make an immense saving not only of labor but of the grain, much of which is now lost by the weather in the slow mode of harvesting. This machine it calls the Harvesting Barrow (Brouetts moissonneuse. "A single man," it says, propels with ease the harvesting barrow on all fields, whatever unevenness they may present. The impulsive force which he gives it, passing directly from the wheels to the cutters, causes them to cut the grain stalks and any parasitic plants that may be mixed with them. Its work is wonderfully perfect—the stubble is cut short and at an even hight, and what is very important is that the machine can be repaired by the common wheelwrights and blacksmiths of a village; and beside, the sharpening of the blades can be done by the workman himself as easily as he sharpens his scythe."

WHAT IS IN A NAME?—The Congregational Journal says that Sir Culling Eardley Smith, the gentleman who figured so conspicuously as President of the London Christian Alliance Convention, has dropped his patronymic and reduplicated his maternal name, in consequence of an accession of property on his mother's side. He now writes his name Culling Eardley Eardley. See the omnipotence of money over the natural feelings of the heart! For money the honored and flattered President of the Evangelical Alliance consents to repudiate the name of his own father.

SUMMARY.

On Saturday evening, as the New York steamboat train was entering Worcester, and shooting into the Dépôt of the Norwich Railroad, the axle of the forward car gave way. The locomotive ahead went into the proper dépôt, but the falling of the broken axle displaced the switch, and the remainder of the train went pell mell into and through the engine house, displacing in its course a locomotive and overturning a small building. No one was in the least injured, though the passengers were somewhat rudely jostled together. The freedom from injury was owing solely to the fact that the passengers were, very wisely, all in their proper places.

Dr. Bowditch, the great mathematician, and translator of La Place's Mechanique Celeste, forms one of the brightest examples for American youth to imitate. He was self-made, self-educated—his poverty being such in early life that he could not avail himself of what he so much desired, a classical education. Yet so great were his attainments by industry, that old Harvard University conferred on him in his career the degree of M. A. Of this he is said to have been exceeding proud, and would often revert to that day. Though he afterwards received the title of L.L D., yet he was the most delighted with his M. A.

The number of deaths from yellow fever in New-Orleans during the week, ending September 11, was 402; 427 the week previous. The conclusion from this, says the Picayune, is inevitable, that while from the want of victims, the reports of interments may appear less appalling, yet in fact the virulence of the fever is increasing with the advance of the season. For the sake of humanity let northern editors dissuade those in search of employment from coming here too early. No man unacclimated now enters the city with impunity, nor can it be done until we have had a killing frost—before which a dreary interval yet yawns.

The Early Settlers of Rochester, still residing in that city, have determined to call a social meeting to recount their privations, experiences, &c. The time for the meeting is not yet fixed. The invitation is proffered to all who settled at, or were born in Rochester previous to the first day of January, 1819, and now reside in the city or its vicinity; and each person is to have liberty to narrate some interesting incident of his early settlement at Rochester, but not to occupy for this purpose more than ten minutes.

A singular appearance in nature was witnessed in the eastern part of Schoharie county, a few days since, such as is common we believe in the eastern hemisphere, but seldom if ever seen in this country. A swarm of insects resembling winged ants, more than a mile in length, so dense as to obscure the light of the sun, passed over the neighborhood of Gallupville, and like pilgrims to the Temple of Mecca, left the path strewed with their dead.

Near Xenia, Ohio, 30th ult., the powder mill of Messrs. Austin, were blown to atoms. Providentially, but one person was in the mill at the time of the catastrophe, a young man named James Fitzpatrick, who was found dead. Another young man had left the building, but a few minutes before, and was in the act of returning, when the explosion occurred. The report was mistaken ten miles distant for thunder.

Severe frosts prevailed in the northern and north-western sections of Massachusetts on Wednesday and Thursday nights of week before last, arresting the growth of potatoes, corn, and vegetables generally. Potatoes, however, were so nearly matured, as to receive but little injury. Corn was less fortunate. In some localities, much of it is fit only for fodder. The potato disease has made its appearance in many places, but as yet has not assumed a very malignant character.

Amos Kendall is publishing a series of communications in the Washington Union, concerning Morse's telegraph. He maintains that Morse's patent embraces all the combinations of machinery moved by electro-magnetism, "which may be used to imprint signals upon paper or other material, or to produce sounds in any desired manner for the purpose of telegraphic communication."

The editor of the St. Louis Republican has received from the farm of Mr. Samuel Conway, Sheriff of the County, in Bonhomme township, a specimen of apples which, for size, exceed any we have yet seen. The largest weighs one and a half pounds, and measures fifteen and seven-eights inches; another weighs one and a quarter pounds, and measures fourteen and seven-eights inches in circumference. The residue of the lot are but little inferior in size to the two mentioned.

We learn from the Independent Delawarian, that Mr. John Sebo has constructed a plough somewhat in the usual form, except that the coulter is placed horizontally with the end of beam, and the share is more than twice the length of that of an ordinary plough, which the inventor supposes will diminish the draught more than one half.

It was recently stated in Parliament, that 670,000 persons had left the United Kingdom for America during the last ten years. Last year alone 110,000 sought a home in our land, and it is calculated that 300,000 will come to America this year.

It is said the father of Montgomery, the poet and preacher, was at one time the clown of the ring at the circus in Bath. He gave his son a good education, and instilled into his mind religious truths. Mr. Montgomery is now the most popular divine in London.

Kendall says, "those who have never seen the prickly pear as it grows in Mexico, can hardly credit the stories of the immense size which it attains. I have seen the trunks of some of them at least two feet in diameter, growing ten feet in height without a limb, and then branching off in every direction."

When the forts around Paris are completed they will require, in time of peace, an army of 24,800 men, forming with the garrison of the city proper an effective force of 60,000 infantry, cavalry and artillery, with 1,262 cannon, 80 mortars, &c., exclusive of the National Guard. The population of Paris, with the suburbs, is 680,000, besides 60,000 foreigners, 25,000 of whom are English.

A rich vein of lead has been discovered on the Harrisburg turnpike, near Lancaster, Pa. The ore is said to be found in great abundance and is very rich. Its discovery was the result of an examination into the cause of the premature ripening of grain on the land which covered the metalic treasure.

Dr. Milligan says, "in regard to the color of the hair and the complexion in insanity, this sad affliction is more rare in individuals with red hair. Out of upwards of 1100 lunatics under my care, I could not count more than about twenty whose hair was distinctly what is vulgarly called 'carrotty.'"

A French engineer charged with the duty of inquiring into the nature and condition of the mines, in the southeast of the empire of Morocco, has discovered in the province of Tetuan fossil bones of great interest. Amongst them is the entire skeleton of a lion of gigantic size. These remains have been forwarded to Paris.

It is supposed that 37 or 38 millions bushels of grain were sent from the United States to Great Britain from the 1st of September, 1846, to the early part of last month. This was worth, at a fair average, about forty-five millions of dollars.

There was sown on the farm of Hiram Blanchard, in Will county, Ill., after the 10th of April, 1847, a field of barley, which was harvested in July, threshed out, and taken to market, and sold at a fair profit before the 1st of August.

Our prairies, says the Racine Whig, are literally alive with Prairie Chickens this season, and sportsmen are having a fine time in hunting them. Two of our citizens were out a day or two since and bagged fifty in about two hours.

We learn that a mine of iron ore has been discovered on the farm of Anthony Tranuse, in Durham township, Pa., and that it is apparently inexhaustible, and of the very best quality. Mr. Transue has leased it to a company, who will immediately proceed to work it with effective force.

The Moniteur Industriel states, that the losses on railroad transactions on the Paris Bourse, between the month of October 1845, and the end of July 1847, amounted to the enormous sum of 488,000,000f., nearly $100,000,000.

We see it stated in several papers, that although the exhibition of the State Fair was not quite up to some of its predecessors, the attendance was quite as large. But this is not the fact. The receipts last year from the members and for tickets, were $4,400. This year they are only about $3,700.

Coal has been discovered in Warren county, New Jersey, near Hope. A heavy flood laid bare the mineral, and there is every indication that the bed is extensive.

A jaw of a human being found in one of the mounds near Watertown, N. Y., is said to be of a size for a man no less than twelve feet high. It may yet be discovered that it is no human bone at all.

Mr. John Ashler, of Merton, has an onion now growing, which has been in his garden 7 years, and has produced seed every year. It is a yard in circumference, and has now twenty-two heads of seed on it.

About ten thousand dollars worth of gold dust was last week received at the mint in Philadelphia for coinage. It is very pure, being above the standard.

The French steamship company has given $1000 to Mr. Morrey, whose legs were broken by the steamer New York running into the wharf; the bark against which she run claims $3000, and her damages and expenses in all will be about 6 or $7000.

John Kelly, indicted for the murder of Mrs. Lewis, of Prattsville, on the 22d of August last, was tried at Cassville and found guilty on the 17th inst. He was sentenced to be hung on Thursday, Oct. 28. The evidence was purely circumstantial.

The number of benefices in England is 10,553, and of these there are upwards of 2,800 without any residences, and 1,170 without fit residences. Of these benefices there are 297 under £50 per annum; 1,629 from £50 to £100; 1,602 from £100 to £150; 1,355 from £150, to £200; and 1,978 from £200 to £300.

It was stated recently in the English House of Commons, that there were no less than eighty-six clergymen of the Church of England, gentlemen and scholars, receiving as their pay less than 3s. per day. Eight of the number were receiving as little as 13d a day, and one was actually receiving 6 1-4d a day.

A fire occurred at Hutchinson's City Mills, Cleveland, on the 7th inst., originating from friction in the smut machine. Some 3000 bushels of wheat, and 200s or 3000 barrels of flour were wet. Mill insured for $15,000, and stock for $4000, which will probably cover the loss.

The wheat crop of Michigan, for the present year, as estimated by a gentleman now preparing statistics for the Patent Office in Washington, will not fall short of 8,000,000 bushels, nor exceed 10,000,000 bushels. The quality of the grain this year is superior in every respect to the crop of last year.

Mons. Calle, of Brionne, France, has raised a cooking pear, which he has named the Eelle Angevine. A specimen of this fruit weighed two pounds and fifteen ounces avoirdupoise, was thirteen inches in circumference, and eight in height.

A very splendid parcel of silver ore lately arrived in London from Valparaiso. Its value by different assays, has been computed at the rate of from 1590*l.* to 1690*l.* for the ton of 21 cwts.

A bridge about twenty miles this side of Richmond, which cost nearly $15,000, was recently set on fire by an incendiary, and entirely destroyed.

Allowing wheat at 15 bushels to the acre, 900 pounds of food are produced. One acre in potatoes at 300 bushels, produces 18,000 pounds. The wheat at 75 cents per bushel, is worth $11 25. The potatoes at 10 cents per bushel, $30. A farmer writes, that potatoes delivered at two miles from the digging of them, at 6 1-4 cents a bushel, are more profitable than wheat at 75 cents, if carried, as most of it is, 30 miles.

William McKie, a heavy wool operator of Salem, N. Y., has very recently effected a cash sale of upwards of three hundred thousand pounds of crossed and pure Saxon wools, to the Middlesex Company at Lowell, Mass., all of which was grown in the counties of Washington and Rensselaer. In addition to this, the company have purchased from other individuals, over a million and a half pounds of very superior wools, all of the present clip.

The Cincinnati Commercial says:—"We challenge the whole State to beat Hamilton County. Mr. Randolph Maffitt, of Columbia township, laid upon our table yesterday, a "Mammoth Pippin" apple, the weight of which was twenty-eight ounces, its diameter five inches and a half, and its circumference, lengthwise, from stem to blossom, eighteen inches, and the other way sixteen and a half. Mr. Maffit's orchard is in Madisonville, about seven miles from the city."

The Ithaca Chronicle of Sept. 23d says that Dr. J. E. Hawley amputated a leg of a Mrs. Smith, of West Cayuta, Chemung Co., while the patient was under the influence of the letheon gas. The operation was signally successful. During the operation Mrs. S. was entirely unconscious of pain, and in ten minutes from its commencement the limb was amputated and dressed, and the lady in good spirits and apparently free from the effects of the gas.

We learn from Keene, N. H., that on Monday night the office of the Clerk of the Courts was entered, and all the indictments and most of the other papers of the office were stolen; and the Court is in session, with power to do but very little business for want of the proper papers. $500 have been offered for the apprehension of the thief or thieves and recovery of the papers.

There was a great Funeral Procession in honor of Daniel O'Connell, in New York, on Wednesday of last week. The Tribune thinks that fifteen thousand persons maintained their places in the ranks, while more than one hundred thousand lined the streets and accompanied the march of the procession.

$25,000 in specie has been fished up by means of the diving bell, from the sunken steamer Tennessee, in the Mississippi.

The quantity of coal consumed in the United States, is estimated at not less than 2,800,000 tons weekly.

DIED,

In Brookfield, N. Y., on the 16th of Sept., Mrs. PHEBE CLARKE, wife of Capt. Ethan Clarke, in the 68th year of her age. She was forty-eight years an exemplary member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield.

In North Stonington, Ct., at the residence of Oliver G. Merritt, on the 10th of September, of Consumption, ELLEN W. CROCKER, youngest daughter of the late Abner and Hannah Crocker, of West Barnstable, Mass., aged 19 years. Thus, in the morning of life, Ellen was called to part with earth for heaven. Surrounded by friends most dear, and possessing a mind that was almost entranced by nature's lovely aspect, she meekly said to all, Farewell. Having sought and found her Saviour while in health, he made ———, ———"her dying bed

Feel soft as downy pillows are,
While on his breast she laid her head,
And breathed her life out sweetly there."

In the death of this lovely youth, a family of orphans have drunk deep of affliction's cup. The chords of affection had entwined themselves around the tender plant, and the breast of sorrow was made to swell, when Ellen slept in death. A discourse from Eccl. 7:2 was delivered by Eld. S. S. Griswold, to a weepieg circle of mourning orphans. COM.

MISSIONARY NOTICE.

ELD. CHARLES M. LEWIS having accepted the invitation to labor for the Eastern Seventh-day Baptist Association, has removed to Newport, R. I., and entered upon the duties assigned him by the Board.

Those churches that have pledged contributions to sustain this mission, will see the necessity of forwarding the same to H. S. Berry, the Treasurer, at Westerly, R. I., as soon as practicable. S. S. GRISWOLD, Rec. Sec.

Hopkinton, Aug. 30, 1847.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

PLUMBE NATIONAL DAGUERREAN GALLERY AND PHOTOGRAPHERS' FURNISHING DEPOTS; awarded the gold and silver medals, four first premiums, and two highest honors, at the National, the Massachusetts, the New York, and Pennsylvania Exhibitions, respectively, for the most splendid colored Daguerreotypes and best apparatus ever exhibited.

Portraits taken in exquisite style, without regard to weather. Instructions given in the art.

A large assortment of apparatus and stock always on hand, at the lowest cash prices.

New York, 251 Broadway; Philadelphia, 136 Chestnut street; Boston, 75 Court and 58 Hanover streets; Baltimore, 205 Baltimore street; Washington, Pennsylvania Avenue; Petersburg, Virginia, Mechanics' Hall; Cincinnati, Fourth and Walnut, and 176 Main streets; Saratoga Springs, Broadway; Paris, 127 Vieille Rue du Temple; Liverpool, 32 Church street.

THE CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE, formerly under the care of Rev. D. Mead, commences its fourth volume under the editorship of Rev. J. T. Headley, author of "Napoleon and his Marshals," "Sacred Mountains," "Letters from Italy," &c. We hazard nothing in saying that this Magazine, so deservedly popular hitherto, is destined to fill a large place in public estimation; that it will not only maintain its present enviable distinction, but earn to itself a far higher popularity, and become the companion of many a circle to which it is now a stranger, gladdening by its presence, while it exerts an influence pure, elevating, and healthful. The Editor will bend his energies to make this the most popular Magazine of the day, and while he avails himself of articles from the best writers, he will draw freely from his own exhaustless store.

DERUYTER INSTITUTE.

JAS. R. IRISH, Principal.
GURDON EVANS, Principal of Teachers' Department.
CAROLINE E. WILCOX, Preceptress.
AMELIA R. CLARKE, Teacher of Instrumental Music.

Other experienced Teachers are employed the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847-8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First commencing Wednesday, Aug. 25, and ending Dec. 1
Second " " Dec. 15, " March 22
Third " " April 5, " July 12

TUITION, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
EXTRAS—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

STATE OF NEW YORK, SECRETARY'S OFFICE, Albany, August 3d, 1847.—To the Sheriff of the City and County of New York: Sir—Notice is hereby given, that at the next general election to be held on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday in November next, the following officers are to be elected, to wit:

HONOR TO ALL HANDICRAFTS.

Honor to him whose sinew'd arm
Swings the ponderous sledge;
Honor to him whose sturdy hand
Delves at the fruitless hedge;—
To every toiler who striveth
To beautify the earth,
Be honor and fame far greater
Than to men of kingly birth.

To toil—it is to fill complete
The Lord of Life's command—
To crown with golden fruit and grain,
The wilds of ev'ry land;
To rear the mansion and the cot,
In city or in glen,
That joy and sweet content may meet
Around the homes of men.

Who makes a blade of grass to grow
Where there grew none before,
Is greater far than the demi-god
Whose mantle drips with gore;
Then plant the spade in desert ground
And makes its treasures spring
To bless the hand and home of him
Who 's greater than a king!

THE ROOT OF ALL EVIL.

BY THOMAS HOOD.

Gold! gold! gold! gold!
Bright and yellow, hard and cold,
Molten, graven, hammered, and rolled;
Heavy to get, and light to hold;
Hoarded, bartered, bought and sold;
Stolen, borrowed, squandered, doled;
Spurned by the young, but hugged by the old,
To the very verge of the churchyard mould;
Price of many a crime untold,
Gold! gold! gold! gold!
How widely its agencies vary:
To save, to ruin, to curse, to bless;
As even its minted coin express—
Now stamped with the image of good Queen Bess,
And now of bloody Mary.

THE GOLD ROOM IN WINDSOR CASTLE.

From the library we went to the apartment called technically "the Gold Room;" it is this to which I wish to call your attention; I surveyed it leisurely, and I do not remember having read a description of its contents, nor can I give even an outline of its various treasures; I commenced taking notes from the mouth of the custode, who with his various assistants is every day of the year fully employed in cleaning the plate, but he said it was contrary to orders to allow any notes to be taken. What memoranda I did make, and what I remembered accurately, I will state, trusting that my letter will not be opened, and I convicted of treason.

To begin!—the whole collection is valued at twelve millions of dollars! There are glass cases, like a silversmith's shop, and behind the glass are the principal articles; would you believe that I there saw a dinner service of silver gilt of the most gorgeous kind, presented by the merchants of Liverpool, to the late William the Fourth, long before he was king, in reward for his advocacy of the slave trade! Believe it or not, there it is, with the inscription telling the tale. There is a salver of immense size, made from the gold snuff boxes alone, of George the Fourth,—the lids and inscriptions curiously preserved on the surface in a kind of mosaic of gold; its value fifty thousand dollars. Then you may see near it Nell Gwynn's bellows—the handles, nozzle, &c., of gold!—the golden peacock inlaid with diamonds, and rubies from Delhi—not as large as a pheasant, but valued at 150 thousand dollars; the footstool of Tippoo Saip, a solid gold lion with chrystal eyes, the value of its gold seventy-five thousand dollars; George the Fourth's celebrated golden candelabra for a dinner-table, valued at fifty thousand dollars, so heavy that two men are required to lift each. Piles upon piles of golden plates, sufficient to dine two hundred and fifty persons, with ample changes, were spread about or in the cleaner's hands.

If this enumeration does not satisfy your aching vision, we will ask the custode, who seems extremely anxious, in the midst of so much treasure, and would evidently be glad to get rid of us, to open a long series of dresser-looking drawers. Here are 140 dozen each of gold knifes and forks of various patterns, which he repeats the names of; as "oak," "stag," "George the Third," and so on. Another set of dressers!—what can they contain?—only 141 dozen each of gold table and tea spoons, all arranged in the most perfect order. Take another walk up and down the room; with glass cases on tables in the middle, filled with gorgeous gold, and try to impress some form of taste more elegant than another! It is vain—memory only carries away a confused idea of riches, such as must have cost poor underground laborers, lives of toil, and sweat, and pain, to procure, merely to pamper wealth and royalty;—to do no good—to be almost as useless as it was in the mine, for it is rarely produced, and requires a host of human beings merely to keep it bright.

A little conversation with this king of the gold room, informed us that it was a poor time to see the plate, because fifty chests were removed to be used by the Queen at Buckingham Palace! He said it was an awful thing to have to get the plate out for a state dinner, it was so heavy! and the frequent changes made it a labor to the pages more onerous than the most overtasked worker in iron! Mr. Jesse asked him if the recently inserted iron bars in a certain window had relieved his mind from anxiety respecting robbers? He said it had; "but you know," he added, turning to me, "with so much plate one could hardly sleep, when he knew one of the guards outside might be bribed at any time, the wall mounted by means of ladders, and a great theft be committed." I could scarcely refrain from saying what I thought—that it would be a great blessing to many of the poor of England and Ireland, if the metal was put in circulation. Here they do not think that its being used as it is, would do any good. Even radical Joseph Hume, does not begrudge, he says, Windsor and all its contents; the whole nation is proud of it—proud to have it shown to foreign royalty, and to boast that no other nation on the globe can make such an exhibition. Is it or is it not an empty boast!

◆

It is a singular fact that there is generally mord pride, formality, and haughtiness among leading men in our republican government, than is to be found in any royal family in Europe. Dr. Baird says he has often met with a tone of hauteur in our distinguished men which he never yet found in a prince!

QUAKER MARRIAGE.

The Leeds Mercury gives an account of the solemnization of the marriage of John Bright, a member of Parliament, with Miss Leatham, at the Friends' meeting house in Wakefield, in the presence of a large number of the inhabitants of the town and neighborhood, including a large delegation from the fair sex, and many of Mr. Bright's political friends. The following is the description of the marriage ceremony:

"Within a few minutes of half-past 10 o'clock, the wedding party arrived, and immediately took the seats appointed to them. The whole company sat for about three quarters of an hour in perfect silence, when Mr. Bright arose, and, taking the right hand of Miss Leaam, pronounced in a low but distinct voice the following words: 'Friends, I take my friend, Margaret Elizabeth Leatham, to be my wife, and promise by Divine assistance to be unto her a loving and faithful husband until it shall please God to part us by death.' While still holding hands, Miss Leatham pronounced the same words, substituting John Bright for her own name, in a low but tremulous voice. After which, another pause for some minutes occurred, when one of the congregation offered up a short prayer, the whole assembly standing. After some minutes had again elapsed, Mr. George Bennington read the certificate, or declaration, which was signed by the bride and bridegroom, and their relations and friends, and afterwards by a large number of the congregation."

MISS DIX.

This benevolent lady has succeeded in persuading the legislature of Illinois to make provision for a State Lunatic Asylum. The Chicago Tribune tells an anecdote which strikingly shows her own power over insane people. It relates to the founding of a similar institution in Providence R. I.

"The Legislature of Rhode Island had pledged a certain sum for the object, on condition that $70,000 should be made up by the contributions of the benevolent. It is the custom of Miss Dix to make personal application to wealthy individuals whose hearts are supposed to be pervious to the appeals of "melting Charity." There was an old fellow in this case, a citizen of Providence, who was known to possess an abundance of money, but he was equally noted for crabbedness of manners, and for the tenacity whith wich he clung to his wordly gear. Miss D. announced her intention of making an experiment upon his sensibilities, but her friends endeavored to dissuade her from the undertaking, assuring her that there was not the least chance of success, and that in all probability she would not even be treated with civility. But she determined to go, and went. She knocked at the old miser's door, was admitted, and immediately stated the object of her visit. He was unusually courteous, but still evaded the main question, and endeavored to turn the conversation to other subjects. But Miss D. would not allow him to wander, all the time urging such considerations as she thought best adapted to touch him on the right spot. Finally he got a little impatient and exclaimed half petulently, "What would you have, madam?" She tapped him confidently on the shoulder and replied—"Forty thousand dollars!" The old man was moved—he paced the floor in agitation—but suddenly stopping before Miss D., he said, "You shall have it." And he was as good as his word. The projectors of this noble institution have to thank the reputed miser for $40,000 of the $70,000 which it was incumbent upon them to raise.'

NEW PROFESSION IN PARIS.

Upon a brass door-plate, in the Rue de Laucry, in Paris, is inscribed "Ambroise Fortin, Fourteenth." Upon the common superstition that thirteen is an unlucky number at table, this gentleman has founded the profession of diner, out holding himself ready, at his lodgings, from six o'clock till eight, in full dress and appetite, to receive any summons and fill a vacancy at any table. His fitness for his profession consists, moreover, in unsuspected morals and complete acquaintance with the topics of the day. He passes his morning in collecting the political hearsays, the private scandal, the bon-mots, and the rumors of forthcoming gayeties. He begins to converse whenever looked at by his host, and ceases and eats when the attention is withdrawn, or when a real guest has anything to say. For this ready supply of a very common necessity to dinner-givers, he makes no charge—as he unites with this profession that of wiue-recommender, and is paid handsome sums by different owners of vineyards for speaking his mind as to the wines he finds on the different tables to which he thus has professional access. There are five well-known professed "Quatorziemes" (Fourteenths) in Paris, and as it is estimated that there are five hundred houses in that city where dinner-parties are given, the fatal number of "thirteen" happens often enough to give full employment to these. It is supposed, indeed, that the profession will be largely increased before the publication of the next census of trades in the almanac. Monsiuer Fortin is described as a very handsome young man, of dignified manners and un-stagger-able self-possession, an ornament to any table, and claiming no subsequent acquaintance, unless by the expressed wish of his employer.

A STRANGE FLOWER.—One day recently, some men who were working upon our streets, broke a stone in two, in which was found a beautiful purple flower with some green leaves as fresh in appearance and as soft to the touch as though it had been grown in a green house. How it came there is a mystery to us. The stone had been in our street for twelve years. But the flower was evidently in the stone when it was quarried. Perhaps it had been there for "time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary"—aye, for aught we know, it is an antediluvian flower. Mr. S. S. Young says, "the flower resembles the Hebiscus species—but the leaf is more nearly like the rose—but is not exactly like any flower now a native of this country, nor indeed like any exotic cultivated here." He adds, "it most probably grew in the whole of the rock where it now is; but the rock must have been earth when it grew." [Eaton (O.) Register.

CHINESE NOTIONS OF ENGLISH CARRIAGES.—The two elegant carriages made by Hatchett were objects of great admiration. But it was a puzzling question for the Chinese to decide which part was intended for the Emperor's seat. The neat and commodious seats with their cushions inside, with the windows and the blinds, and every part within, were elegantly fitted for the reception of none but the monarch. But then a question arose, who was to occupy the elevated position, with its splendid hammer-cloth edged with gold and cecorated with festoons of roses? To determine the disputed point, the old eunuch, who had a particular affection for the carriages, applied to me, and when told the Emperor's place was within, and that the elevated seat was for the man that drove the horses, with the usual ejaculation of surprise, hai ya! he asked me if I supposed the ta whaug-tee would suffer any man to sit above him and turn hts back to him? "That," said he, "will never do," and asked if the splendid coach-box could not be substituted for the seat within the carriage, or placed behind it! [Sir John Barrows.

ANECDOTE OF D'ALEMBEET.—D'Alembert was the son of a celebrated lady of high rank, who to conceal her indiscretion, caused him to be exposed on the steps of the church of St. Roch. Here he was found by a poor woman, who earned her livelihood by her neeble. She adopted him, maintained him by the produce of her labor, and placed him in the College of Montaign. The young man profited by the instructions received, so that, like Pascal, he made new discoveries in geometry in his fifteenth year. His name soon became known all over Europe and the learned courted the society of the young student of Montaign. Such was the fame he acquired by his early talents, that the lady at last began to be proud of having given birth to such a son. Vanity wrought what the voice of nature was incapable of effecting. She one day repaired to the College, and requested to see the youth. He came. "I am your mother," said she. "You my mother, madam? You are mistaken; I have no mother, but her who took care of me in my infancy." He turned his back on her, and never saw her more, but continued the affectionate and dutiful son of the seamstress, and repaid with interest in her old age the cares she had bestowed on his childhood.

POPE PIUS.—A newspaper in Rome relates the following incident of the present Pope:—

"A wealthy nobleman desired to constitute one of his two sons his universal legatee, on condition that he would make a sacrifice of part of his property to the church. The two sons, knowing that their father was very eccentric, determined, whatever will he might make, to divide his fortune between them. Irritated at this, the father made a secret will, by which he left a very small sum indeed to his two sons, and the bulk of his property to the priest who should happen to say the first mass in the church where his funeral ceremony was to take place. This will, he deposited with a notary. On his death, which took place shortly after, the notary opened the will, and, struck by its irregularity, took it to the Pope. It was late at night that his Holiness became acquainted with it, but, before daylight next morning, he hastened to the church at which the funeral ceremony was to take place, and caused the doors to be opened, by stating who he was, and celebrated the sacrifice of the mass before any priest had arrived. He thus became legally entitled to the property of the deceased, and immediately made it all over to the two sons."

HOLLOW SHAFTS.—Forge a pound of iron into a hollow rod, and it will support a weight many times greater than if solid. Nature seems to have taken advantage of this, long before the mathematicians had discovered it, as all the bones of animals are hollow. The bones of a bird are large because they must be strong to move their large wings with such velocity; but they must also be light, in order to float easily on the air. Birds also strikingly illustrate another fact in natural philosophy. If you take a bag, make it air tight and put it under water, it will support a large weight—say a hundred pounds. But twist it or diminish the air in it, and it will support no such weight. Now a bird is just such a bag in air—when he wishes to descend, he compresses it, and falls rapidly; when he would rise, he increases it and floats with ease. He also has the power of forcing air into the hollow parts of the body, and thus to assist his flight.

◆

HUMBLE BIRTH.—Humble birth is an incitement to high deeds and the attainment to lofty station. Many of our greatest men have sprung from humble origin, as the lark, whose nest is on the ground, soars nearest to heaven. Narrow circumstances are the most powerful stimulants to mental expansion, and the early frown of fortune the best security for her final smiles. A nobleman, who painted remarkably well showing one of his picturs to Poussin, an amateur, the latter exclaimed, "Your lordship only requires a little poverty to make you a complete artist." The conversation turned upon the antiquity of the different Italian houses, in the presence of Sextus V., when Pope—he maintained that his was the most illustrious of any; for being half unroofed, the light entered on all sides, a circumstance to which he attributed his having been enabled to exchange it for a Vatican.

ASKING FOR WORK.—Thomas Hood says:—"To me—speaking from my heart, and recording my deliberate opinion on a material, that, frail as it is, will long outlast my own fabric—there is something deeply affecting in the spectacle of a young man, in the prime of life and vigor, offering himself a voluntary slave in the labor market, without a purchaser—eagerly proffering to barter the free use of his body, the day long exertion of his strength, the wear and tear of flesh and blood, bone and muscle, for the common necessaries of life—earnestly craving for bread on the penal conditions prescribed by his Creator, and in vain—in vain! Well for those who enjoy each blessing of earth that there are volunteers to work out the curse! Well for the drones of the social hive that there are bees of so industrious a turn willing for an infinitesimal share of the honey, to undertake the labor of its fabrication."

MANUSCRIPT SERMONS SUPPLIED.—In England some persons are constantly engaged in writing sermons to sell to clergymen. The following advertisement appeared in a late number of the John Bull:—

"Many young ministers, from the press of parochial business, and from inexperience in composition, being sometimes obliged, very much against their inclination, and to the serious injury of their ministry, to copy sermons from books, the advertiser, an experienced clergyman, engages to supply original sermons of good composition, of decidedly evangelical doctrine, and of practical application, on receipt of half a sovereign ($2 50) each. Persons requiring sermons may choose their own texts, and need not disclose their names, as the sermons can be directed to a fictitious signature, at any post office they are required to be sent to!"

The Rev. Mr. Balfour says that a sign was placed over the door of a building in England with the following words: "Sermons unpreached for sale here."

VARIETY.

A facetious gentleman traveling in pursuit of pleasure, on arriving at his lodgings in the evening, was met by the ostler, whom he thus addressed:—"Boy, extricate that quadruped from the vehicle—stabulate him—denote him adequate supply of nutritious aliment; and when the Aurora of morning shall again illuminate the oriental horizon, I shall reward you a pecuniary compensation for your amiable hospitality." The boy, not understanding a word, ran into the house saying, "Master, here is a Dutchman wants to see you."

Beauty, says Lord Kaines, is a dangerous property, tending to corrupt the mind of a wife, though it soon loses its influence over the husband. A figure agreeable and engaging, which inspires affection without the ebriety of love, is a much safer choice. The graces lose not their influence like beauty. At the end of thirty years, a virtuous woman, who makes an agreeable companion, charms her husband perhaps more than at first.

We overheard, not many days ago, the following conversation between a master builder and a day laborer: "What wages do you expect?" "Why, I can work for a dollar a day, or seventy-five cents a day, or fifty cents a day, or twenty five cents a day. When I works for a dollar a day, I works. When I gets only a half or a quarter, I takes it easy." The spade and shovel was put on a dollar per diem allowance.

The forms of cylinders leave large spaces between them. Mathematicians labored a long time to find out what figure could be used to lose no space; and at last found that it was a six sided figure—also that three planes ending in a point, form the strongest roof or floor. The honey bee discovered the same things a good while ago. Honey comb is made upon six sided figures, and the roof built with three planed surfaces coming together.

A lady whose fondness for a generous living had given her a flushed face and a carbuncled nose, consulted Dr. Cheyne. Upon surveying herself in the glass, she exclaimed—"Where in the name of wonder did I get such a nose as this?" "Out of the decanter, Madam," said the doctor.

The slow transmission of heat through loosely coherent clay and sand, was tested recently in England, by an experiment in which a thickness of half an inch of such matter intercepted the heat of a mass of 11 tons of white-hot melted cast iron for 20 minutes without the heat outside of the vessel being sufficient to pain the hand.

An Arabian in the desert had ate nothing for three days, and was on the point of death. He at last found a small leathern sack in the sand, he seized it, felt it, and exclaimed, "Allah be praised! these must be either dates or nuts." He opened the sack hastily, looked in, and sighed, "Alas! they are only pearls."

A French journal affirms, that at the conclusion of an orgie which took place a few days ago in a restauraut of the Boulevord des Italiens, an opera girl, who made one of the company, bathed in champaigne, one hundred bottles of that wine, at 6s. per bottle, having been emptied into a bath for that purpose.

An exchange says that a clerk in a hardware store in Cincinnati, put one hundred and fifty dollars in a tea-kettle for safe keeping, and while he was out of the way the master of the shop sold the kettle for seventy-five cents, not suspecting the treasure it contained. The customer was so well pleased with his bargain that he has not been seen at the same store since.

Mr. Hanneman, of Roxbury, Mass., known throughout the United States, as a manufacturer of fire engines, is now constructing a splendid machine for Constantinople, which, it is said, will be the first engine ever used in that city.

The quantity of beet-root sugar manufactured in France during the last six months, amounted to 52,695,424 killogrammes, being an increase of 13,343,670 kilogrammes upon the quantity made in the preceding season.

The valuation of property in Fall River, for the present year, is estimated at $7,715,170—an increase over the valuation of last yoar of $1,134,458. The population of the town numbers 11,646—and increaso of 472.

At the Liverpool police court, two men named M'Carthy were committed for trial on a charge of stealing a clock from a public house. One of them pleaded in defence that the clock was standing still, and he took it down to make it go!

The first Lord Lyttleton was very absent in company, and when he fell into the river by the upsetting of a boat, at Hagely, it was said of him that he had "sunk twice before he recollected he could swim."

A packet sailed for Liberia from Baltimore, on the 3d inst., with eighty emigrants, sent out by the American and Maryland Colonization Societies.

The Chinese noblemen reject all English coaches from a sense of the impropriety of placing the coachmen on a higher seat than that of his master.

THE DAILY NATIONAL WHIG is published in the city of Washington, every day, at three o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted, and served to subscribers in the City, at the Navy Yard, in Georgetown, in Alexandria, and in Baltimore, the same evening, at six and a quarter cents a week, payable to the sole agent of the Whig, G. L. Gillchrist, Esq., or his order. It is also mailed to any part of the United States for $4 per annum, or $2 for six months, payable in advance. Advertisements of ten lines or less inserted one time for 50 cents, two times for 75 cents, three times for $1, one week for $1 75, two weeks for $2 75, one month for $4, two months for $7, three months for $10, six months for $16, one year for $20, payable always in advance.

The "National Whig" is what its name indicates. It speaks the sentiments of the Whig party of the Union on every question of public policy. It advocates the election to the Presidency of Zachary Taylor, subject to the decision of a Whig National Convention. It makes war to the knife upon all the measures and acts of the Administration deemed to be adverse to the interests of the country, and exposes without fear or favor the corruptions of the party in power. Its columns are open to every man in the country, for the discussion of political or any other questions.

In addition to politics, a large space in the National Whig will be devoted to publications upon Agriculture, Mechanics, and other useful arts, Science in general, Law, Medicine, Statistics, &c. Choice specimens of American and Foreign Literature will also be given, including Reviews, &c. A weekly list of the Patents issued by the Patent Office will likewise be published—the whole forming a complete family newspaper.

The "Weekly National Whig," one of the largest newspapers in the United States, is made up from the columns of the Daily National Whig, and is published every Saturday, for the low price of $2 per annum, payable in advance. A double sheet of eight pages will be given whenever the psess of matter shall justify it.

The Memoirs of General Taylor, written expressly for the National Whig, are in course of publication. They commenced with the second number, a large number of copies of which have been printed, to supply calls for back numbers.

CHAS. W. FENTON,
Proprietor of the National Whig.

P. S. All daily, weekly, and semi-weekly papers in the United States are requested to insert this advertisement once a week for six months, noticing the price for publishing the same at the bottom of the advertisement, and send the paper containing it to the National Whig office, and the amount will be duly remitted. Our editorial brethren are also requested to notice the National Whig in their reading columns.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institntion, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

CHINA.

1. A Narrative of an Exploratory Visit to each of the Consular Cities of China, in behalf of the Church Missionary Society, in the years 1844—5—6. By the Rev. GEORGE SMITH, M. A., of Magdalen Hall, Oxford. London, 1847.

4. China and the Chinese Mission. By the Rev. JAMES HAMILTON, National Scotch Church, Regent Square. London, 1847.

China is undoubtedly the most singular country in the world. Possessing a population amounting to at least a third of the whole human race, and occupying a vast yet continuous and well defined portion of the globe, it has existed as a peculiar and entirely secluded kingdom for a longer period of time than any other nation on the face of the earth. While mi[illegible]ons and wars and foreign conquests were m[illegible]ast changes in the rest of the world—whi[illegible]s were rising up from barbarism, flouris[illegible]ason, and then sinking into insignific[illegible]Chinese held on in one uniform tenor with the same arts, the same government, the same laws, unchanged and uninterrupted, except by casual outbreaks and tumults within themselves, which were soon calmed and smoothed over. While many mighty nations of the Western World were still in a comparative barbarism, the Chinese had their various arts to embellish domestic life,—they were clothed in their silks and cottons—were expert in the culture of the soil—knew something of the nature of the magnetic compass—of gunpowder, and various other inventions still unheard of in Europe.

The extreme caution of their natures, a certain timid and exclusive policy, which has all along characterized their intercourse with surrounding nations, as much, perhaps, as their self-conceit, which made them look down upon all others as barbarians, had the effect of keeping them for so long a time in such a state of singular seclusion. At last, however, the spell has been broken; an almost unavoidable war of aggression has done to them, what wars and conquests seem to have been the chief agents in performing among all the nations of the world—it has opened up this vast empire to the intercourse, and influence, and example of other races, and other modes of civilization. If it be not good for man to live alone, neither is it for nations; for we find that the same narrow, contracted, and selfish notions, which arise in the solitary and secluded individual, are no less apt to take possession of a whole community. Hence the exclusive jealousy of strangers, the vain boasting, and ignorance of the manners and history of all other nations, so conspicuous in the Chinese.

Hitherto our information regarding the actual state of China has been derived from the hasty survey of ambassadors quickly passing through it, or the casual reports of a few missionaries who had been permitted, under many restrictions, to enter the country. But now that five of the largest maritime cities have been opened up by treaty to the trade and free intercourse of all nations, we begin to have the accounts of travelers who have made themselves acquainted with the language, and whose opportunities of observation have been more extensive and more unreserved than those of any of their predecessors. Of the works more recently published on this subject, we have selected a volume by the Rev. George Smith, of the Church Missionary Society; another volume by a Diplomatist, resident in Canton; and a third by a scientific traveler;—all of whom have spent from two to three years in China, and have acquired a knowledge of the language. It is true that the range of these travelers has been limited to the maritime cities and surrounding districts, and has not extended into the central parts of the empire, or even to the capital, Pekin; but when it is considered that such a uniformity and sameness pervade the whole empire—that the people and institutions of any one province are so like those of any other—it may be presumed that we glean from their partial observations a pretty accurate conception of the average condition of the whole empire.

The population of China, both from native statements and the calculations of foreigners, has been estimated at not less than 360 millions. Immense as this amount of human beings appears, it is perhaps not an over-estimate. The city of Canton is said to contain a million of inhabitants; that of Foo-chow 600,000; and the other cities visited are reported to be generally swarming with inhabitants. But even supposing the estimate above given to be correct, the whole area of China Proper contains 1,300,000 square miles, so that we have to each square mile 277 human beings. Now, if we compare this rate of population with that of England, as afforded by the last census of 1841, we shall find that in it there are 287 persons to every square mile. We must not then be deceived by exaggerated conceptions of the extreme density of the population of China. With a comparatively level and arable country, a rich soil, that in many localities bears two crops a year, and an industrious and frugal people, the average density of the population comes considerably short of that of England.

With an extent of surface, and an amount of population, equal to twenty-five Englands, this vast empire is ruled by the despotic sway of one individual. The genius of a people most frequently moulds their government. The mild and submissive, and generally unimpassioned character of the Chinese, peculiarly fits them for implicit subjection. Their leading mental characteristic is plain homely common sense—they have not the imaginative qualities or passionate enthusiasm of other oriental nations, neither have they the profound, excursive, and restless intellects of the nations of the West. Filial respect and veneration is their most prominent instinct—their notions of rule are patriarchal. From their fathers and kindred their respect extends to their rulers and their Emperor, who again, on their parts, take care to foster and encourage such feelings, and not to outrage them. Public opinion exists and prevails to such an extent as to keep a check on bad government, or outrageously corrupt administration; but there is neither the desire nor energy to carry it further. There is no permanent or hereditary nobility among this people. There are many old families who are held in estimation, but the two great distinctions of the people are into the literary class and the plebeian. Admission into the literary class is open to every individual of the empire, however poor or unknown; and from this class alone are selected all government officials, from the lowest clerk up to the greatest mandarin. Candidates for admission are subjected to a strict and generally an impartial examination. After having passed this first examination, they undergo a second and more searching one before they can become eligible for office; and a third is necessary for those who aim at the highest posts. The candidates for these literary honors are always very numerous, and an intense interest is shown at the periods of examination, both by the individuals themselves and their relatives. A great many are of course rejected, but these return again and again to their studies, and make repeated attempts to pass the ordeal. Once accepted, they are almost sure to succeed in time to some Government employment, and the highest appointments are open to all. So highly is admission into this literary class prized by the people, that a successful aspirant sheds a lustre on his family, and even ennobles his more humble parent.

The same government and laws extend over the whole of the empire, and each province has its full complement of Government officials. If we call to mind that each province is in extent equal to an ordinary European kingdom, we need not be surprised at the number of these officials. There are, in the first place, three grand orders of mandarins: 1st, the civil; 2d, the literary, who superintend the examinations for degrees and admission into the literary class; 3d, the military. Each of these orders may again be subdivided into other three, so that there are in all nine mandarins, or higher officers, in each province—all those being distinguished by the quality and color of the buttons on the top of their caps. A simple enumeration of the different denominations of the several officers of the province of Kwang-tung, will so far indicate the nature of their duties, and afford a general idea of the officials of the other provinces. There is first the Tsung-tu, or Governor-General, whose power not unfrequently extends over more than one province. Then a Governor, Superintendent of Finance, Provincial Judge, Collector of Salt Duties, Grain Collector, Intendant of Circuit, Prefect of Department, and three Sub-Prefects, District Magistrate and assistants, Township Magistrate and assistants, Inspector of Police, Inspector of River Police, Secretary, Treasurer, Prison Master, Superintendent of Customs. The Government salaries of these officials are very small; the highest, that of the Governor-General, amounting only to £60 of English money, and the lowest ranging from £12 to £20. The consequence is that their incomes are made up by extortion and bribes, levied on the community. This, like the arrangements of some of our European Governments (the Russian for example) is a most unfortunate one, and leads to endless abuse of justice. The vast extent of the empire, too, and the impossibility of the most vigilant central Government taking due cognizance of the whole, tends greatly to peculation and abuse of authority, and to that feebleness of the executive power which prevails throughout China.

"I have found it impossible," says Mr. Meadows, "to learn, with any degree of certainty, what the real incomes of the mandarins, as increased by illegal fees and special bribes, may amount to. They vary with the harvests, which, according as they are good or bad, render it easy or difficult to collect the land-tax—a proceeding in connection with which much extortion is carried on. They vary also with the number of law-suits, and the wealth of the litigating parties; and, lastly, they vary with the characters of the individual mandarins. The legal incomes of the lower mandarins, are, indeed, so notoriously insufficient, that they have little hesitation in speaking, even to a foreigner, of their other gains in a general way; but they have many reasons for not entering into particulars. Under these circumstances, it is little better than a guess when I assume the highest mandarins to get about ten times, the lowest about fifty times the amount of their legal incomes. One of those in the receipt of about £22 legal income, once complained feelingly to me about his poverty, and on my hinting that his post was after all not a bad one, he protested, with some earnestness, that his whole income did not exceed 7000 taels, (£2333,) of which he had, he said, to give a great deal away."—P. 100.

Mr. Meadows exhibits a table of the Government salaries of the State officials, and the actual incomes which they derive by extortion, and other means, deduced from the best information he could obtain. Thus, a Governor-General receives from Government £60 per annum, but he contrives to make his actual income £8,323. A governor of a province gets, nominally, £50, and makes it up to £4,333. A judge has £43 of salary, and makes up £2,000. The collectors of taxes from £1,500 to £1,000. Even a subordinate officer, with a nominal salary of £10 or £12, ekes it out, by various means, to £200 and £300.

The yomun is a large building, where the courts of justice, prisons, and offices and houses of the mandarins, and other officials, are situated. It consists of four divisions. The outermost contains the jails, and places of confinement for short periods, as also the dwellings of the inferior officers. The second contains a hall of justice, for the formal trial of causes and criminals, as also apartments for public records, treasury, &c. The third includes the office of the mandarin himself, and rooms for the public reception of visitors; while the innermost division comprises the private residence of the mandarin and his family. Attached to each of these establishments are the Shi Ye, the judicial advisers, and private secretaries of the mandarin. These men are the only people in China who devote themselves solely to the study of the law, and in so far they resemble our advocates, barristers, and sergeants-at-law; but they are scarcely ever made mandarins (judges,) and none of them act as counsel for either of the litigating parties in an action at law; their sole business is to protect the interests of the mandarin their employer, to point out to him the proper way of conducting his judicial examinations, and to see that the decisions he pronounces are in strict accordance with the laws, so as that he may not incur any of the penalties laid down in the code of the Board of Civil Office, and thus subjected to degredation or dismissal. These lawyers are not recognized as official servants of Government, but are in the private employment of the mandarins. Certain of these devote their attention to the criminal, and others to the civil law. Besides these, there are a set of nondescript retainers, who hang about the mandarin, and are the negociators of all the special bribes, and other illegal gains of their master, and a number of inferior Government clerks, who keep accounts of the revenue, and make copies of all law papers, and other Government business. The judges alone investigate, and decide in all causes and trials; there are no counsel for the prisoner, and of course nothing corresponding to juries. Threats, and torture, too, are of daily occurrence. The interior of a yamun is said to present a very strange and bustling scene.

"The almost unceasing flail-like sounds of beating with the bamboo, either as a punishment for ascertained guilt, or to extort confessions and evidence—the cries of the sufferers—the voices of the examining mandarins questioning, bullying, and wheedling—the voices of the porters stationed at the doors, between the first and second and the second and third divisions, transmitting, in a loud singing tone, orders for different officers to repair to certain places where they are wanted—the constant running hither and thither of some of the inmates of the place, and the frequent appearance of criminals and witnesses being escorted to and from the prisons and rooms for examination—are sounds and sights that bewilder and agitate those who have not been accustomed to them, and serve to heighten that dread which all Chinese entertain of entering a yamun."—Meadows, p. 115.

The yamun of a district magistrate thus comprises within itself what may be called the general police station on a great scale—the county jail, as it were, for the custody of debtors and of criminals, awaiting trial or execution—the place where quarter-sessions and assizes are held—the offices of all the subordinate officers of the courts, and the office and residence of the chief mandarin, who is at once judge, sherriff, coroner, and commissioner of taxes. In a populous district such a building is calculated to contain from 300 to 500 individuals, and in a less populous place about 200. The Chinese, however, in their domiciles, contrive to pack into amazingly little room, so that their buildings do not at first view appear so extensive.

In general, the habits of the Chinese population, especially in the country districts, are peaceful and submissive. In the largest towns, however, especially in Canton, there are frequent tumultuous ebullitions of the mob. Their contempt and hatred of foreigners cannot be easily restrained, and the appellation "Fanquee," or "foreign devil," is a term of common repreoch. Canton, however, affords not a favorable specimen of Chinese manners. In the more northern cities, and in the country districts, a stranger may safely mingle with the people, without any other inconvenience than that arising from their excessive curiosity. They are almost uniformly kind, hospitable, and good-humored.

A great proportion of the lower orders of the community fare but poorly, and have great difficulty in making out their daily bread, while hosts of beggars are to be found in all the cities. For these a tax is levied in Amoy, and perhaps in other cities throughout the kingdom, the collector of which is called "the king of the beggars." This tax is partly optional with the payers, and is indirectly under the cognisance of the Government. "The king," who is duly elected from among the number of the beggars, calls on each householder at the beginning of the year, and ascertains the monthly subscription which he is willing to give, in order to be free from the annoyance of their visits for alms, and the clatter of the sticks by which they implore relief. For the sum of five or six hundred *cash a month, he gives a red piece of paper, inscribed with three copies of the characters for "great good luck," inclosed within an outline of a jar or vase; this is affixed to the door-post as a sign of immunity, and is renewed at the commencement of every year. Any beggar overlooking this bill of exemption, and entering a shop for relief, may be seized by the householder, and be beaten on the spot. "The king," after giving a certain proportion to the mandarins, and appropriating a certain fund for the support of the incorporated society of beggars, contrives to appropriate the remainder to his own use, and to become a rich man. The beggars are covered with tattered rags, wear long dishevelled hair, and are not very particular in the mode of satisfying their hunger.

"I observed," says Mr. Smith, "one of these beggars pass the shop of a confectioner, and stealthily slip a cake into his hand, and throw it into his sleeve. One of the partners, who saw the theft, ran out and followed the thief, caught him by the hair, and made him restore the cake from the folds of his sleeve, and then, by a species of lynch-law, very common in a country where ordinary law is expensive, and bribes must precede justice, gave the beggar a severe beating, and let him depart, amid the applause of the crowd, the good humor of the tradesman himself, and a remarkable nonchalance on the part of the offender."

The Chinese cities have a general resemblance to each other. They are irregularly built, crowded within a small space—have a dirty appearance, have few large or fine streets, but innumerable narrow lanes, and are generally traversed by canals in all directions, and are surrounded by walls and ramparts. There are few public buildings which make any show, with the exception of pagodas and temples, which are common both within the walls and in the suburbs. Mr. Smith thus describes his first impressions of Canton:—

"The recently-arrived stranger naturally manifests surprise and incredulity on being told that the estimated populatien of Canton exceeds a million. As soon, however, as he visits the close streets, with their dense population and busy wayfarers, huddled together into lanes from five to nine feet wide, where Europeans could scarcely inhale the breath of life, the greatness of the number no longer appears incredible. After the first feelings of novelty have passed away, disappointment, rather than admiration, occupies the mind. After leaving the open space before the factories, or, as the Chinese call them, the thirteen hongs, and passing through Old China street, New China street, Curiosity street, and similar localities, the names of which indicate their propinquity to the residence of foreigners, we beheld an endless succession of narrow avenues, scarcely deserving the name of streets. As the visitor pursues his course, narrow lanes still continue to succeed each other, and the conviction is gradually impressed on the mind, that such is the general character of the streets of the city. Along these, busy traders, mechanics, barbers, venders, and porters, make their way; while occasionally the noisy abrupt tones of vociferating coolies remind the traveler that some materials of bulky dimensions are on their transit, and suggest the expediency of keeping at a distance, to avoid collision. Now and then the monotony of the scene is relieved by some portly mandarin, or merchant of the higher class, borne in a sedan-chair on the shoulders of two, or sometimes four men. Yet, with all this hurry and din, there seldom occurs any accident or interruption of good nature. On the river the same order and regularity prevail. Though there are probably not fewer than 200,000 denizens of the river, whose hereditary domains are the watery element that supports their little dwelling, yet harmony and good feeling are conspicuous in the accommodating manner with which they make way for each other. These aquatic tribes of the human species show a most philosophic spirit of equanimity, and contrive, in this way, to strip daily life of many of its little troubles; while the fortitude and patience with which the occasional injury or destruction of their boat is borne, is remarkable.

"To return from the wide expanse of the river-population to the streets in the suburbs, the same spirit of contented adaption to external things is everywhere observable; and it is difficult which to regard with most surprise—the narrow abodes of the one, or the little boats which serve as family residences to the other. There is something of romance in the effect of Chinese streets. On either side are shops, decked out with native ware, furniture, and manufactures of various kinds. These are adorned by pillars of sign boards, rising perpendicularly, and inscribed from top to bottom with the various kinds of saleable articles which may be had within. Native artists seem to have lavished their ingenuity on several of these inscriptions, and, by their caligraphy, to give some idea of the superiority of the commodities for sale. Many of these sign-boards contain some fictitious emblem, adopted as the name of the shop, similar to the practice prevalent in London two centuries ago. On entering, the proprietor, with his assistants or partners, welcomes a foreigner with sundry salutations; sometimes advancing to shake hands, and endeavoring to make the most of his scanty knowledge of English. They will show their saleable articles with the utmost patience, and evince nothing of disappointment if, after gratifying his curiosity, he departs without purchasing. At a distance from the factories, where the sight of a foreigner is a rarity, crowds of idlers, from fifty to a hundred, rapidly gather round the shop, and frequent embarrassment ensues from an incipient or imperfect knowledge of the colloquial medium. In these parts the shopkeepers know nothing but their own language, and are more moderate in their politeness, and, as a compensation, put a less price on their wares. To write one's name in Chinese characters is a sure method of enhancing their good favor. Sometimes no fewer than eight or ten blind beggars find their way into a shop, and there they remain, singing a melancholy dirge-like strain and most perseveringly beating together two pieces of wood, till the weary shopman at length takes compassion on them, and provides for the quiet of his shop by giving a copper cash to each; on receiving which they depart, and repeat the same experiment elsewhere. The streets abound with these blind beggars, who are seldom treated with indignity. A kindly indulgence is extended to them, and they enjoy a prescriptive right of levying a copper cash from every shop or house they enter. It is said that this furnishes a liberal means of livelihood to an immense number of blind persons, who, in many instances, are banded together in companies or societies, subject to a code of rules, on breach of which the transgressor is expelled the community, and loses his guild.

"In every little open space there are crowds of traveling doctors, haranguing the multitude on the wonderful powers and healing virtues of the medicines which they expose for sale. Close by, some cunning fortune-teller may be seen, with crafty look, explaining to some awe-stricken simpleton his future destiny in life, from a number of books arranged before him, and consulted with due solemnity. In another part, some tame birds are exhibiting their clever feats, in singling out, from amongst a hundred others, a piece of paper enclosing a coin, and then receiving a grain of millet as a reward for their cleverness. At a little distance are some fruit-stalls, at which old and young are making purchases, throwing lots for the quantity they are to receive. Near these, again, are noisy gangs of people, pursuing a less equivocal course of gambling, and evincing, by their excited looks and clamors, the intensity of their interest in the issue. In another part may be seen disposed the apparatus of some Chinese tonsor, who is performing his skillful vocation on the crown of some fellow-countryman unable to command the attendance of the artist at a house of his own."

THE MAIDEN MISSIONARY.

"——Denied, to self, to earthly fame
Denied, and earthly wealth, who kindred left,
And home, and ease, and all the cultur'd joys,
Conveniences, and delicate delights,
Of ripe society; in the great cause
Of man's salvation, greatly valorous;
Who, strong, though seeming weak, who, warlike, though
Unarm'd with bow and sword; appearing mad,
Though sounder than the schools alone e'er made
The Doctor's head; devoted to God and truth,
And sworn to man's eternal weal, beyond
Repentance sworn, or thought of turning back."
[POLLOK.

About twenty years ago, a small, low, dark room, in Cambridge, Massachusetts, was the scene of more practical Christianity; the resort of more pious hearts; the theatre of more disinterested, wide, far-seeing plans to bring the blessings of the Gospel to the doors and hearts of all men, than perhaps any equal space in the United States. It was the home of any body needing any thing. There, the hungry came to be fed; there the naked came to be clothed; and there the sick came to be ministered unto. There was not a tale of distress in the country but it was told there; and never told but to be relieved; the widow and the orphan came there, but to have the tear wiped away by kind sympathizing hands. There poor tradesmen came to be helped—there poor clergymen came to be assisted. If there was a half-built Baptist meeting house in the State, moving slowly to the completion—if there was a benevolent society, languishing for funds, any where, away the committee went to Deacon Farwell, for it was well known that his purse, like the gates of Heaven, always stood open to the worthy. If there was a student in the neighboring Theological Institute at Newton, unwell or homesick, Mrs. Farwell found it out, and without being asked, sent him money to pay his expenses home to visit his friends. Whatever a poor student needed, from shirts to books, some way or other she knew it, and the means to procure the article required, was forthcoming. I have known her, and that in the most delicate way possible, give fifteen dollars at a time to a student for books.

That obscure back parlor, though the resort of the needy, was not the resort of the needy alone. It was the resort of the good, of all who sympathized with the Zachariah and Elizabeth that occupied it, in exalted Christian purposes—of Bible Christians. It was holy ground. A Christian, if he enjoyed religion, found it difficult to pass the door without stepping in. Of the many that were thus attracted thither about the time referred to, might have been seen, occasionally, four young females, who afterwards became missionaries to Burmah. One still lifts up her voice on the wild banks of the mighty Brahmapootra, teaching the rude inhabitants of its valley the songs of Zion; a voice that has thrilled through the hearts, and awakened the sympathies of many a polished city assembly; but where are the others? One sleeps beneath the cold flag-stones, and amid the Bable sounds of London; where she fell, worn out, on her return to leave her children on the green hills of her native land, and die.

Another has her home with her noble husband, by the lair of the barking deer of Arracan.

"——Lovely in your lives, ye were,
And in your early death divided not,
Ye were but two, and when that spirit pass'd
Wo to the one, the last!"

The third is pillowed at the feet of the fragrant flowering trees of Tavoy; where amid their dense, drooping foliage, the tailor bird stitches up her leafy dwelling; the yellow Oriole raises her matin song; the green-winged Parakeet, the red-backed Diceum, and the crested Hoopoe bird gambol; and the glossy black Edolius, performs her melodious vespers, loud as a Mussulman, which he looks towards Mecca at sunset.

This last individual, Helen Maria Griggs, is the subject of the work above referred to. She was born in Brookline, near Boston, Dec. 22, 1806.

MEN OF ONE IDEA.

It is very common to hear certain classes of individuals spoken of in derision as "men of one idea;" and no doubt those who use the expression generally imagine that by doing so they effectually silence the persons in question, and turn from them the public sympathy. We are not disposed to deny that there are persons who deserve the title, even when used, as it commonly is, in a contemptuous manner. Indeed, we know that there are not a few bigoted fanatics in the world, who are so absorbed with some one insignificant idea, that they exalt it immeasurably above its proper place, and can see no importance in any thing else. To the application of the title to such persons, we do not object. It describes their characters as well as any other expression which could be used; and as they generally do more harm than good, they are perhaps justly liable to the reproach which the expression is designed to convey.

But there is another application of the title, to which we object. We refer to its use in reference to the reformers of the age, to whom it is not unfrequently applied by those who would resist their appeals, or turn them into derision. It is true that these reformers generally appear before the public each as the advocate of some favorite idea; and, under such circumstances, they are quite likely to seem, particularly to superficial observers, neglectful of other equally good objects. But a little closer scrutiny of their characters will usually show, that they are alive to all the woes which afflict mankind, and are ready to labor for their removal whenever a suitable opportunity is presented. Believing, however, in the principle of a division of labor, they have devoted themselves to some single department, and hope that their influence will be more or less felt, though indirectly, in every other department. To speak of such persons as men of one idea, and especially to do so for the purpose of casting reproach upon them, is in a high degree unjust. They are the lights of the age—the pioneers, who go forward to prepare a way in which those who now deride them will be glad to walk at no distant day. Instead of being classed with unbalanced and bigoted fanatics, they ought to rank with such men as Luther, Howard, and Wilberforce; not to say with the Apostles themselves, who gave such prominence to the one great idea of salvation through Jesus Christ.

From the foregoing it will be easy to infer how we regard the expression, "one idea men," when used in reference to those who advocate the observance of the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath. They are not fanatics who attach no importance to any other than that one truth. They hold to all the truths revealed in the Word of God, and are devoted to the best interests of man in every department. They believe, however, that the system of interpretation upon which a change of the Sabbath is generally justified, jeopardizes every form of divine truth, and threatens seriously and injuriously to effect the views of revelation itself. Hence they feel called upon to lift up a warning voice, and to spare no pains to disseminate what they regard as true views in reference to the claims of the only Heaven-appointed Sabbath day. Instead, therefore, of being men of simply one idea, they are men of at least one idea more than those who reproach them.

MISSIONS OF THE AMERICAN BOARD.

From a detailed report of the concerns of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, read at a recent meeting at Buffalo, it appears that the receipts of the year had amounted to $209,365 21, and the expenditures to $264,783 73. The Board has now under its care twenty-six missions, embracing ninety-six stations, in connection with which there are laboring 140 ordained missionaries, nine of whom are also physicians; six printers and book-binders; 193 married and unmarried females; making 370 missionary laborers sent from this country—associated with whom are 22 native preachers and 135 other native helpers, making the whole number connected with the Board and dependent on it mainly for support, 526. Under the care of the missionaries, and gathered by their labors, are 73 churches, to which have been added, during the past year, 1076 members. The present number of members connected with these mission churches, is 25,441. There are connected with these missions 11 seminaries for training native preachers and teachers, having 423 pupils, and 22 other boarding schools, having 399 male and 536 female pupils; also 367 free schools, in which are about 11,330 pupils, making the whole number in school about 12,600, not including schools in the Sandwich Islands, supported in part by the people. There are eleven printing establishments and six stereotype foundries connected with these missions, and the amount of printing the past year has been over 40 millions pages, and over 575 millions since the commencement of the Board's operations.

"Peculiar Feelings."—The Evangelist finds the following in a paper published in the German State of Hesse:—A Baptist father had withstood for nine months the efforts which were made to induce him to have his infant child baptized. At last the use of compulsion was determined upon. The magistrate of the district held the child in his arms during the ceremony, and gave him the name of Frederick William John. During the services two officers stood at the door, ready to offer their assistance in case any resistance should be made. The writer in the paper from which this account is taken, adds with much simplicity, "The feelings of the clergyman while administering the sacrament under such circumstances, as well as those of the parents while witnessing it, must have been of a very peculiar nature." We think as much.

THOUGHTS ON REVIVALS.

A revival of "undefiled religion" is very desirable; but a revival of any other kind of religion is to be dreaded. A superstitious regard for ceremonies and observances of human invention—a religion consisting in excited passions merely, or in the name of Christianity alone—is not honorable to God, nor promotive of the best interests of men. None of these effect the purification of the heart or reformation of the life. The influence of excitement may indeed produce a partial reformation for a short time, while the heart is unrenewed; but the individual returns in a little while to his former course. Multitudes, under the influence of excitement, have professed to be the servants of God, and have joined the churches, who have never given up their sins, except some scandalous ones, and are now as much as they ever were under the influence and control of worldly motives. Such church members, proud and worldly, are a disgrace to the cause of God, and an injury to the souls of men. A revival of religion (so called) that adds to a church only such converts, will doubtless please those who are chiefly anxious to increase the numbers of the church, and also its respectability among carnal men; but it is only a source of grief to the pious soul, who knows that "those things which are highly esteemed among men are abomination in the sight of God." Pure religion is opposed to sin and all selfishness. It brings the sinner to see himself a rebel against God, and beg for mercy at Jesus' feet. It influences him to forsake all his sins, and to keep all of God's commandments. It makes him a new man. Instead of living and acting constantly to gratify himself, as he formerly did, he now lives and labors for God and his cause; he now feels his obligation to love God supremely, and his "neighbor as himself." When many individuals in one neighborhood are thus "turned from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God," there is cause for great joy in that place. Then, instead of pride is found humility; instead of blasphemy, prayer and praise; instead of the love of sin, the love of holiness. Where fashion was once eagerly followed, now Christ and those worthies who inherit the promises are imitated. The subjects of this work of grace are willing to confess with sorrow the sins of which they have been guilty. Have they been engaged in employments which are injurious to community?—they abandon those employments, let it cost what it may. Have they injured the reputation or property of others?—they are ready, as much as in them lies, to make restitution. They feel that they "are not their own, but bought with a price." They are willing, as faithful stewards, to make use of the time and property entrusted to them. Hence they are diligent in business, and willing to lop off their extravagancies in dress, &c., and also the gratifications of a depraved appetite, that they may have wherewith to help the widow, the fatherless, and other sons of need, and also to propagate the religion of the Bible. To work for God is their constant employment. They have indeed "come out from the world, and are separate." Their affections are set on things above, and their inheritance is in heaven. How much is a revival of this ancient and holy religion needed in our land, at the the present time! "Iniquity abounds;" the plants of grace seem to be drying up; the multitude are pursuing the way to ruin; very many church members, who have professed to renounce their sins, are living in violation of their religious vows, and indulging in almost every kind of fashionable sins, and yet think themselves to be in the way to heaven! What an occasion have true saints to weep over the desolations of Zion! How Satan triumphs! Well may the servants of God cry, "O Lord, revive thy work."

But by what means may a genuine revival be promoted? 1st. Let those who would engage in it put away their own sins, and humble themselves before the Lord, and thus secure to themselves the joy of God's salvation. Let them seek to be endued with power from on high. Let them be "holy in all manner of conversation." 2d. Let them "pray without ceasing," that "the word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified." 3d. Let them hold forth the truth in such a way as to commend it to every man's conscience, clearly exhibiting the very sins of which men are guilty, and also the way of salvation through faith in Christ. 4th. Let them disfellowship all those who are engaged in the unfruitful works of darkness. Thus laboring constantly, we may expect the blessing of God. Walking in the fear of the Lord, and the comfort of the Holy Ghost, and having good men, full of faith and of the Holy Ghost for ministers, the number of true saints will be multiplied, whose light will shine more and more until life shall end. ABOLITION OF SLAVERY IN DELAWARE.

The National Era contains a Circular from the Delaware State Anti-Slavery Society, soliciting aid in the work of abolishing slavery from that State. The officers of the Society say that an undercurrent has long been setting towards the port of freedom, until now a great proportion of the population are prepared for emancipation. There are now only about two thousand three hundred slaves in the State, held by a comparatively small part of the population. A great majority of the citizens are non-slaveholders, and opposed to the system of slavery in interest and feeling. A prospective bill for emancipation was before the Legislature at its last session, which they believe would have passed if it had been introduced at an earlier day. In view of these facts, the friends of freedom feel encouraged to put forth renewed efforts for the accomplishment of their object. They look to the benevolence of abolitionists abroad, for means to carry on the warfare. This they are encouraged to hope, from the consideration that Delaware occupies a position where the influence of her example will be very extensively felt. If she should abolish slavery, it is quite likely that several other States would soon follow. The arguments and expectations presented in the Circular are very plausible, to say the least.

DISABILITIES OF THE JEWS.

It has been reported already in the public prints, that a Jew, one of the Rothschilds, has been elected to the British Parliament—a new fact in the treatment of that persecuted people. It is the first time that their civil disabilities have been removed, and the event is so important as to deserve special notice, and devout thanksgiving to God. The measure has met with opposition, of course, and one member, Lord Lonsdale, is reported to have said that he should be very "sorry to see our Sabbath day changed, and Jews hawking about the streets old clothes on Sunday;" to which the Manchester Guardian replies, "If Protestantism is in continual peril from the assaults of Judaism on the one hand, and Catholicism on the other, it appears to us that the most prudent course would be to give both fair play, and let them fight out their own differences between themselves. We can not help thinking, that in that case, neither would be very dangerous to Protestantism." Lord John Russell gives a hearty welcome to Baron Rothschild, and in his speech at the close of the election, is reported as saying:

"But the time has now come when the disabilities which afflicted the Protestant Dissenters, and the disabilities which affected the Roman Catholics, have been removed. You have declared by the election of Baron Rothschild (cheers) that the day has arrived for the removal of the last vestiges of religious intolerance, (cheers) and that hereafter the privileges of the free people of this United Kingdom—the privilege to serve the crown, the privilege to represent the people in Parliament—are to be enjoyed by all the subjects of her Majesty, without the distinction of religious persuasion. (Cheers.) Can you doubt, gentlemen, that such a decision on the part of the electors of London, will have its weight—its great weight—I would say its prevailing weight (cheers) upon the deliberations of Parliament, and that we shall see that the next Parliament will have the glory of establishing and proclaiming at once, the completion of the great social edifice of civil, of commercial, and of religious freedom?" (Loud cheers.)

BAPTIST MISSION AT RANGOON.

Dr. Judson writes from Rangoon, March 28th,—'I have just returned from baptizing a Burman convert, in the same tank of water where I baptized the first Burman convert, Moung Nau, twenty-eight years ago. It is now twenty-five years since I administered baptism in Rangoon, the few converts that have been made during that period, being generally baptized by the native pastor. My time has been mostly spent in Maulmain, where, having been instrumental, with others, of raising up a few Burmese and Karen churches, I have left them, since my return from America, in the care of my dear and excellent missionary brethren, and am now making a small attempt once more in Burmah Proper.

'The attempt, however, is made under very discouraging circumstances. The present administration of government, though rather more friendly to foreigners, is more rigidly intolerant than that of the late king Tharawaddy. Any known attempt at proselyting would be instantly amenable at the criminal tribunal, and would probably be punished by the imprisonment or death of the proselyte, and the banishment of the missionary. The governor of this place has received me favorably, not as a missionary (though he well knows from old acquaintance that is my character,) but as a minister of a foreign religion, ministering to foreigners resident in the place, and a dictionary maker, 'laboring to promote the welfare of both countries.' Our missionary efforts, therefore, being conducted in private, must necessarily be very limited. It is, however, a precious privilege to be allowed to welcome into a private room a small company, perhaps two or three individuals only, and pour the light of truth into their immortal souls—souls that, but for the efficacy of that light, would be covered with the gloom of darkness—darkness to be felt to all eternity.

'Another discouraging circumstance is the very low state of the Burman church in this place. There are about twenty nominal members still surviving; but they are much scattered, and not half of them appear to be living members. I have, therefore, been making an attempt to re-organize the church, and have found four individuals who have united with myself and wife in renewing our church covenant, and establishing a new church. We have, this day, received one new member, and we hope to find a few more of the old members who will come up to our standard.'

Revival Intelligence.—It is exceedingly cheering, in this day of general apathy, to read the notices which our exchanges occasionally contain of revivals of religion. A correspondent of the New York Recorder represents the Baptist churches in Rhode Island as generally in a healthful condition, and some of them enjoying revivals. The Christian Watchman says that several of the churches in the Boston Association have been blessed with "cheering revivals." The church in Farmington is particularly mentioned, in which seventy persons have been baptized during the year, and twenty others admitted to membership, a large number of whom are heads of families. The Christian Secretary mentions a recent revival in East Longmeadow, Mass.; and other papers contain accounts of revivals at various places in the Middle and Southern States. The Baptist Church in Stephentown, N. Y., has been revived, and twenty have been baptized there. The Southern Presbyterian says that a very powerful and widely-extended work of the Spirit of God has been experienced in Emory College, in the course of which a large proportion of the students have been hopefully converted.

Want of Religious Newspapers in England.—A correspondent of the Christian Chronicle, writing from Liverpool, says he has been surprised at the want of not only denominational, but of positively religious newspapers in England. The Wesleyans are endeavoring to support one, as an organ of their peculiar views, but beside this there is not another denominational paper in England. There are two that profess to be religious—The Non-Conformist and The Patriot—both of which circulate among the dissenting churches; but, certainly, from reading them, no one would suppose their editors or contributors could be troubled with religion. The truth is, they are sold to the zealots of the anti-state-church faction, and spend all their power in opposing the establishment, to the neglect of more vital and practical truths.

Baptist Association in Bengal.—Zion's Advocate says that the Province of Bengal, though scarcely so extensive in territory as New England, contains a more numerous population than the United States. Of a Baptist Association of 20 churches in the midst of such a population, we may well say, "What are these among so many?" Yet it is pleasant to think of so much success among the heathen. The annual meeting of this Association was held last November. Their statistics are given in a foreign paper. Churches 20, baptisms 249, nett increase 205, members 1207, preachers 61. Their circular letter was on Spiritual-Mindedness. The Association proposes to publish a Monthly Magazine in the native language, and another in English, to be called The Oriental Baptist.

Destitution of the Bible.—An exploration of the city of New York has just been made, as we learn from the Observer, with a view of ascertaining to what extent the population of the city was destitute of the Scriptures. Two or three persons have been employed in the work for a period of eight months, at an expense of about one thousand dollars. They visited 68,415 families and places of business; found 8,479 families destitute of the Bible; supplied 4,793, and 3,321 refused to accept the Scriptures; distributed 9,109 volumes gratuitously, (which cost $1,761,) and sold Bibles to the amount of $1,137.

The Pope and the Sultan.—We mentioned some months ago, the fact that the Pope of Rome had proposed to establish diplomatic relations with the Turkish Sultan. But an obstacle seems to have been found in the fears of Louis Philippe, King of France. The French Envoy at Rome, Count Rossi, says that "the moment the Papal Envoy sets his foot in Constantinople, the protection of the oriental Catholics by France shall cease." After such a threat, it is quite doubtful whether the project for establishing diplomatic relations between the two powers will be carried out.

The Union Magazine for October is just published, and is in no respect inferior to the three numbers previously issued. It contains an unusually large amount of reading matter for a monthly, two fine engravings, a fashion plate, and several original and ingenious wood cuts. It is destined to be one of the most popular works of its class. Edited by Mrs. C. M. Kirkland. Published by Israel Post, No. 140 Nassau street, N. Y.

Tht Great Secret; or, How to be Happy.—This is the title of a little volume of 252 pages, just published by L. Colby & Co., 122 Nassau-st. The story is one of Emily Chubbuck's best, and is designed to show that the way to be happy is to make one's self useful. The lesson is one which can not be too early or too well learned, and we therefore commend this little book to those who would teach it to their children.

Letters and Parcels for our Missionaries.—The ship Houqua, Capt. Palmer, arrived at New York from Canton, China, last week. She is to sail again about the 25th of October, direct for Shanghai. We intend to send letters and parcels by her to our missionary brethren, and will cheerfully take charge of any thing designed for them. Direct, "Geo. B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., N. Y."

Clergymen's Salaries.—An article is going the rounds of the papers, stating that the Rev. Dr. Hawkes of New Orleans, receives, as pastor of Christ's Church and Professor in the University of Louisana, a salary of not less than ten thousand dollars per annum. The Editor of "Neal's Saturday Gazette," a Philadelphia paper, in an article referring to the matter, very justly remarks:—

"While on this subject, we cannot avoid attending to the condition of the clergymen of the United States who reside out of large cities. As a general rule, the clergy of our large cities and towns are fairly paid; but not more. In the country their condition, in a vast majority of instances, is lamentable. Taken in a body, their salaries will not average four hundred dollars a year. Four hundred dollars a year, and a wife to support—children to rear up, educate and maintain! It is true, four hundred dollars a year will procure food, raiment and house room; and the children can be educated at the public schools. But the laity are very exacting; and while they will not or cannot pay a fair compensation to their spiritual guides, they are desirous that they should keep up that position in society which their means will not warrant. Let their pastor make his appearance in the sanctuary on a Sunday morning in a shabby old hat or coat, and it will afford food for a week's censorious comment. It is not merely the smallness of the salary which country pastors have to complain of. Small as the pittance is, in too many instances they fail to receive their just and hard-earned dues; and few, indeed, are aware of the misery which the want of punctuality and good faith produces. When, then, we hear at wide intervals of time of a case or two of clergymen receiving their thousands per annum, we cannot help thinking of the fifteen or twenty thousand poor country clergymen—learned, pious, zealous in their calling—who are compelled to live on, year after year, without means to procure the comforts of life."

Prayer Extraordinary.—An exchange says that the following prayer was offered by a Methodist minister who was captain of a company in one of the Mississippi regiments, just before the battle of Buena Vista, whilst the troops were forming. It is hard to believe it, and yet we suppose it expresses just about what one would have asked for in such circumstances, if he had prayed at all:—

"Be with us this day in the conflict, oh Lord! We are few, and the enemy are many! Be with us, as Thou wast with Joshua, when he went down from Gilgal to Beth-horn and Ajalon, to smite the Amorites. We do not ask you for the sun and moon to stand still, but grant us plenty of power, plenty of daylight, and no cowards. Take old Rough and Ready under Thy special charge. Amen! Company, by the right flank, quick step, forward—m-a-r-c-h!" His company, it is said, performed wonders on the field that day.

Colored Convention.—The 6th of October was fixed upon as the day for holding, in the city of Troy, N. Y., a Mational Convention of colored Americans and their friends, the objects of which are thus set forth by the committee:—

"The object of the meeting will be to form a united phalanx in opposition to the dangerous and increasing aggressions of slavery; to recommend and encourage education; to urge the necessity of acquiring property, as a means of destroying prejudice, and of elevating the character of the colored people to a high and honorable position in society; to recommend emigration and colonization, not to Africa, Asia, or Europe, but from crowded cities and servile employments, to the manly and dignified labors of agricultural life; to promote the principles of Temperance and Frugality, and to attend to all other business that will advance the interests of our oppressed fellow-citizens."

American Missionaries in Canton.—A letter from Rev. J. J. Roberts, missionary at Canton, China, after giving an account of the troubles between the English and Chinese, says:—

"Fortunately, all the missionaries in Canton are Americans, and the Chinese consider us as protectors and counsellors in the midst of fire and sword. One application was made to me, and several to others, by pesons, for letters of protection to show to the soldiers, should they come to buin their houses. I think it very doubtful, however, whether we shall be able to get houses among the people, and make improvements to the same extent as if there were no excitement, for the excitement is not yet over, nor likely to be soon. What our southern missionaries will do when they arrive, it is difficult to predict, but I suppose they may at least rent a house among the foreign factories and live there, and study the language, until this storm shall have blown over."

Statistics of China.—Mr. Bridgman, in a letter published in the Day Spring, gives the following as the statistics of China:—

Chihli,	27,990,871
Shantung,	28,958,774
Shansi,	14,004,210

General Intelligence.

THE WAR NEWS.

On Friday last, news was received in this city by telegraph, that the negotiations for peace with Mexico had failed, that the armistice had been broken, and that there had been a bloody fight between the American and Mexican forces. The report was not fully credited. But the tidings received by telegraph on Sunday, confirm the previous reports in regard to the failure of the negotiation for peace, the breaking of the armistice, and the renewal of sanguinary hostilities. The main additional fact is the reported capture of the City of Mexico by Gen. Scott, on the 14th of September, at the cost of more than 1,000 of his own army, among whom rumor includes Gens. Worth and Pillow. On the Mexican side, Gens. Bravo and Leon are said to have been killed, with several Colonels, while Santa Anna himself is among the wounded. His beaten army, abandoning the Capital, has retired on Guadalupe, he being still at its head; and there is no rational prospect of the speedy termination of the War, though Gen. Scott, with his severely-thinned battalions, now 'revels in the Halls of the Montezumas.'

The New York Tribune, speaking of the condition on which peace was offered, says:—

It now appears that the Mexican Commissioners offered to terminate the War by a Treaty making the Neuces the boundary to its source, thence due North to the actual south-eastern frontier of New-Mexico, thence following that frontier up to lat. 37° North, thence westerly to the Pacific Ocean. This would give us all Texas, with a strip of new Territory 300 miles wide and some 1,400 long—in all 420,000 square miles—embracing Californian Monterey, the magnificent Bay and Harbor of San Francisco with the large river Timpanagos and all other streams emptying therein, almost the entire course of the Buenaventura and the entire control of some 200 miles from its source to the Rio del Norte. We defy any disinterested man to say that we need or can wisely wish for more Western Territory than this. It would give us a frontier on the Pacific of 800 miles, with the only navigable river and the only capacious harbors between Nootka Sound and the Isthmus of Darien—in short, the very best portion of the entire Pacific coast, while the fearful convulsion which the question of Slave Extension is certain to create on the acquirement of a single foot of soil south of 36° 30′ would have been avoided—perhaps for ever. And it is because our Government, through its instructed agent, refused these terms, that the two nations are again engaged in dreadful butchery, which has already involved the mangling and torturing of several thousands of human beings in addition to those previously sacrificed, to say nothing of the destruction of an immense amount of property."

TWO WEEKS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Hibernia arrived at Boston on Sunday last, bringing foreign news to Sept. 19. The commercial intelligence is of great importance. A large number of houses engaged in the corn trade have failed since previous advices, the depressing effects of which have been felt in nearly every department of business.

In Ireland there appears to be a general inclination to resist the repayment of the loans advanced by the Government through the Relief Commissioners to the several poor law boards throughout Ireland for the purpose of alleviating the universal distress which prevailed in that country during the past year. Such conduct will no doubt lead to very serious results, especially if the Government insists upon the repayment of the money.

Italy is still the scene of great excitement. In Lucca and Tuscany the population have extorted from their rulers a sort of pledge to promote Progress, while their liberties have been secured by the institution of the Civic Guard from the two Sicilies.

The latest letters from Catalonia mention the defeat of a Montemolinist band of 300 men at Binolas-Depostobella, of another from 800 to 900 men at Sabadell, and of three or four others of minor importance at different places.

The Fomento de Barcelona of the 10th ult. states that the French troops had surprised a band of between 110 and 115 Carlist refugees, commanded by Cortosa and Col. Ramonarbones, just as they were preparing to enter Spain, and that most of them were taken prisoners.

Letters from St. Petersburgh, Russia, of the 7th ult. state that the city had been visited with the most terrible storm of wind and rain ever experienced within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. It rained incessantly for 48 hours, while the wind blew with intense violence. The result of this visitation was the destruction of above 400 houses. At one period fears were entertained for the safety of the entire city, and some timid and superstitious persons apprehended that the end of the world was at hand.

Disaster at Sea.—A letter from W. H. Luce, first officer of the whaling-ship Congress, of Mystic, dated Western Islands, Aug. 15, states that about three weeks previous, in lat. 39 20, lon. 48 5, Capt. Taylor and the steward went into the run of the vessel to procure a keg of paint, and in passing it up on deck the steward accidentally broke a can of turpentine, the contents of which took fire from a lamp, and in an instant the cabin was enveloped in flames. They immediately rushed on deck, their clothing having also taken fire in consequence of the turpentine which had attached to them, and which Mr. Luce vainly endeavored to subdue by pouring water upon them. The clothes of the steward had become saturated with the inflammable liquid, and were literally burned upon him, so that he died in intense suffering on the following day. The crew exerted themselves in pouring water down the trunk light, and succeeded in removing four bags of gunpowder from the transom of the ship, and finally extinguished the flames. Capt. Taylor was badly burned, chiefly at his feet, ankles, and hands, and was confined to his bed until the arrival of the ship at Fayal a few days after the accident, when he was removed on shore for medical attendance. Mr. Luce was also slightly burned. Mr. Luce shipped four hands at Fayal and proceeded on a cruise for whales, but without success, and returned to Fayal about the 15th of August for Capt. Taylor, who had so far recovered as to be able to resume his duties in proceeding on the voyage.

Farms for the Needy.—Gerritt Smith publishes the following notice in the Madison Observer:—

In the list of my remaining land are some 20,000 acres, which are poor, and, at present, unsaleable. They lie in detached parcels of generally 150 acres, in the north-eastern part of this State. A number of years' taxes are charged upon them.

I am willing to give this land to sober, industrious, worthy, landless, young white men of my own county. On some of the parcels there are debts for purchase money due to the State. These debts I will myself pay within six months.

I propose to distribute this land among 98 persons, viz: the first seven applicants from each of the fourteen towns in the County of Madison. They must come well recommended, and must make their application before the first day of November next. Each, on making application, will pay $1 to cover the expense of the deed, of the taking of the acknowledgment, of its execution, and of other writings attending the transfer.

The deeds, prepared for record, will be ready for delivery by the 20th day of next November.

GERRITT SMITH.

Peterboro' Sept. 18, 1847.

Probable Settlement of the 'Anti-Rent' Difficulties.—We are sure every reader whose heart is in the right place will hail with gladness the prospect opened in the following:

At a mass meeting of the Anti-Renters of the County of Rensselaer, held pursuant to public notice, at the Presbyterian Church in Stephentown, on the 25th of September, after listening to some remarks from C. Pepper, Jr., it was, on motion, unanimously.

Resolved, That we accede to the propositions for an amicable arrangement of the Anti-Rent difficulties, so called, made on the 24th inst. by Hon. John C. Spencer, on the part of Wm. P. Van Rensselaer, to Calvin Pepper, Jr., Charles F. Bouton, and Henry Betts, on the part of the People, which proposition is in substance, as we understand it, that all matters in dispute shall be left for arbitration to Hon. George N. Briggs of Massachusetts, Hon. William Kent, and Hon. Judge Denio of this State.

SUMMARY.

The Boston Traveler of Sept. 30, says, We continue to hear accounts of unusual sickness in many towns around us. In Newton and Lowell, where, as we have before mentioned, there has been an extraordinary prevalence particularly of bowel diseases, there is yet a great deal of sickness. The Gloucester Telegraph mentions that disease and death have been busy in that community, having visited all classes and ages, and stricken down infancy and childhood, and manhood and old age. The Salem Gazette states that that city, always remarkably healthy, has not enjoyed the present season its usual exemption from disease.

On Monday evening, at about 8 o'clock, a carriage was driven to the door of Mr. Ingersoll, at Millford, Conn., a gentleman alighted, took from the carriage a bundle and bandbox and deposited them in the court-yard before the house; he then reëntered the carriage and rode away. The bundle was examined and found to contain a "little responsibility" about five months old, wrapped in a blanket; the bandbox was filled with clothing for the child, which was taken in charge by Mr. Ingersoll's family. No discovery has been made by the child-dropper.

The Scientific American says that the number of actual fires in New York during the year has been 834, causing damage only to the amount of $168,307 to buildings, and to stock $374,135, a total which when compared with the annual loss before the introduction of the Croton, affords abundant reason for congratulation that we have it at our command, and adds another proof of the efficiency of the Department.

On Saturday night, the 25th ult., the packet-sloop Catharine E. Hale, Capt. Dudley Brand, from Stonington for New York, was capsized near Eaton's Neck, and three persons on board drowned—the wife of the captain, her niece, Mary A. Burdick, and the cook, a boy named George E. Stanton. The captain was saved by means of a plank and spar, which he got hold of, and three hands escaped by clinging to the wreck.

Edwin Bailey and Joseph Buchanan were convicted on Saturday, in the Court of Oyer and Terminer, of assault with intent to kill Mr. Hotchkiss of South Brooklyn. Bailey had before been convicted of assault with intent to rob Mr. Bennett, the ferry-master at Williamsburgh. They were sentencnd to the State Prison for life.

A proposition for a general convention of the printers of New York, to be held at Albany on 15th November next, appears in a late number of the Albany Evening Journal. The object shall be to consider the propriety of establishing a Printer's Asylum for New York, of erecting a monument to Franklin, and to adopt measures to advance the interest of the profession, and to promote union among those engaged in it.

The State of Arkansas invites emigrants to come and take lands which have been forfeited for taxes, and no payment will be required of them. The Auditor, upon proof of settlement, will make a deed, which deed the Supreme Court of the State has decided will be valid. The forfeited tracts comprise, it is said, some of the finest lands in the State.

In a Boston paper, we find an account of the doings of the meeting of Naturalists there, which says—"It has been long known that two rays of light may be so thrown on each other as to produce darkness. Professor Henry showed that two rays of heat may be so combined as to produce cold."

The Bridgeport (Ct.) Standard says that the house of Mr. Barnum, proprietor of the American Museum, is nearly completed. The structure, which seems to be a compound of Moorish, Gothic and Turkish architecture, attracts a great many visiters. An English gentleman who was here lately, declared that he had come 3,000 miles for the purpose of taking a look at the thing. Probably he was an artist, employed for a London publication. We believe there is nothing in England, or indeed in Christendom, resembling this edifice, excepting the Brighton Pavilion, built by George IV. That is a much larger building, but the model is in almost every respect inferior. So say the architects. There are more expensive houses in the country, but none probably as showy. The cost of the structure and grounds will be some $60,000.

The Quebec Correspondent of the Montreal Herald, under date of Sept, 21, says that a person from Berthier (below Quebec) to-day, informs me that a few days ago a man of that parish picked up a box floating on the St. Lawrence, nearly opposite that place, which he brought ashore, and after having broken it open, found a child about three years old in it, wrapped up in a blanket; and alive. Being a poor man, with a large family, he went to the curate of the parish and informed him of the circumstance, and requested him to announce the fact in church, so that some charitable person might adopt the child.

The new Telescope at Cambridge is found to answer all the high anticipations which have been entertained in regard to it. The wonderful nebula in the Constellation of Orion, has recently been subjected to the scrutiny of Mr. Bond through this Telescope, and it has fully yielded to the power of the admirable instrument. The capacity of the Telescope is thus shown to be equal if not superior to the famous instrument of Lord Rosse, the great power of which this nebula so long resisted.

Frederick Douglass has determined upon starting a new paper, and to make Cleveland, Ohio, his headquarters. It is to be called the "North Star," and is to be devoted wholly to the subject of human rights. His friends in Great Britain have recently, as a testimonial of their respect, made him a present of $2,000, to be appropriated by him to an object of this kind. So says the Cleveland True Democrat.

A mercantile house at Berlin has proposed to all the Railway Companies of Germany to supply all their carriages with silk blinds for nothing. They simply propose to reserve to themselves the right of changing the blinds as often as they may please, and they require the Companies to engage themselves not to accept during 50 years, either for money or gratuitously, any blinds but theirs. Their object is to cover the blinds with advertisements.

The late Miss Ann Colyer, of Farmingham, Kent, has made a singular disposal of her large property, by which the Vicar of Farmingham profits largely. Charitable bequests to the amount of 13,000*l.* are left to six hospitals and some Church-of-England Societies. Her wine and liquors are to be divided between the Vicar and the Curate of Farmingham.

A letter from New Orleans of Sept. 13th states that four of the Colporteurs of the American Tract Society, two Americans, one French and one German, had been prostrated with the yellow fever. Hopes were entertained of the recovery of most of them. One of them was seized when preparing for the funeral of his wife, and his daughter was also dangerously ill.

The New Orleans papers, so lately paying a merited tribute to the lamented Hinton, speak sorrowfully of the death of the Rev. Noah F. Packard, Presbyterian minister of the Canal Street Chapel, who died a few days after Mr. Hinton, and of the same terrible epidemic. He was a native of Abingdon, Mass.

The Common Council of Brooklyn have passed an ordinance prohibiting the interment of any dead human body within two miles of the Brooklyn City Hall after the 1st of June, 1848, under a penalty of $100 on each offence, against any who shall assist therein.

The Revue du Havre states that a young chemist of that town has invented a system of lights for ports and coasts, consisting of a thick globe of glass in which is enclosed a preparation giving light like that of the moon, and the cost of which for a year will not exceed a franc

Gov. Young has removed the conditions from the pardon formerly granted to Smith A. Boughton, Moses Earle, John Van Steenberg and Edward O'Connor, convicted of participation in the 'Anti-Rent' outrages in Columbia and Delaware Counties in 1845.

Antonio Leocadio Guzman, editor of El Venezolano, a paper of Caraccas, having been banished for participation in the last insurrection, announces that the publication of his paper will be resumed in this city on the 1st of January next. It will be issued twice a week in the Spanish language.

At Malta, dueling is permitted by law, under this curious restriction—that duelists are enjoined, in the severest penalties, to desist and put up their swords at the desire of a priest, a woman, or a knight.

Of 138 males in the Connecticut State Prison, 84 declare intemperance to be the cause of their present confinement and degradation, 13 having been engaged in the sale of intoxicating drinks, and four in its manufacture.

The Gardeners' Chronicle says, that in the south of England, turnips, sown with superphosphate of lime as manure, are never troubled with the fly.

The total number of Bishops in connection with the Church of England is as follows: England and Wales, 27; Ireland 13; Scotland 7; the Colonies, 21; at Jerusalem, 1; United States, 29; total, 97.

Mr. P. Hewins, of Hartford, has made a highly important discovery. It is a composition, cheaply obtained, with which he makes glass plates for flooring—a cheap substitute for marble, being stronger and more beautiful, and full fifty per cent. cheaper.

Dr. Dan Foote, recently tried at Oxford, Chenango Co., for the murder of his wife, was found guilty of manslaughter in the first degree. The punishment cannot be less than 7 years in the State Prison.

Another donation of $12,000 has recently been made to Amherst College, by David Sears of Boston. It is to be put out at interest till it has accumulated to a certain sum, or been increased to a certain amount by donations from other sources, and is to be then appropriated for a Library Hall. The same gentleman gave $10,000 to Amherst College several years since, but on such conditions that the College has not yet been able to draw on the fund.

The Comptroller of the State of New York reports, in answer to a resolution, that the Canal and Railway revenue for the fiscal year ending August 31, was $3,470,904, from which is to be deducted $600,000 for superintendence, and $200,000 to the treasury, and $1,650,000 pledged by the constitution to the sinking fund, leaving the sum of $1,020,094 available for the public works.

Ohio has begun to pay off her public debt. The auditor of that State has given notice, through the Columbus papers, to the holders of Ohio canal stock receivable in payment for canal lands, and of Ohio turnpike stocks, that they will cease to draw interest after the 1st of November next, and that the stocks, on presentation at the treasury, will be paid in full.

The steamship Northerner made a trial trip one day last week, previous to sailing for Charleston. Just before she started, a machinist in the employment of Stillman, Allen, & Co., named Geo. Fisher, while at work about the engine, had his left arm cut off by the machinery. A collection for his benefit was subsequently taken up, amounting to $221.

The steamship Great Britain has been removed from her perilous condition in Dundrum Bay to Liverpool, where she is undergoing repairs. It is thought that she will soon be ready for sea again.

The ship Auburn, from New Orleans for New York, was wrecked near Barnegat, N. J., on Sunday night, Sept. 16th, and seventeen persons drowned.

The Oneida Oyer and Terminer having denied the motion in arrest of judgment on Mary Runkle, convicted of murder, the prisoner has been sentenced to be executed on the 9th day of November.

The Great Fair of the American Institute opened at Castle Garden in this city on Tuesday of the present week.

The quantity of iron produced by Sweden in 1846 was 115,105 tons, of which 110,000 were exported.

A cheese weighing 550 pounds was to be seen at the Mechanics' Fair, Boston. It was brought from Ohio.

MARRIED,

In Sharon township, Potter Co., Pa., Sept. 5, by Rev. Rowse Babcock, Mr. John Burdick and Miss Charlotte Hyde, both of the above place.

DIED,

In Friendship, N. Y., Sept. 19, 1847, of consumption, after a lingering illness, Samuel E. Lanphear, in the 34th year of his age Bro. Lanphear embraced the cause of Christ in early life, and united with the First Seventh-day Baptist Church in Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y., with which he continued till within a few months of his death, when he removed his standing to the Friendship Church. His life and death were characterized with the brightest evidences of a saint of the Most High. He has left a wife, one child, and a large circle of relatives and friends, to mourn his departure.

In Milton, W. T., Sept. 19, 1847, of congestion on the brain, Annis R. Vincent, wife of Christopher S. Vincent, aged about 19 years. We trust she has gone to join the redeemed in heaven. S. C.

Those wishing books will please forward their orders, with particular directions how to send, to Geo. B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers, at 15c, or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman, New York, will be promptly attended to.

EX. BOARD OF THE MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

A Special Meeting of the Executive Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association will be held at the house of Eld. W. B Gillett, in Piscataway, N. J., on first-day, Oct. 17, 1847. That being the time and place of the Yearly Meeting of the New Jersey Seventh-day Baptist churches, it is hoped that a full Board will be present.

MISSIONARY NOTICE.

THE American Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society, at the call of the President, was convened at the house of Dea. John Maxson, in DeRuyter, N. Y., on the evening of Sept 19, 1847. On motion, the following officers were re-elected:—

WM. B. MAXSON, President.
AZOR ESTEE,
JOEL GREENE,
DAVID DUNN, } Vice Presidents.
JOHN WHITFORD,
JACOB D. BABCOCK,
W. B. GILLETT, Corresponding Secretary.
C. H. STILLMAN, Recording Secretary.
H. C. HUBBARD, Treasurer.
S. S. GRISWOLD, Agent.
LUCIUS CRANDALL,
W. B. GILLETT, } Executive Committee.
S. S. GRISWOLD,
BARTON G. STILLMAN, Clerk, pro tem.

A Report of the Treasurer and General Agent was presented, and received. Said Report being approved, was adopted and ordered to be printed in the Sabbath Recorder. [See Report.]

Resolved, That the minutes of this meeting be published in the Sabbath Recorder, and that S. S. Griswold be the Comittee to attend to that business.

Resolved, That we adjourn to meet at the call of the President during the Anniversary week of our Missionary and Tract Societies, at New Market, N. J., in Sept., 1848.

WM. B. MAXSON, President,
Barton G. Stillman, Clerk, pro tem.

DeRuyter, Sept. 19, 1847.

Report of the Treasurer and General Agent.

The amount of Standing Fund secured by notes receivable, was	$1100 00
Already collected	720 00
Uncollected, as yet	380 00

The Society was indebted over and above the interest of the Standing Fund, and contributions from other sources, to the amount of $281 00. Twenty-seven life members (whose shares were ten dollars each) having agreed to relinquish their claim to said shares, and the total amount of said shares being $270 00, said sum was applied to cancel the debts of the Society; thus reducing its indebtedness to $11 00, which was cancelled by apportioning it equally among the remaining stockholders. Those sums in the hands of John T. Davis of Shiloh, N. J., John Whitford of Berlin, N. N., and Joshua B. Maxson of Stephentown, N. Y., were not reckoned in this Report as a part of the Standing Fund, as the Society had nothing in writing to show that any money was loaned to them; also those who deposited said money in said persons' hands were not considered as life members, and therefore not entitled to the dividends of the Society's fund. The total number of life members, after deducting the twenty-seven who have relinquished their claim to their membership shares, is eighty-three.

RECAPITULATION IN A TABULAR FORM.

Standing Fund	$1100 00
Already collected	720 00
Not collected, as yet	$380 00
Debts of Society over available funds	$281 00
Cancelled by the relinquishing of their shares by twenty-seven stockholders	270 00
Indebtedness of Society after the appropriation of said stockholders' shares	$11 00
Standing fund, collected	$720 00
Indebtedness of Society	281 00
In the hands of Treasurer and Agent	$439 00

To be divided among eighty-three stockholders, which gives $5 28 per share, which sum of $5 28 is now subject to the order of each of the eighty-three stockholders, on proving their claims as Life Members of the Society. When the remainder of the standing fund is collected, there will be another dividend of $380 00, giving to each of the eighty-three stockholders another apportionment of $4 57 per share.

H. C. HUBBARD, Treasurer.
S. S. GRISWOLD, Agent.

CAROLINE E. WILCOX, Preceptress.
AMELIA R. CLARKE, Teacher of Instrumental Music.

Other experienced Teachers are employed the various Departments.

The Academic Year for 1847–8 will be divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each:

First commencing Wednesday,	Aug. 25,	and ending	Dec. 1
Second	"	Dec. 15,	"	March 22
Third	"	April 5,	"	July 12

Tuition, per term of fourteen weeks, from $3 00 to	$5 00
Extras—for Drawing	1 00
" Painting	2 00
" Piano Music	8 00
" Use of Instrument	2 00
Room-rent, including necessary furniture,	1 75

Cook-stoves are furnished for those wishing to board themselves. Board can be had in private families at $1 25 to $1 50.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the fall and middle of the winter terms, to continue seven weeks, in which special attention will be given to those intending to teach common schools, with a view to fit them for their responsible duties.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter, or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

The above is published pursuant to the notice of the Secretary of State, and the requirements of the Statute in such case made and provided.

J. J. V. WESTERVELT,
Sheriff of the City and County of New York.

☞ All the public newspapers in the county will publish the above once in each week until the election, and then hand in their bills for advertising the same, so that they may be laid before the Board of Supervisors, and passed for payment. See revised Statute, vol 1, chap. 6, title 3, article 3d, part 1st, page 140. Sept. 2, te.

Miscellaneous.

TO A LITTLE GIRL, WALKING IN THE WOOD.

BY MRS. L. M. CHILD.

"Whither art going, dear Annette?
Your little feet you'll surely wet;
For don't you see the streamlet flow
Across the path where you must go?
Your shawl is twisted out of place;
Your bonnet's blowing off your face;
You know not how the playful air
Is tangling up your curly hair."

"Lady, my feet I often wet,
But it has never harmed me yet.
I love to have the fresh, warm air
Playing about my face and hair;
It makes me lively, bright, and strong,
And clears the voice for my morning song."

"But do you often go, alone,
So far away from your own dear home?
Not even a dog to frisk and play,
And guide you on your lonely way?"

"My mother cannot spare the maid,
And I am not at all afraid.
The wind plays mischief with my curls,
But does no harm to little girls.
There cannot be a lonely way,
When spring makes every thing so gay.
The birds are warbling forth a tune
To welcome dear, delightful June;
In the running brook, the speckled trout,
At sight of my shadow, glides about;
The little miller in the grass
Flies away for my feet to pass;
And busy bees, through shining hours,
Play hide-and-seek in opening flowers;
The bright blue sky is clear and mild;
How can there be a lonesome child?"

"Sweet wanderer in the cool, green wood,
I know your little heart is good,
And that is why the fair earth seems
Just waking up from heavenly dreams.
There's something in your gentle voice,
That makes my inmost heart rejoice.
Pray, if it be not rudely said,
What's in your basket, little maid?"

"Lady, the nurse, who watched my slumber,
And told me stories without number,
Is now too ill to work for pay,
And she grows poorer every day.
Custards, and broth, and jellies good,
My mother send to her for food.
I bring the water from her well,
And all my pretty stories tell.
Sometimes she loves to hear me read;
Her little garden I can weed;
And half the money in my purse
I gladly save for dear old nurse.
But if I stay to talk so free,
She'll wonder where Annette can be."

"Farewell, sweet wanderer of the wood;
I knew your little heart was good;
And that is why the fair earth seems
Just waking up from heavenly dreams."

AN HOUR IN THE PENITENTIARY.

During our sojourn in Philadelphia, last summer, we one day accepted an invitation to visit the Penitentiary there. We had letters to the kind-hearted Warden, Mr. Scattergood, (a most appropriate name, by the way,) who extended to us all the courtesy we could have desired. We were conducted through the Prison, and in company with Mr. S. we entered several of the cells. The superintendent learning we were from Boston, informed us that a prisoner was confined there for passing counterfeit money, who hailed from Massachusetts. He had been there some two or three years, and we found him a very intelligent man. His cell was exceedingly cleanly, and upon the the little table in the corner we discovered several standard books, a Bible, &c., which gave evidence of having been thoroughly read by the prisoner. He was said to be very industrious, and certainly appeared comfortable under such circumstances. His name was George ——. He remarked that he was glad to see any one from Boston, and seriously regretted that he should have been one of the few Bostonians, comparatively, who had disgraced the name of the 'Old Bay State.' He was happy, apparently, and as we parted, we shook his hand, and remarked that it was possible we might call on him again in a few weeks. 'You will be sure, sir, to find me at home,' said he, as we left the door of his cell.

As we entered the reception room once more, a bulky despatch was handed to the Warden by one of the deputies, and upon opening it, he informed us that it was a pardon for one of the convicts. We inquired if it would encroach upon the Prison rules, under such circumstances, to accompany the Warden to the cell, while he should read it to the prisoner, and were kindly informed that we could join him. We soon reached the cell, where we found a fresh-faced young man, of perhaps twenty-four, who was busily engaged at a little loom, weaving.

'Good morrow, John,' said the Warden blandly, as we entered.

'Good morning, sir.'

'Thee keeps busy, John?'

'O, yes, sir—but its very dull.'

'Does thee tire of work, John?'

'No sir—but I think of home.'

'And thee would like to visit home once more?'

'Oh, sir—if I could but do so'——

'And thee would not return again?'

'I would try and deserve better, sir.'

'Well, John, what would thee say, if I should tell thee I had a pardon for thee?'

'Oh, sir, such news would be too good.'

'But thee would like to hear it?'

'I care not for myself, so much,' said the poor prisoner, and tears filled his eyes, 'but for my wife and child, I would be so happy'——

'And thee would shun wicked company, John?'

'Oh, yes—and I would labor for my wife and little one'——

'Well, John, here is thy pardon,' continued the good old man, and he read the document, which freed this unfortunate being, who had been the dupe of other knaves. We had the pleasure of seeing him released, after a three years' confinement, and of learning that he joined his young family, to whom he has since been a faithful guardian.

We passed out to the ante-room again—where we encountered a new comer, who had just reached the prison as we reëntered. He had been sent up for five years on a charge of embezzlement.

He was elegantly attired in the latest style of fashion, and possessed all the nonchalance and devil-me-care appearance of a genteel rowdy. He twirled his watch-chain, looked particularly knowing at two ladies who chanced to be present, and seemed utterly indifferent about himself or the predicament he was placed in! The Warden read his commitment, and addressed him, with—

'Charles, I am sorry to see thee here.'

'It can't be helped, old fellow!'

'What is thy age, Charles?'

'Twenty-three.'

'A Philadelphian?'

'Well, kinder, and kinder not!'

'Thee has disgraced thyself, sadly.'

'Well, I ain't troubled, old cock.'

'Thee looks not like a rogue.'

'Matter of opinion!'

'Thee was well situated'——

'Yes, well enough'——

'In good employ?'

'Well, so-so.'

'And thee had parents?'

'Yes'——

'Perhaps thee hast a mother, Charles?'

The convict had been standing during this brief dialogue, perfectly unconcerned and reckless, until the last interrogatory was put. Had a thunderbolt struck him, he could not have fallen more suddenly than he did when the name of 'mother' fell on his ear! He sank into a chair—a torrent of tears gushed from his eyes—the very fountain of his heart seemed to have burst, on the instant! He recovered, partially, and said imploringly to the Warden:

'Don't you, sir, for God's sake, don't call her name in this dreadful place! Do what you may with me, but don't mention that name here!'

There were tears in other eyes besides the prisoner's, and an aching silence pervaded the group who surrounded the unfortunate convict. * * * The black cap was drawn over his head, he was led to an adjoining apartment and stripped, and shortly after he reäppeared upon the corrider. He passed silently on, in charge of a deputy keeper, to a lonely cell in a distant part of the prison, the door creaked on its hinges, he disappeared, the chain dropped from outside bolts, and Charles —— was a close prisoner for five years to come!

We left the prison with heavy hearts, relieved, however, by the reflection that this was one of the best devised institutions of its kind in the world, and that its administration, in the hands of Mr. Scattergood, secured to its unfortunate inmates the most 'equal and exact justice.' [Times.

FOUNDER OF RAGGED SCHOOLS.

John Pounds, the cripple and the cobbler, yet at the same time one of nature's true nobility, was born in Portsmouth, in 1766. His father was a sawyer, employed in the royal dock-card. At fifteen, young Pounds met with an accident which disabled him for life. During the greater part of his benevolent career, he lived in a small weather-boarded tenement in St. Mary's street, Portsmouth, where he might be seen every day mending shoes in the midst of his busy little school. One of his amusements was that of rearing singing-birds, jays and parrots, which he so perfectly domesticated that they lived harmoniously with his cats and guinea-pigs. Often, it is said, might a canary-bird be seen perched on one shoulder, and a cat upon the other. During the latter part of his life, however, when his scholars, became so numerous, he was able to keep fewer of these domestic creatures. Poor as he was, and entirely dependent upon the hard labor of his hands, he nevertheless adopted a little crippled nephew, whom he educated and cared for with truly parental love, and, in the end, established comfortably in life. It was out of this connection that his attempts and success in the work of education arose. He thought, in the first instance, that the boy would learn better with a companion; he obtained one, the son of a wretchedly poor mother; then another and another was added, and he found so much pleasure in his employment, and was the means thereby of affecting so much good, that in the end, the number of his scholars amounted to about forty, including a dozen little girls.

His humble workshop was about six feet by eighteen, in the midst of which he would sit, engaged in that labor by which he won his bread, and attending at the same time, to the studies of the little crowd around him. So efficient was John Pounds' mode of education, to say nothing of its being perfectly gratuitous, that the candidates were always numerous. He however, invariably gave the preference to the worst, as well as the poorest, children—to the "little blackguards," as he called them. He has been known to follow such to the Town Quay, and offer them the bribe of a roasted potato if they would come to his school. His influence on these degraded children was extraordinary.

As a teacher, his manners wree pleasant and facetious. He amused the little "blackguards" while he taught them. Many hundred persons now living usefully and creditably in life, owe the whole formation of their character to him. He gave them "book-learning," and taught them also to cook their own victuals and mend their own shoes. He was not only frequently their doctor and nurse, but their playfellow; no wonder was it therefore, that when on New Year's day, 1836, he suddenly died, at the age of seventy-two, the children wept, and even fainted, on hearing of their loss, and for a long time were overwhelmed with sorrow and consternation. They indeed had lost a benefactor. Such was the noble founder of the first ragged school.

WONDERS OF GEOLOGY.—More than nine thousand different kinds of animals have been changed into stone. The races or genera of more than half of these are now extinct, not being at present known in a living state upon the earth. From the remains of some of these ancient animals, they must have been larger than any living animals now known upon the earth. The Megatherium (Great Beast), says Bucland, forms a skeleton, nearly perfectly collossal. With a head and neck like those of the sloth, its legs and feet exhibit the character of an Armadillo and the Anteater. Its fore feet were a yard in length, and more than twelve inches wide, terminated by gigantic claws. Its thigh bone was nearly three times as thick as that of the elephant—and its tail, nearest the body, was six feet in circumference. Its tusks were admirably adapted for cutting vegetable substances, and its general structure and strength were intended to fit it for digging in the ground for the roots, on which it principally fed. ANECDOTE OF LOUIS PHILIPPE.

Some months since, the Marquis de Pastoret was summoned to Venice, by Henry V., on business relating to the fallen dynasty he so clings to; and, fearing that his hotel might be searched by the police, during his absence, he intrusted a box, containing his most important papers, to the Countess de Guerin. who passed for one of the most stanch royalists in the Faubourg St. Germain. Returning at length, he lost no time in reclaiming this precious deposit. "My dear marquis," said the countess, with a downcast air, "you know that I am unfortunate. The revolution of 1830 ruined me; and I cannot resist the first opportunity of reëstablishing my position in society that has offered itself; and I must demand from you sixty thousand francs for your box of papers, so compromising to yourself and friends!" The marquis, though indignant, behaved as a gentleman should do. "Madame," he replied, "your conduct is unjustifiable, but my blind confidence is more so—and I must expect to pay for my faults. I have not, as you may expect, the money in my pocket, but will send my secretary with it to-morrow. Adieu!" No sooner had he left the room, than the countess thought she might have extorted a larger sum, and with that rapidity of action which accompanies crime, started for the Prefecture de Police, carrying with her the box of papers, declaring that she had a communication of high importance to make. The prefect received her at once, and after informing him that she had papers so valuable that the Marquis de Pastoret had offered eighty thousand francs for them, she declared her willingness to sell them to government for a hundred thousand. "It is an important affair," said the prefect, "and I dislike acting on my own responsibility. The king is at the Tuilleries this morning, and we will go to him at once." This the countess did not exactly like: but there was no alternative, and in half an hour she was stammering out her treacherous offer to Louis Philippe. "One hundred thousand francs is a good deal of money to pay," said the king, "especially as you retain possession of the papers, and I cannot judge of their value." "But here is the box containing them," answered the countess, handing it over at the same time. The king took it, stepped to the door, and gave it, unopened, to an aid-de-camp, saying, "Take this box to the Marquis de Pastoret, and tell him that Louis Philippe is happy to be able to serve him." Then turning to the trembling countess, he continued, "As for you, madam, I advise you to remember, that 'honesty is the best policy,'" and left the room; while the conscience-stricken woman slunk out of the palace like a sheep-stealing dog. MINISTERIAL READING AND WRITING.

If having access to many volumes, even the Christian pastor may need to be guarded against the reading of those which are of frivolous or ephemeral character. As relaxing the vigor of the mind; wasting time, and excluding books of more worth, we are not justified in their habitual perusal. Nor is the desultory reading of valuable works of much advantage. One book, a classic on its subject, well mastered, though a tedious, is a most valuable acquisition, and may supercede the necessity of reading scores of inferior volumes on the same topic. In the reading of works of controversy, it may be a safe rule to avoid trusting ourselves to the perusal, until we have first examined the Scriptures with a special reference to the topic of which they treat. God's book has a right to be first heard. And even should the author quote it fully and fairly, his quotations are seen disjointed from their original connection. Their true meaning, and their relative importance, can only be known by seeing them first in the Scripture in their original position.

Writing, said Bacon, makes an exact man; reading a full man. The justness of thought and discrimination of ths elder Edwards are owing to this habit, probably, as he was accustomed to study in this manner, and by writing down his thoughts. No man probably knows the exact degree of his own intelligence as to any subject, until he has attempted to place his ideas upon paper. Yet writing without previous hard thinking, will only transfer looseness and inconsistences from the head to the paper. The habitual correspondence of fellow students upon some common theme of their researches may be mutually beneficial. But the painful and solitary revision, and writing over once and again, until defect after defect had been described, has been the secret of excellence and immortality in the most admired works of all former ages. Easy writing has not generally made, to use a remark, as true as trite, easy reading. [Rep. N. Y. Min. Con.

A DERIVATION OF "GENTLEMAN."—In the age of Valentinian, the converts to Christianity in the Western Empire consisted chiefly of the middle classes in the towns. The agricultural population still adhered to the traditions and superstitions of their ancestors with such tenacity, that the word "Pagans," which literally signifies the inhabitants of the rural districts, became a generic name for all classes of idolaters. In the higher ranks, the Christians were found among the officers of State and the ministers of the Imperial Court, who were for the most part unconnected with the patrician body, and owed their elevation either to their military services or to imperial favor. The old patrician families, who have affected to trace their descent to the great aristocratic houses of the ancient republic—the "Gentiles," as they loved to call them selves, adhered to polytheism, which now alone afforded any external evidence of their hereditary rank; and hence "Gentilemen," came to be used indifferently for a man of exalted birth or polished manners, and for one who rejected the truths of Christianity.

[Taylor's European Society.

PASTURAGE.—An English author commends the mixture of a few sheep and one or two colts in each pasture for horned cattle. Another writer of the same country remarks that the following economical method has long been observed by the Hollanders. When eight cows have been in a pasture so long as to completely eat all the grass they can graze, and of course can no longer obtain their necessary food, therefore, two horses are turned in and find sufficient food for some days. After these begin to fail of procuring as much as their nature requires, four sheep are introduced, and find enough for their necessities, and even for an abundant supply for weeks. By mixing cattle, horses and sheep, in this manner, much pasture would doubtless be economized, were it not that the practice militates against one of the clearest principles of economical grazing, inasmuch as the admission of food into a pasture appropriated to horses, cows, or neat stock of any kind, is certain to render the latter animals restless, by poisoning the herbage or rendering it unpalatable to them. No horse, ox, or cow, will graze where sheep have laid or trampled. As they are continually on the move, while grazing, they necessarily destroy much more by their excrement than they consume.

NEW HOLLAND.

New Holland is the lagest island in the world. It is even considered a continent by some. Its extent is nearly equal to all Europe.

The British have made settlements here, which are rapidly increasing. Sidney is the principal town. A great many of the people in this place committed crimes in England, and were sent hither as a punishment. Many of them have led good lives since their arrival, and have become wealthy and highly respectable. There are a good many other British settlements along the coast. The interior has been but little explored.

It is very curious that the plants, trees, and animals, in New Holland, are mostly different from what are found in any other part of the world. Among the queer animals is the kangaroo, which is nearly as large as a sheep. It has a pouch for its young ones, like the opossum; with its long hind legs, and the help of its tail, which operates like a spring, it leaps forty or fifty feet at a bound. The platypus is a quadruped as large as a woodchuck; its body is covered with fur, yet it has a bill like a duck.

There are many other curious creatures here, but nothing is more strange than the native inhabitants. These resemble negroes, and live almost like wild animals. Some of their dwellings are nothing more than hollow caves; yet these people have their fashions and their amusements. Sometimes the men paint their bodies with white stripes, so that they look like walking skeletons; sometimes they engage in wild dances with noisy music. Their modes of courtship are curious. If a man sees a woman he wants for a wife, he takes an opportunity to come upon her unawares; he knocks her down with a club and carries her home; when she comes to her senses, she makes him a dutiful wife. A ROGUE IN PARIS.

A few days since, "Dr. Thierry, a member of the Municipal Council, saw, in the Boulevard, a crowd form around a young man, poorly dressed, and who appeared to have fallen exhausted from want of food. Pushing his way up to him, the doctor gave him money, inquired his address, and sent him home in a cabriolet, promising to call and see him in the evening, and do something for him. On going to the address indicated, the doctor was surprised to find that no such person as the unfortunate young man was known there; and was still more surprised to find that several other charitable individuals had been to inquire after him, but with the same ill success. This, and other circumstances of a like kind, having come to the knowledge of the police, they set an investigation on foot, and soon learned that a young fellow, twenty-four years of age, named Goujon, had for some time past been preying on the public, by pretending to fall exhausted from hunger in the public streets, and by telling a pitiable tale of his distress to the bystanders. As he was shabbily dressed, as his face was daubed in such a manner as to make it deadly pale, and as he played his part admirably, his tale was always believed, and always procured him abundant alms, sometimes as much as thirty francs or forty francs a day. When not engaged in this singular vocation, M. Goujon figured as a dandy of the first water, lived on the best of the best restaurants, frequented the principal theatres, and solaced himself with the society of a young and handsome actress. The police have, however, put and end to M. Goujon's splendid existence and fictious misery, by seizing on him, and throwing him into prison, to await his trial on a charge of swindling the public. A sum of nearly three hundred francs was found by the police at his lodgings."

A NEW MAIL AGENT.—Much has been sung and said of the sagacity of the canine species, and of the many useful services they have been made to perform for man; but until lately we had never heard of any of them being pressed into the service of the mail, and made to act as a sort of despatch post. This has been accomplished, however, by a very respectable gentleman and farmer living on one of the many rivers which empty into the Chesapeake Bay. This gentleman resides some distance from any post town, and is fond of having the current news of the day, but for a long time he found it difficult to gratify his inclination in this respect. He has, however, hit upon the following expedient, by which he obtains his desire. A steamboat, which leaves our city several times during the week, passes along the river within about a mile of the shore on which his residence is situated. As the boat passes up the river, he may be seen on the bank with a noble Newfoundland dog at his side. At a given signal the dog plunges into the water and makes his way rapidly to the boat; as he nears it a bladder containing the daily papers of our city, is thrown out, which the dog immediately seizes, and with a faithfulness and despatch which would serve as an example to many of the Government mail agents, makes his way back to the shore and deposits his mail bag at his master's feet. So well accustomed has the dog become to his service, that when the mail fails, and no bag is thrown out to him from the boat, he shows an evident disappointment and unwillingness to return without it. AVARICE.—A commander of Malta, very avaricious, had two pages, who once complained that they had no shirts. He called his major-domo—"Tell the wife of my farmer to sow some hemp; when it is grown, let her spin it, and make shirts for these little, dandies." The pages laughed. "Ah! you young rascals, if you are so happy as to laugh, you may as well be without shirts;" and he countermanded his orders.

THE DAILY NATIONAL WHIG is published in the city of Washington, every day, at three o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted, and served to subscribers in the City, at the Navy Yard, in Georgetown, in Alexandria, and in Baltimore, the same evening, at six and a quarter cents a week, payable to the sole agent of the Whig, G. L. Gillchrist, Esq., or his order. It is also mailed to any part of the United States for $4 per annum, or $2 for six months, payable in advance. Advertisements of ten lines or less inserted one time for 50 cents, two times for 75 cents, three times for $1, one week for $1 75, two weeks for $2 75, one month for $4, two months for $7, three months for $10, six months for $16, one year for $20, payable always in advance.

The "National Whig" is what its name indicates. It speaks the sentiments of the Whig party of the Union on every question of public policy. It advocates the election to the Presidency of Zachary Taylor, subject to the decision of a Whig National Convention. It makes war to the knife upon all the measures and acts of the Administration deemed to be adverse to the interests of the country, and exposes without fear or favor the corruptions of the party in power. Its columns are open to every man in the country, for the discussion of political or any other questions.

In addition to politics, a large space in the National Whig will be devoted to publications upon Agriculture, Mechanics, and other useful arts, Science in general, Law, Medicine, Statistics, &c. Choice specimens of American and Foreign Literature will also be given, including Reviews, &c. A weekly list of the Patents issued by the Patent Office will likewise be published—the whole forming a complete family newspaper.

The "Weekly National Whig," one of the largest newspapers in the United States, is made up from the columns of the Daily National Whig, and is published every Saturday, for the low price of $2 per annum, payable in advance. A double sheet of eight pages will be given whenever the press of matter shall justify it.

The Memoirs of General Taylor, written expressly for the National Whig, are in course of publication. They commenced with the second number, a large number of copies of which have been printed, to supply calls for back numbers.

CHAS. W. FENTON,
Proprietor of the National Whig.

P. S. All daily, weekly, and semi-weekly papers in the United States are requested to insert this advertisement once a week for six months, noticing the price for publishing the same at the bottom of the advertisement, and send the paper containing it to the National Whig office, and the amount will be duly remitted. Our editorial brethren are also requested to notice the National Whig in their reading columns.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

Board, per week,	$1 00
Room-rent, per term,	1 50
Tuition, per term,	$3 50 to 5 00
Incidental expenses, per term,	25

EXTRAS PER TERM.

Piano Forte,	$10 00
Oil Painting,	7 00
Drawing,	2 00

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

CHINA.

The five cities which by treaty have been opened up to the general trade of all nations are, Canton, Amoy, Foo-chow, Ning-po, and Shang-hai. All foreigners have free access to these cities. They may reside in any of them, but they are not permitted to penetrate into the country beyond, further than one day's journey. Canton and Amoy have been the sea-ports longest known to British merchants; but they are nevertheless the cities where the greatest hatred against the British prevails. No foreigner is yet allowed to pass through the gates which inclose the city of Canton, and frequent insults have been offered to strangers by the population. To such a degree had these insults proceeded of late, that while we now write, accounts have reached this country of a warlike demonstration, which the British Government of Hong Kong was compelled to make in order to overawe the Chinese authorities, and again extort from them renewed assurances of better treatment. Foo-chow is the capital of the black-tea district, and is computed to contain upwards of half a million of inhabitants. It is situated on the river Min, across which is a bridge containing a thousand arches, or rather a series of openings, covered with large slabs of granite. This city has comparatively little trade, and is said to be falling to decay. Ning-po, farther north, and situated on the main land, nearly opposite to the island of Chusan, is also a place of considerable size, and has the reputation of being the finest city on the coast open to foreigners. It is also regarded as one of the most literary cities in the empire, and inferior only to Loo-chow and Hang-chow, in the refinement and taste of the people. According to the statistics of an intelligent and native scholar, as communicated to Mr. Smith, of the people included within the city walls, four-fifths may be estimated as engaged in trade, merchandise, and labor, while one-fifth are calculated as belonging to the literary class. This included the graduates and candidates for literary promotion, as well as the writers and clerks in the public offices. Of the population in the suburbs and on the level plain, extending to the hills, six parts out of ten are estimated as deriving their livelihood from agriculture, three parts as artisans of various kinds, and the remaining tenth as consisting of fishermen and boatmen. The manufacture of carpets and mats furnishes employment to a large proportion of the people. The female part of the population are employed to a considerable extent in weaving cloth. The city is surrounded by a wall of about five miles in circuit, through which there are six gates opening into the suburbs or upon the river. There are 100,000 houses and shops assessed in taxes to the Government, and the population may amount to 400,000. In the city there is an unusually large proportion of temples and of spacious private buildings, and the width and cleanliness of the principal streets give a favorable impression of the wealth and rank of the inhabitants; yet, from many of the houses being empty, and the dilapidated state of others, it appears evident that the city is on the wane. Shang-hai is the most northerly of the free cities, situated on an extensive alluvial plain, watered by a number of streams. It is surrounded by a wall of about three miles in circuit, and may include about 200,000 inhabitants. The character of these is peaceful and industrious; and they are friendly and respectful to foreigners. Though suffering considerable extremes of climate, the thermometer ranging from a summer heat of 100° to 24° of winter cold, it is said to be very salubrious, the sky in spring and autumn being clear, mild, and delightful. Shang-hai is the great emporium of the central and northern parts of China, and in regard to its commercial and export trade, is greatly on the increase. In this respect it already rivals Canton, and from its central position is likely to become in time the first trading port of the empire. Cotton is extensively cultivated in the vicinity of Shang-hai, as well as rice and wheat; and tea and silks are brought from the interior to this as a shipping port, where, in consequence of the shorter inland carriage, they may be purchased ten per cent. cheaper than at Canton.

Mr. Fortune, while at Shang-hai, was particularly anxious to visit the famous city of Soo-chan, situated about fifty miles inland. As this was far beyond the limits that strangers are permitted to proceed from any of the free-port cities, Mr. Fortune resolved to adopt the Chinese dress, and visit it incognito. In this he succeeded, and found this grand city, which is the great emporium of the central provinces of China, very similar in its general features to the other towns he had visited, only it appeared more the seat of luxury and wealth, and has none of those signs of dilapidation and decay which are apparent in such towns as Ning-po. A noble canal, as wide as the river Thames at Richmond, runs parallel with the city walls, and acts as a moat, as well as for commercial purposes. This canal is carried through arches into the city, where it ramifies in all directions, sometimes narrow and dirty, and at other places expanding into lakes of considerable beauty, thus enabling the inhabitants to convey their merchandise to their houses from the most distant parts of the country. Junks and boats of all sizes were plying on this wide and beautiful canal, and the whole place presented a cheerful and flourishing aspect. The city gates were well guarded, and the streets and lanes inside were intersected at intervals with gates, which are closed at nine or ten o'clock at night. Groups of gay and cheerful-looking people loitered on the bridges, and sailed along the canals. The ladies here are considered by the Chinese to be the most beautiful in the country, and judging from those seen by our traveler, they deserved this character. Their dresses were of the richest material, and made in a graceful and elegant style—the only faults he could discern were their small feet and the white powder with which their faces were too unsparingly covered.

Chusan, the island taken possession of by the British during the war, and again resigned to the Chinese, is allowed by all visitors to be a very delightful spot—well cultivated, and abounding in grain, fruit, and vegetables, the natives, who are of the same character as those on the neighboring main-land, being peaceable, friendly, and, at the same time, orderly and industrious. They regret the departure of the British troops; and it now begins to be apparent that this would have been a preferable spot for planting the British flag as a permanent commercial station to that of Hong Kong. If friendly relations continue to be preserved with the Chinese, Shang-hai and the neighboring group of cities will in time become the center of trade, as possessing advantages of locality superior to that of Canton, and thus the island of Chusan would have possessed great local advantages as a British station.

Hong-Kong is a mountainous rocky island, about ten miles in length and five in breadth. Its northern side bends into a capacious bay, well adapted for shipping, and forming a secure harbor. Only small portions of the surface of the island are capable of tillage, the greater part consisting of bare, rugged cliffs, with only a partial vegetation of green herbage during the rainy season. Already has British enterprise cut roads and streets out of the solid rocks, and the town of Victoria has risen up, containing many buildings of magnificent structure. The native population has more than trebled since the English gained possession of it, and it is now entirely under British rule and jurisdiction. The powerful heat of the sun on this bare and rugged spot, the want of a free current of ventilation from the hills of the adjoining mainland, and the noxious exhalations from the surface, all conspire to render this a trying climate for Europeans, and laterly the health of the inhabitants has suffered greatly.

Notwithstanding their inherent suspicion of all strangers, the Chinese are neither unkind nor inhospitable. Mr. Fortune, whose botanical pursuits frequently led him into the country, almost invariably met with a good reception from the peasantry, and from the inmates of such temples and religious houses as he visited. One of these excursions we shall detail in his own words, as it affords a characteristic sketch of the timid yet inquisitive and kindly manners of the Chinese peasantry:—

"I was one day traveling amongst the hills in the interior of the island of Amoy, in places where I suppose no Englishman had ever been before. The day was fine, and the whole of the agricultural laborers were at work in the fields. When they first saw me they seemed much excited, and from their gestures and language I was almost inclined to think them hostile. From every hill and valley they cried, 'Wyloe-san-pan-fokie,' that is, 'Be off to your boat, friend;' but on former occasions I had always found that the best plan was to put a bold face on the matter, and walk in amongst them, and then try to get them into good humor. In this instance the plan succeeded admirably; we were in a few minutes excellent friends, the boys were running in all directions, gathering plants for my specimen-box, and the old men were offering me their bamboo-pipes to smoke. As I got a little nearer to the village, however, their suspicions seemed to return, and they evidently would have been better pleased had I either remained where I was, or gone back again. This procedure did not suit my plans; and though they tried very hard to induce me to 'wyloe' to my 'san-pan,' it was of no use. They then pointed to the heavens, which were very black at the time, and told me that it would soon be a thunder-storm—but even this did not succeed. As a last resource, when they found I was not to be turned out of my way, some of the little ones were sent on before to apprise the villagers of my approach, and when I reached the village every living thing, down even to the dogs and pigs, were out to have a peep at the 'Folke.' I soon put them all, the dogs excepted, (which have the true national antipathy to foreigners,) in the best possible humor, and at last they seemed in no hurry to get rid of me. One of the most respectable amongst them, seemingly the head man of the village, brought me some cakes and tea, which he politely offered me. I thanked him, and began to eat. The hundreds who now surrounded me were perfectly delighted; 'He eats and drinks like ourselves,' said one. 'Look,' said two or three behind me, who had been examining the back part of my head, 'look here; the stranger has no tail!' and then the whole crowd, women and children included, had to come round me to see if it was really a fact that I had no tail. One of them, rather a dandy in his way, with a noble tail of his own, plaited with silk, now came forward, and taking off a kind of cloth which the natives here wear as a turban, and allowing his tail to fall gracefully over his shoulders, said to me in the most triumphant manner, 'Look at that!' I acknowledged that it was very fine, and promised if he would allow me to cut it off I would wear it for his sake. He seemed very much disgusted at the idea of such a loss, and the others had a good laugh at him."—Fortune, pp. 39, 40.

Much has been written in praise of Chinese agriculture.* No doubt they have been diligent cultivators of the soil from a remote period; and some centuries ago, when their agricultural and gardening operations were viewed by Europeans, they appeared to be superior to much which was practiced in the West. But like all other habits and arts, agriculture has been and still continues stationary amongst the Chinese; while in Europe, and in Britain especially, it has made great advances. The consequence is, that Chinese agriculture, as compared to British, is now far behind. It evidently appears a mistaken notion, too, which we have all along adopted, that every acre and inch of land in China is under a state of high cultivation. It is true, that the level plains and hills of moderate height, are all under cultivation, and especially so in the neighborhood of cities; but Mr. Fortune, in his botanical excursions, roamed for many miles over mountains and ravines that were still in a state of nature; some of the hills were perfectly bare and rocky, and destitute of all vegetation; and others were covered with wild plants and brushwood. The houses of the peasantry and small farmers were also of a very mean description, built of mud and stones, with mud floors, and very few domestic conveniences. The agricultural implements are of the simplest kind, and not in the very best condition; in short, every thing betraying a state of matters somewhat similar to what prevailed in Scotland some fifty years ago, when agriculture had not generally attained that perfection to which it has now arrived with us. The generally fertile soil, however, the favorable climate, and the really industrious habits of the people, are all conducive to an abundant production of the fruits of the earth over the whole extent of the country.

Rice is the staple production in all the valleys of the warmer southern provinces. As it forms a chief article of food among the Chinese, its cultivation is extensive. In the south, two crops of this grain are raised in the hot months, besides a crop of some more hardy vegetable in winter. The ground is prepared in spring for the first crop of rice, as soon as the winter grain crops are removed from the fields. The plough, which is commonly drawn by a buffalo or bullock, is a rude instrument, but light, and perhaps more suited to the kind of work than the British plough, which has been tried and found too heavy and unmanageable. As the land is always flooded with water before it is ploughed, this process consists in turning up a layer of mud and water, six or eight inches deep, which lies on a solid floor, or hard stiff clay. The plough never goes deeper than this mud and water, so that the ploughman and his bullock, in wading through the field, find a solid footing at this depth below the surface. The water buffalo, generally employed in the south, is well adapted for this work, as he delights to wallow amongst the mud, and is often found swimming and amusing himself in the canals on the sides of the rice fields. But it must be an unhealthy operation for the poor laborer, who, nevertheless, pursues it cheerfully, and apparently happy. After the plough comes a harrow, without long teeth like ours. The laborer stands upon the top of it, and its use is to break down and pulverize the surface of the muddy soil, and to press in the manure. Previously to the preparation of the fields, the rice seed is sown thickly in small patches of highly manured ground, and the young plants in these seed-beds are ready for transplanting when the fields are in a fit state to receive them. Sometimes, especially in the south, the seeds are previously steeped in liquid manure. The seeding plants are carefully dug up from the bed, and removed to the fields. The fields are now smooth and overflowed with water to the depth of three inches. The operation of planting is performed with great rapidity. A laborer takes a quantity of plants under his left arm, and drops them in bundles over the land about to be planted, as he knows, almost to a plant, what number will be required. These bundles are then taken up in succession. A dozen plants are selected at a time, and plunged by the hand into the muddy soil. The water, when the hand is drawn up, immediately rushes into the hole, and carries with it a portion of soil to cover the roots, and the seedings are thus planted and covered in without further trouble. In the south the first crop is fit to cut by the end of June or the beginning of July. Before it is quite ripe, another crop of seedings is raised in the beds or corners of the fields, and is ready for transplanting as soon as the ground has been ploughed up and prepared for their reception. This second crop is ready for cutting in November. In the north, where the summer is shorter, a different plan is followed. The farmers here plant a second crop two or three weeks after the first, in alternate rows. The first planting takes place about the middle of May, and the crop is reaped in the beginning of August. After the early crop is removed, the ground is stirred up and manured, and the second crop comes to maturity about the middle of November. In the Shang-hai district, the summers are too short to get two crops of rice, but an autumn crop of vegetables is not unfrequent. Rain falls in great abundance during the change of the monsoon in May, and the Chinese are very expert at irrigation, so that during the growth of the rice, the fields are flooded with water. The terraced bases and sides of the hills are supplied with water by mountain streams, and the valleys by canals, the water being raised by a simple but very effective water-wheel. The mountain terraces, which rise one above the other like the steps of a stair, are so constructed both for facilitating the process of irrigation, and for preventing the mountain torrents from washing down the soil.

The Chinese or Nanking cotton plant,—the gossypium herbaceum of botanists, and the "Mie wha" of the northern Chinese,—is a branching annual, growing from one to three feet in height, according to the richness of the soil, and flowering from August to October. The flowers are of a dingy yellow color, and remain expanded only for a few hours. They are followed by the seed-pod, which swells rapidly, and, when ripe, the outer coating bursts, and exposes the pure white cotton, in which the seeds of the plant lie imbedded. The yellow cotton, from which the beautiful Nanking cloth is made, is called "Tze-mie-wha," and differs little, except in color from the other variety. This latter is chiefly cultivated in the level ground around Shang-hai, in a strong, rich, loamy soil, capable of yielding immense crops year after year, although it receives but a small portion of manure. Early in spring the cotton grounds are ploughed up, and manured with a rich mud dug from the drains and ditches. In the end of April or beginning of May, the cotton seed is sown, generally in broadcast, and trodden by the feet of laborers into the soil. The spring rains now commence, and the vegetation of the cotton makes rapid progress. During the summer months the plants are carefully thinned and hoed. Much now depends on the season. If dry, the plants are stinted; but if refreshing rains fall, the crop proves a good one. The cotton plant produces its flowers in succession from August to the end of October, and even, in mild seasons, during November. As a succession of pods burst every day, it is necessary to have them gathered with great regularity, otherwise they fall upon the ground and are spoiled. Little bands of the Chinese are now seen in the afternoon in every field, gathering the ripe cotton, and carrying it home to the houses of the farmers. As the farms are generally small, they are worked almost entirely by the farmer and his family, consisting sometimes of three or even four generations, including the old grey-haired grandfather, or great-grandfather, who has seen the crops of four-score years gathered into his barns. Every member of such a group has a certain degree of interest in his employment. The harvest is their own, and the more poductive it is, the greater number of comforts they will be able to afford. In such a delicate article as cotton, much of the success of the crop depends upon a dry and mild autumn; for wet and cold are both inimical to it. When the cotton is brought from the field it is spread out to dry, and then it undergoes a process to separate the seeds, which is done by passing it through a machine with two rollers. It is then put into bags, which, slung across a bamboo stick, are thus carried into the towns, on the shoulders of the farmers, and disposed of to the cotton merchant Every family retains a portion of the produce for its own use, and this the female members clean, spin, and weave at home. The spinning-wheel and the hand-loom, both once so common in this country, are still in use in China, and to be seen in every village in the cotton districts. The cotton stalks are used as fuel, the refuse as manure, and the cleared fields are immediately planted with clover, beans, or other vegetables, for a second crop.

WELCH ELOQUENCE.

The following extract is from Christman Evans' sermon entitled the "Triumphs of Calvary," founded upon Isaiah 63: 1—6: "Who is this that cometh from Edom," &c.:—

"After the prophets of ancient times had long gazed through the mists of futurity, at the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow, a company of them were gathered together on the summit of Calvary. They saw a host of enemies ascending the hill, arrayed for battle, and most terrific in their aspect. In the middle of the line was the Law of God, fiery and exceedingly broad, and working wrath. On the right wing, Beelzebub with his troops of infernals; and on the left Caiphas with the Jewish priests, and Pilate with his Roman soldiers. The rear was brought up by Death, the last enemy. When the holy seers had espied this army, and perceived that it was drawing nigh, they started back, and prepared for flight. As they looked round, they saw the Son of God advancing with intrepid step, having his face fixed on the hostile band. 'Seest thou the danger that is before thee?' said one of the men of God. 'I will tread them in mine anger,' he replied, 'and trample them in my fury.' 'Who art thou?' said the prophet. He answered: 'I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save.' 'Wilt thou venture to the battle alone?' asked the seer. The Son of God replied; 'I looked, and there was none to help; and I wondered there was none to uphold; therefore mine own arm shall bring salvation unto me; and my fury, it shall uphold me.' 'At what point wilt thou commence thy attack?' inquired the anxious prophet. 'I will first meet the Law,' he replied, and pass under its curse; for lo! I am come to do thy will, O God. When I shall have succeeded in the centre of the line, the colors will turn in my favor.' So saying he moved forward. Instantly the thunderings of Sinai were heard, and the whole band of prophets quaked with terror. But he advanced, undaunted, amidst the gleaming lightnings. For a moment he was concealed from view; and the banner of wrath waved above in triumph. Suddenly the scene was changed. A stream of blood poured forth from his wounded side, and put out all the fires of Sinai. The flag of peace was now seen unfurled, and consternation filled the ranks of his foe. He then crushed, with his bruised heel, the old serpent's head; and put all the infernal powers to flight. With his iron rod he dashed to pieces the enemies on the left wing, like a potter's vessel. Death still remained, who thought himself invincible, having hitherto triumphed over all. He came forward, brandishing his sting, which he had whetted on Sinai's tables of stone. He darted it at the Conqueror, but it turned down, and hung like the flexible lash of a whip. Dismayed, he retreated to the grave, his palace, into which the Conqueror pursued. In a dark corner of his den, he sat on his throne of mouldering skulls, and called upon the worms, his hitherto faithful allies, to aid him in the conflict; but they replied—'His flesh shall see no corruption!' The sceptre fell from his hand. The Conqueror seized him, bound him, and condemned him to the lake of fire; and then rose from the grave, followed by a band of released captives, who came forth after his resurrection to be witnesses of the victory he had won."

THE STAR AND THE CHILD.

A maiden walked at eventide
  Beside a clear and placid stream,
And smiled, as in its depths she saw
  A trembling star's reflected beam.

She smiled until the beam was lost,
  As 'cross the sky a cloud was driven;
And then she sighed, and then forgot
  The star was shining still in heaven.

A mother sat beside life's stream,
  Watching a dying child at dawn,
And smiled, as in its eye she saw
  A hope that it might still live on.

She smiled until the eyelids closed,
  But watched for breath until the even;
And then she wept, and then forgot
  The child was living still in heaven.

THE WIDOW'S OFFERING.

It was the testimony of our Saviour, in behalf of a certain woman mentioned in the New Testament—"She hath done what she could." And there are some at the present day, we doubt not, respecting whom the same testimony might be given. The following instance of self-denying faith would seem to be of this description:

In Somersetshire, England, there was a poor woman, not long since, who was accustomed to earn her own livelihood by working for the farmers at about fifteen cents per day. It happened that a small annuity, of not quite one hundred dollars, was bequeathed to her by a relative; after this event she became deeply interested in the spread of the gospel. At the conclusion of a missionary meeting, held in the place where she lived, she brought forward more than eighty dollars as her donation. The chairman of the meeting, to whom she offered the money, refused to take so much, supposing she could not afford to give it; but she insisted on his receiving the whole amount. The next year she presented a still larger sum, almost a hundred dollars, which she had saved for the purpose. She had supported herself by working for the farmers as before mentioned, and devoted her annuity to the cause of missions; thus beautifully exemplifying a literal compliance with the precept of the Apostle: "Let him labor, working with his hands, that he may have to give to him that needeth." Were the church prevaded by such a spirit, how soon would the earth "be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

KEEPING FOLKS IN MEETING.

When Mr. Moody, (Handkerchief Moody,) was on a journey, I think in the western part of Massachusetts, he called on a brother in the ministry, on Saturday, thinking to spend the Sunday with him, if agreeble. The man appeared very glad to see him, and said—

"I should be very glad to have you stop and preach for me to-morrow, but I feel almost ashamed to ask you."

"Why, what is the matter?" said Mr. Moody.

"Why, our people have got into such a habit of going out before meeting is closed, that it seems to be an imposition on a stranger."

"If that is all, I must and will stop and preach for you," was Mr. Moody's reply.

When the Sunday came, and Mr. Moody had opened the meeting and named his text, he looked around on the assembly, and said—

"My hearers, I am going to speak to two sorts of folks to-day, saints and sinners. Sinners, I am going to give your portion first, and I would have you give good attention."

When he had preached to them as long as he thought best, he paused, and said—

"There, sinners, I have done with you now; you may take your hats and go out of the meeting-house as soon as you please." But all tarried and heard him through.

A FAULT-FINDER.

William Dawson silenced a fault-finder whom he met in Leeds, the day after he had occupied one of the pulpits of that town, in the following manner:

Gent. I had the pleasure of hearing you preach yesterday.

Mr. D. I hope you not only heard, but profited.

Gent. Yes, I did; but I don't like those prayer meetings at the close. They destroy all the good previously received.

Mr. D. You should have united with the people in them.

Gent. I went into the gallery, where I hung over the front, and saw the whole; but I could get no good; I lost, indeed, all the benefit I had received under the sermon.

Mr. D. It is easy to account for that.

Gent. How so?

Mr. D. You mounted the top of the house; and on looking down your neighbor's chimney to see what kind of a fire he kept, you got your eyes filled with smoke. Had you "entered by the door"—gone into the room, and mingled with the family around the household hearth, you would have enjoyed the benefit of the fire as well as they. Sir, you have got the smoke in your eyes.

I SHALL BE A KING.—The late Duke of Hamilton had two sons. The eldest fell into a consumption, when a boy, which ended in his death. Two ministers went to see him at the family seat, near Glasgow, where he lay. After prayer, the youth took his Bible from under his pillow, and turned to 2 Tim. 4: 7. "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a a crown of righteousness;" and added, "this, sirs, is all my comfort!" When his death approached, he called his younger brother to his bed, and spoke to him with great affection. He ended with these remarkable words: "And now, Douglas, in a little time you will be a Duke, but I shall be a King!" [McCheney.

THE SAFETY OF DOING RIGHT.

There are but few persons who will boldly deny the safety of doing right under all circumstances. Yet there are vast numbers whose practice, when fairly interpreted, is equivalent to such denial. Nearly every reformatory movement furnishes more or less illustrations of the truth of this assertion. A great majority of men will admit, when plans are presented for the improvement of society, that they are not only right in themselves, but highly desirable. Indeed, they will not unfrequently go farther, and assert that it is the duty of somebody—perhaps the church or perhaps the State—to see to it that the improvements are made. But there they stop, and if the duty is urged upon them of engaging in earnest efforts to promote these improvements, they begin to raise objections which prove conclusively that they doubt the safety and practicability of doing what they acknowledge to be right and desirable. Many a good cause has suffered more from the timidity and inconsistency of such friends, than from the open opposition of avowed enemies. In England, for instance, when Clarkson began to oppose the slave-trade, and advocate the immediate emancipation of the West India slaves, there were not many who doubted that the plan he proposed was just and right. Instead of adopting it, however, and devising means to carry it out, they raised such a hue-and-cry about its impracticability, that his own life was in danger. Again, when the ablest advocates of temperance in this country broached the doctrine of total abstinence, as the only safe foundation upon which that reform could be based, there were not wanting men who acknowledged the principle to be sound, but denied the practicability of carrying it out, or at least refused to engage in active efforts for that purpose. In both these instances, time has proved, what every man of faith ought to have known, that the course which was right in itself and evidently desirable, was also safe and practicable.

There is another form in which is manifested this unbelief in the safety of doing right, more criminal, perhaps, than either of those to which we have alluded. It is when the positive commands of God come into conflict with the interests of men, and obedience is bartered for expediency. Those whose eyes are open to what is passing around them, need not be told that examples of the kind are abundant. The discussion of the Sabbath question has furnished not a few. When unsophisticated men are pressed with the duty of obeying implicitly the fourth commandment, which says, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God—in it thou shalt not do any work," they not unfrequently express surprise that any body should hesitate to observe the seventh day. But alas! the difficulties in the way of its observance soon come up, and are magnified until they seem to the inquirer to render the safety of obedience quite questionable, to say the least. One man thinks that a change of practice on his part would frustrate all his plans for business, and bring him to speedy and unendurable poverty. Another sees no probability that the mass of Christians will ever change their practice, and thinks that for a few to do so would serve to distract and weaken, and perhaps destroy the church. A third is afraid that an attempt to restore the Sabbath of the Lord will produce such confusion among men that the institution itself will be entirely lost. In view of such obstacles, it is deemed expedient by all to wave the question of obedience to God's positive command, and to follow in the footsteps of the multitude. Now how does it happen, that men who profess to believe in the wisdom and goodness of God, do so often practically deny that belief by refusing to obey him? There can be but one answer. A dead scepticism has taken the place in their hearts of a living faith, and they do not really believe what they so frequently and flippantly profess. The only hope in their case is, that by constant and earnest repetition they may be brought to some sort of belief in the doctrine that what is right is safe, and that there can be no better evidence of a thing being right than that it is commanded by God. To the inculcation of this doctrine every reformer should give earnest heed, because his success depends upon a belief in it.

UNITARIANS AND UNIVERSALISTS.

We learn from the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate, that influences are at work which seem likely soon to produce a closer union than has heretofore existed between the Unitarians and Universalists of this country. The Rev. Mr. Bellows, of New York, and several other Unitarian ministers, have recently had interviews upon the subject with a number of leading Universalist ministers of this State. The first-named gentleman has published in the Christian Inquirer, a Unitarian paper of which he is Editor, several letters descriptive of a tour he made in Central and Western New York, for the purpose in part of consulting with Universalist ministers. He says, as the result of his observation, that it must not be his fault "if a better understanding and more cordial intercourse does not subsist between the two bodies whose opinions and interests are so nearly the same." In commenting upon these letters, Mr. Skinner, Editor of the Magazine and Advocate, says that if all the Unitarians could feel and speak as Mr. Bellows does—"as indignantly disavow and repudiate the doctrine of endless misery, as fully and distinctly avow a belief in the final ingathering in Christ and restoration of all souls to holiness and happiness, the two sects would surely be one in every thing but the name; and we doubt not that they would soon be one even in name; for the name is of no consequence when compared to the principle." "We are far from being averse to an honest and honorable union of the two denominations, a cordial exchange of pulpits, and a hearty coöperation in promoting the spread of truth and advancing the interests of liberal Christianity." In view of such expressions on the part of leading Unitarians and Universalists, the public will look with not a little interest for the result of the movements in progress. A union of the two denominations would be regarded as settling questions which have long been agitated as to Universalist views of the character of Christ, and Unitarian views of the doctrine of endless punishment.

OUR COUNTRY AND ITS LAWS.

With such examples, on the part of the National Government, we may reasonably expect that the same bigoted intolerance will characterize State Legislation; for the character of the parent will stamp itself on the child. Accordingly, we find in the legislative acts of most of the slave States, some of the most outrageous burlesques on common sense that can be imagined. The statutes of all other nations may safely be challenged to exhibit laws more truly diabolical than some of the black codes of the South, or more ineffably foolish and undignified than others.

1st. The right to life is denied, and placed at the disposal of irresponsible individuals. If the keen-eyed slave-dealer enter the peaceful hamlet in the stillness of night, and seize the sleeping wife or child, and the insulted husband and father resist, the tyrant may deprive him of life and be amenable to no tribunal but the high court of Heaven. If the father shall raise his arm in defense of his outraged daughter, to protect her from the lash of the infuriated driver, that driver may number him with the dead. If, obedient to the prompting of the spirit of freedom, the slave shall look to the north-star, and take up his march, the master may pursue with gun and dog, and bring him back, dead or alive. [The writer has heard more than one slaveholder boast of his skill in shooting runaway negroes, according to law, and one thus boasting was a minister of the gospel.]

2d. The slave's testimony cannot be given against a white man, so that should the master be amenable for any act done to a slave, he has only to do it in the absence of any white man, to evade the law, though a thousand colored men should see him commit the depredation.

3d. In many of the slave States, death is the penalty by law for learning a slave to spell the name of Jesus Christ. Reference might be made to a recent law of Georgia, as also to others of longer standing, shutting the gates of knowledge and fountain of life on starving millions.

4th. The Heaven-ordained institution of marriage is nullified, thus converting the South into a grand seraglio, where worse abominations than disgrace the palace of the grand seignior are legally practiced.

5th. Slavery has even arrogated the government of man's thoughts, forbidding him to think in the inmost recesses of his soul, that "all men are created equal." See Digest of Louisiana Laws, vol. 1st, page 112. "Free people of color ought never to insult or strike white people, or presume to think themselves equal to the white." Magnanimous legislation that! Can the world beat it?

But it is tiresome to read the catalogue. Let the thousands of disfranchised citizens of the Empire State join with the millions of other States in proclaiming the iniquity of American jurisprudence. Such laws are indispensable to the existence of slavery. If slavery be right, these laws are right. But who is responsible for the existence of such laws, and consequently for all the woes they inflict? In the Judgment, standing beside the injured slave, the voter must answer. Every successive legislature, since the cession of the District of Columbia to the General Government, and the adoption of the existing laws, to which allusion has been made, has involved itself in all the guilt consequent upon the existence and application of those laws; for, refusing to repeal a law is equivalent to enacting it. But the legislator is the constituted agent of the people, who act through him and by him. Whatever the legislator does, the people do, and are responsible for the same. Thus are the people accountable for all the misery that wrings the life-blood from thousands of hearts. But who are the people? Readers, you are. The guilt rests on every individual who has aided in the appointment of those law-makers, or the silent acquiescence therein; and as members associated in any act cannot lessen the weight of individual responsibility, I conclude that each individual is accountable for the whole. Fearful accountability that! How many, in the Judgment, will learn for the first time to appreciate the truth, that for every act, whether political or not, he shall be called to account.

Such is the condition of our country, and such some of its laws. It is vain that lying sycophants and aspiring demagogues cry, "Peace," for there is no peace. The struggle for the elevation of man, the restoration and perpetuity of liberty, is fearful. The philanthropist looks with trembling anxiety to see another great nation hurled by the thunders of insulted Omnipotence to deserved oblivion. There can be no alternative. The issue is made; the hosts are arrayed; and liberty or slavery must perish, and that speedily. Long has our nation hung on the thread of mercy, which the sword of justice will soon sever; for God is just, and rules over all. If Jefferson, in the infancy of our nation, trembled in view of her iniquity, well may we tremble as we view the same fearful spirit sitting in triumph at home, and bidding its cringing minions go, on steel-flashing wings, and snatch the goddess of freedom from gold-glittering Mexico, and lay her upon the temple of the sun, now dedicated to a god more fiendish than the stupid idols to which the heathens have there sacrificed human beings. But there is hope, for the voice of freedom still sounds among the green hills of Vermont, and rocky coasts of New Hampshire, and echoes in tyrant-scourging tones from the mouth of one fearless representative of New England patriotism. The voices of martyred patriots still speak. Lovejoy is not forgotten. Torrey is not dead. The tyrant trembles as he walks over his grave, for he hears beneath him the muttering volcano of vengeance. The sealy monster stretches his neck, and turns his fearful eyes rapidly in their worn-out sockets, as an occasional spirit of peace flits the air, lest a single breath from its wing should dissolve his his crusty form. But where is his retreat when fear cometh? Whence issues he forth to drink the nation's life-blood. Oh, shame! The national council-house is his sanctorum, the statute book his diploma. Thus recommended, he deals his life-chilling nostrums to a trembling nation. Shall we drink them and die? No; by all that is holy in the relations of manhood, and sacred in the principles of religion, he shall flee from behind his legal shield, and in his naked deformity, the withering gaze of an outraged people chase him back to pandemonium whence he came. Who will not join in the chase, shall blush as his posterity weeps over his grey-haired infamy.

WARM RECEPTION.

We learn from a letter in the "Liberator," that Rev. Alexander Campbell, of Virginia, recently made a visit to Scotland, one object of which was to disseminate his peculiar theological views in that country. Soon after his arrival in Edinburgh, James Robertson, a Secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society, called upon him for the purpose of reading over to him certain extracts from his printed works in justification of slavery, and to inquire whether he continued to hold the same sentiments respecting that institution. He frankly admitted the sentiments to be his at present, as well as in times past. Hereupon the following placard was printed and posted up over the whole city:—"Citizens of Edinburgh, beware—The Rev. Alexander Campbell, of Virginia, U. S., has been a slaveholder himself, and is still the defender of man-stealers!" This bold declaration was backed up by various extracts from Mr. Campbell's paper, the "Millennial Harbinger," and from other works. In the evening of the same day, Mr. Campbell held a meeting, in the course of which he referred to the placard, and said it was a tissue of falsehoods. Another placard was immediately issued, reiterating the charges against Mr. C., and challenging him to defend his position in relation to Slavery. He did not feel disposed to engage in any discussion, but delivered a lecture on slavery in which he defended it from the Bible. The Anti-Slavery Society has learned his intended route through Scotland, and has sent forward the "beware" placard to the towns and villages which he is to visit, hoping by this means to give him a warm reception wherever he may go.

The following paragraph from the New York Tribune, which has come to hand since the above was written, shows to what lengths this controversy has been carried:—

"Rev. Mr. Campbell, of the United States, and Rev. Mr. Robertson of Edinburgh, have recently been attempting to settle a dispute, which arose from some libelous remarks made by the former. Mr. Robertson brought an action against Mr. Campbell for defamation of character, placing his damages at £5,000. As it was supposed that Mr. Campbell was about to leave this country for the United States, a warrant for his commitment was obtained, and he was taken off and lodged in Glasgow jail. The case came on before Lord Murray, and that magistrate decided that the warrant was not of a sufficiently definite character to justify Mr. Campbell's imprisonment, and he expressed strong doubts whether the case warranted the incarceration of a foreigner meditating flight. Mr. Campbell was liberated, and the libel case will come on shortly. This quarrel between these clergymen has caused much excitement in Scotland."

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

By order of the First Seventh-day Baptist Church of Brookfield, I forward to you for publication a copy of the following resolution:—

Resolved, That all those members who have gone out from among us, or beyond the pales of the church, are requested to report themselves to the church within one year from the date of this notice. H. S. CRANDALL, Clerk.

Leonardsville, July 25, 1847.

BEAUTY AND USEFULNESS.

Who has not felt the power of beauty to charm, to captivate the senses? How subduing to the baser passions—how charming to the soul! Yet is beauty itself rendered doubly charming, when we can see united with it the divine attribute of goodness. How it rejoices the heart to behold, waving in the sunlight, the graceful boughs and richly-teinted foliage! But how involuntarily our devout admiration is summoned up, when we behold, regaling in the shade of that same tree, the wearied and disconsolate traveler, and hear among its branches the sweet sonnets of the feathered minstrels, made glad by a resting-place there! The bubbling rill, that murmurs over its pebbly bed, is beautiful; but how different the emotions raised by one wasting itself in the arid desert, and the one along whose banks green meadows rejoice in its ministrations, and the blushing flower stoops to quaff its cooling sweetness from the same ripple that reflects its own bright image. The far-reaching landscape, teeming with the yellow harvest, the golden fruit, and the waving wild-wood, bearing along the winding river, on whose bank snugly nestle a hundred happy dwellings, is beautiful. But what joy is added to the soul by the knowledge that each component of the splendid scene is ready to minister to the wants of man and beast! Fair daughter of beauty, learn from this a lesson. Art thou beautiful? Add to thy charms another. Show thyself to be a minister of goodness. Lighten the burden of suffering mortals. Thou hast the power to do it. It is their due. Then open thy hands, and sow abroad the seed of happiness. Then thou wilt be gathered in due time to the land of the blessed, and not perish as does the butterfly of sunshine.

RETURNING TO THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.—A clergyman in England, named Oxley, who abandoned the Catholic church about five years ago, has recently returned to it, and has published a letter expressive of his reasons for doing so, and his feelings in relation to his defection. He says that he has labored hard, and spared no effort, to accomplish many a project; but all his attempts have signally failed, and he has felt reproached with the thought, 'Without me ye can do nothing.' Besides this, God has visited him in many ways—"great and almost continual infirmities, loss of friends, reputation," &c. In view of all these things, he has concluded to turn back to the bosom of "Mother Church." Here is his concluding paragraph, in reading which one hardly knows whether to feel indignant at his total want of Christian charity, or to pity his blindness in hanging his salvation upon a connection with that particular church:—

"In a word, then, the dread of God's judgments, the fear of the near approach of death, the awful idea of dying an excommunicated outcast from Christ's Holy Church, have urged me to hail once more the bark of Peter, as the only means of escaping the storms and tempests which threaten me with destruction."

THE JEWS AND THE SABBATH.—A letter, dated Konigsberg, (Prussia,) June 10, says: The police has just notified the Israelites of this city, that they will not be allowed to carry out the decision they had formed to transfer the celebration of their Sabbath from Saturday to Sunday. This prohibition is founded on a ministerial rescript, which expressly forbids any alteration in the forms of the Jewish worship. The Jewish community of Konigsberg have resolved to appeal to the government against the restriction which it is proposed to impose on them. In support of their claim they alledge that at Berlin the exercise of the Israelitish reformed worship differs essentially from the primitive forms of worship.

"THE GREAT IRON WHEEL."—Writing under the above head, the "Methodist Episcopalian" gives the following description of the machinery of the Methodist Episcopal Church. If the sketch was from any other than a Methodist paper, we should hesitate about publishing it. But as it comes from one who ought to know, we copy it for the purpose of showing how he views his own church:—

"First—There is a great outer wheel of Episcopacy, which accomplishes its entire revolution once in four years. To this are attached twenty-eight smaller wheels, styled annual conferences, moving round once a year; to those are attached one hundred wheels, designated presiding elders, moving twelve hundred other wheels, termed quarterly conferences, every three months; to these are attached four thousand wheels, styled traveling preachers, moving round once a month, and communicating motion to thirty thousand wheels, called class leaders, moving round once a week, and who, in turn, being attached to between seven and eight hundred thousand wheels, called members, give a different impulse to whirl them around every day. What a machine is this?"

PAINFUL COMMENT.—A correspondent of the Christian Chronicle, writing from England, closes a communication relating mainly to the condition of the Baptist Churches of that country, with this sad comment:—"From all that we have seen and heard, the conclusion has been forced upon us, that was less time spent in opposing the arrogant claims of The Church, and more in preaching the attractions of the cross, the cause of God and truth would be much better subserved. How important that men should learn the great lesson that even truth, put into form, and fought for as form, without love, 'may make men as bitter, as violent, as malignant, as intolerant, as any despotism of hierarchial error, because it becomes a selfish thing, a proud thing, a thing of meum and teum, a thing of conquest, a possession of selfishness and pride.'"

SUNDAY RAILWAY TRAVELING IN SCOTLAND.—At the meeting of the shareholders of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway, held here on the 14th inst., there were remarks made on the effect which the opening of the Caledonian line would have on the Edinburgh and Glasgow. One proprietor gave it as his opinion, that if the latter company continued to refuse to run trains on Sunday, the former company would monopolize the traffic. From the tone adopted by the Chairman, we think it may be assumed, that ere long the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company will resume their Sunday traffic. The pleasure of the people, not the command of his God, was the Chairman's aim, avowedly, as also that of the other Directors. J. A. BEGG.

GLASGOW, Sept. 17, 1847.

FAIR OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE.—The Great Fair of the American Institute has been open for more than a week past, at Castle Garden, in this city. The display of machinery, manufactured articles of every description, and fruits and flowers, is uncommonly large. In the department of woven fabrics, there are exhibited broadcloths of American manufacture equal to the best imported. Of silks, raw and manufactured, there are some really attractive specimens. And the numerous little household conveniences, and improved farming implements, are if possible more attractive still. The whole is arranged with great neatness and taste, so as to render a visit to the Fair exceedingly pleasant and instructive.

HYMN BOOKS AND TRACTS FOR WESTERN NEW YORK.—A quantity of Hymn Books, in the various styles of binding, have been this week forwarded to Bro. Maxson Green, of Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y.,—enough, it is supposed, to supply the churches in the Western Association who may find it more convenient to get the books from Alfred than from New York. Those who order them from Alfred will be expected to send the money with their orders. The reason for this rule is obvious. It is much easier for the purchasers to pay promptly, than for the publishers to collect little bills all over the country in time to meet the demands of paper-makers, printers, and binders.

We are also requested to say, in this connection, that Bro. Maxson Green has on hand a quantity of Sabbath Tracts, which have been forwarded to him as depositary of the Western Association.

CONSECRATION OF A SYNAGOGUE.

The Philadelphia News says that the new synagogue of the congregation of the "Seekers of Peace," in Juliana street below 6th, was recently consecrated to the worship of the God of Israel. The edifice is neat and tasteful, and the interior finished with great care and with much magnificence, marked here and there by the beautiful emblems and characteristics of the Jewish people. The ground floor itself is sufficiently commodious to seat a large congregation; in addition to which there is a spacious gallery on three sides of the building. At the west end is the pulpit, very richly and tastefully decorated, and opposite, under the gallery, that time-honored and sacred emblem, the "Ark of the Covenant," where the tables containing the laws of Moses are deposited.

The front of the Ark is covered with a rich crimson velvet, on which is an inscription in Hebrew, while over all is a large and beautifully executed American eagle and shield, with a splendid gas light on either side. The effect of the whole when lit up—the combination of the emblems of our nationality and those of the Jewish faith—is beautiful indeed. The ceremonies of consecration commenced at four o'clock, by which time every part of the synagogue was crowded, the galleries being filled with ladies; and by all the greatest interest was manifested in the solemn rites, wich were commenced with a symphony by an efficient orchestra, consisting of two full brass and string bands.

The minister, the Rev. Dr. Khan, then standing outside the door, knocked, saying, "Open the gates of righteousness to me," &c., the choir, consisting of 12 ladies in white, responding as the minister with the trustees entered and proceeded to the sacred Ark, from whence they returned to receive the Law-rolls, which after the seven circuits had been performed, amid the responses of the choir and the music of the orchestra, were deposited in the Ark. The usual prayers were then said, after which the Rev. Dr. Khan delivered an able address in German, followed by the Rev. Mr. Leeser in English, when the services were concluded with "Vigdal."

PROCLAMATION,

BY JOHN YOUNG, GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

A day of Public Thanksgiving is due to Almighty God, for blessings bestowed upon the people of this State during the past year.

While a sanguinary war has been raging upon our national frontier—while the principal city of a sister State has been scourged with a pestilence that walketh at noonday, and while gaunt famine and disease afflict the fairest portion of the mother country, the State of New York presents a gladsome picture of universal happiness and prosperity. Seed time and harvest have been continued to the husbandman—the laborer and the artisan have not sought in vain for employment—the ships of the merchant have traded in peace with the nations of the earth, and plenty has crowned the efforts of all classes of society.

The blessings of free Government—the means of universal education—the security of person and property, and the supremacy of law and order, have been vouchsafed to us in an eminent degree.

For all these, and for other good gifts, we are indebted to that Providence whose bounty and protection are conferred upon all, without regard to country or condition.

I, therefore, respectfully recommend to the people of this State, to observe the 25th day of November next, as a day of Public Thanksgiving; to abstain on that day from their usual avocations, and mingle, with their thanksgivings, prayers to Heaven for the continuance of its smiles, and for its protection against famine, disease and crime.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the Privy Seal of the State to be hereunto affixed. Witness my hand, at [L. S.] the City of Albany, this eighth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-seven. JOHN YOUNG.

By the Governor,
HENRY V. COLT, Private Secretary.

General Intelligence.

WAR NEWS.

Nothing of importance has been heard from the seat of war since our last. Gen. Scott's army has taken possession of stations which command the city of Mexico. To enter the city proper is now regarded as a much more difficult undertaking than was at first supposed. The general impression is, that the war will in future be pushed with greater vigor, and that peace will not be secured without much more bloodshed.

The War with Mexico.—The following paragraph is from the Washington Union, the organ of the present administration. If it speaks by authority, there is reason to fear that the horrors of our wicked war with Mexico are only just begun :—

"Mexico must now be made to feel—and the sooner the better—that the question of the continuance of the war is, indeed, fast becoming to her a question of national existence. She must be made to feel that, in thus rejecting our just and liberal overtures of peace, she is placing herself wholly beyond the pale of farther forbearance at our hands. She must now be made to know that there is no peace for her, save upon terms which shall secure to us full indemnification for all the expenditures of the war, and full reparation for all the injuries which we have received, including among them, as not the least, her insolent repulse of our recent efforts for conciliation. She must be made to know, that henceforth, at least, this war is hers—the result of her own deliberate election—and so to be borne by her, in the full extent of its evils and its burdens. Our work of subjugation and conquest must go on rapidly, with augmented forces, and, as far as possible, at the expense of Mexico herself. From Mexican contributions, levied and seized, if need be, by the strong hand, our armies must now be subsisted and supported in the field. The policy of forbearance and conciliation, however magnanimously adopted by us, and in however generous an attitude it may have hitherto presented us before the world, is now exhausted. It has met with no response, but new rancor and contumely, from our vanquished foe. Henceforth we must seek peace, and compel it, by inflicting upon our enemy all the evils of war."

THE OTHER SIDE.

We published, a few weeks since, an article giving an account of the innocence of young Boyington, the printer, who was hanged some years ago at Mobile for murder. The account stated that another man had confessed the crime for which Boyington suffered. But the Editor of the Cleveland Daily Herald, who appears to speak from good authority, denies the correctness of the story. He says :—

Young Boyington was a printer, and served most of his apprenticeship in New Haven. He was a dashing youth, but of good mind; and many of his productions in prose and verse are said to be creditable to one of his age. When in Mobile he decoyed a young man, a native of Portland, Maine, into a burial ground, a secluded place, where he stabbed him to the heart with a dagger, after which he robbed his victim of his watch, and about ninety dollars in money, and made his escape. He was pursued, overtaken, and brought back to Mobile for trial. The watch belonging to the murdered man, he threw overboard from the steamboat when he was arrested, but it was recovered, and was produced in evidence against him.

After his conviction, and when he found his doom sealed, all fortitude forsook him, and the craven spirit of a coward and a villain was perfectly apparent, and although he protested his innocence to the last, no one acquainted with the evidence on which he was convicted doubted for a moment that he was guilty of the crime of murder. We have the authority of those who were conversant with the facts at the time, for saying that the pretended confession of the landlord has no foundation whatever.

Horrible System.—We find an "extract of a letter from the army," dated Buena Vista, August 20th, in the National Intelligencer, from which we gather the following account of the system of brutality practiced by the Texan Rangers. How long are such atrocities to be countenanced by our Government?

"A Ranger is missed; his body is perhaps found, perhaps not. The nearest Mexicans to the vicinity of his disappearance are required to account for him; they will not, or cannot. The bowie-knife is called upon, and deliberately every male Mexican in that rancho is speedily done for, guilty or not guilty. But this is not enough to make an offset for the life of a Texan. Another rancho receives the fearful visit, and again blood flows. The number killed on some occasions in this way has been fearfully great, as has been gathered from what fell from the Texans, but no one but themselves knew about it, as a report of any such doings to the nearest commanding officer would only be followed by a tenfold retaliation on the nearest 'customers.' This is all horrid, it is true, but it has had the salutary tendency of causing the well-disposed and honest Mexicans to ferret out and inform of those who practice murder and robbery. Going about at some distance from camp is considered much more safe."

The people of Louisa County, in Virginia, are becoming as excited upon the subject of gold mines as were their ancestors, the first settlers, the first band of whom, it will be recollected, were nearly starved to death in consequence of having abandoned the culture of corn for the search of this precious metal. A lump of pure virgin gold valued at eighty dollars has been found upon a farm in Louisa county, and arrangements are making by the proprietor for the prosecution of further researches and for the working of the mine on an extensive scale. Gold, Copper, and Iron Mines are said to abound in the same county, and all the inhabitants are preparing to enter the bowels of the earth.

SUMMARY.

Charles Floody, while in a state of intoxication, (failing in an attempt to beat his wife, who escaped,) took a child of fifteen months and threw it through a window, breaking glass and sash, the child being precipitated some eight or ten feet. He then seized another child about three years old, which he threw after it. The first victim of the drunken wrath was so shockingly mangled that it is not expected to recover. Floody carried home a quart of liquor which tells the whole story—a heart-sickening and instructive item in the great account of mischief done in the same way.

The Buffalo Express says that the dwelling house of an aged man, named Eli Bush, who lives about 4 miles below the village of Tonawanda, on the Niagara River, was entered by some half dozen men and robbed of $600 in silver and gold. Mr. Bush was awake while the search for the money was going on through the house, but the men being armed he was intimidated, through threats against his life, and remained a quiet spectator of his own robbery. The men were disguised so that he could not recognize them.
